

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

C A S E S

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM AUGUST 10, 1888, TO AUGUST 8, 1889.

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, JAMES PATTEN, C. C. MACONOCHIE,
H. J. E. FRASER, AND JOHN DAVID SYM, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

STANFORD LIBRARY

FOURTH SERIES.—VOL. XVI.

EDINBURGH:

T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.

M.DCCC.LXXXIX.

PRINTED BY

GEORGE ROBB & CO., THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279725

Abstract

J U D G E S
OF THE
COURT OF SESSION
DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

---

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.
Lord MURE.
Lord SHAND.
Lord ADAM.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. J. H. A.
MACDONALD.
Lord YOUNG.
Lord RUTHERFURD CLARK.
Lord LEE.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord FRASER.***
Lord M'LAREN.
Lord KINNEAR.
Lord TRAYNER.
Lord WELLWOOD.
Lord KYLLACHY.

---

* Lord Fraser died on 27th March 1889.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.

Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord YOUNG.

Lord LEE.

Lord MURE.

Lord FRASER.

Lord ADAM.

Lord KINNEAR.

Lord M'LAREN.

Lord TRAYNER.

Lord SHAND.

Lord WELLWOOD.

Lord RUTHERFURD CLARK.

Lord KYLLACHY.

---

Lord Advocate,	{	The Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD, succeeded by J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Esquire.
Dean of Faculty,	{	WILLIAM MACKINTOSH, Esquire, succeeded by the Right Hon. J. B. BALFOUR.
Solicitor-General,	{	J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Esquire, succeeded by M. T. S. DARLING, Esquire.

---

HOUSE OF LORDS.

---

P E E R S

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, LORD HALSBURY.

Lords WATSON, FITZGERALD, HERSCHELL, and MACNAGHTEN.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN

VOLUME XVI.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,— Lands Valuation Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,—
Court of Justiciary, see p. xii.,—House of Lords, see p. xiii.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
Adam, M'Lean v. - - - - -	175
Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., - - - - -	843
Advocate, Lord, Henderson v. - - - - -	147
Advocate, Lord, v. Laidlay, &c. (Laidlay's Trustees), - - - - -	959
Aiton v. Milne, &c. (Russell's Executors), - - - - -	625
Allan v. Miller, - - - - -	557
Anderson's Bursary Trustees v. Sutherland, - - - - -	574
Argyll, Duke of, v. Cameron, - - - - -	139
Arrol & Co., Gavin v. - - - - -	509
Assets Co., Limited, Nelson v. - - - - -	898
Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	64
Bain v. Strang, - - - - -	186
Bannerman's Executors, Whyte, &c. (Dalglish's Trustees) v. - - - - -	559
Beedie v. Beedie, - - - - -	648
Begg v. Begg, - - - - -	550
Bell v. Hamilton, &c. (Hamilton's Trustees), - - - - -	1001
Bellfield Colliery Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., - - - - -	535
Black, Schaw v. - - - - -	336
Blair v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., - - - - -	325, 947
Blasquez v. Lothians Racing Club and Reid, - - - - -	893
Boson Oil Co., Limited, Simpson v. - - - - -	391
Bowie, &c. (Bowie's Trustees) v. Paterson, - - - - -	983
Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., - - - - -	104
Brand v. Shaws, - - - - -	315
Brown v. Virtue & Co., Limited, - - - - -	987
Browne v. M'Farlane, - - - - -	368
Bruce (Inspector of Poor of Fordoun) v. Trefusis, &c. (Ratepayers of Fordoun), - - - - -	568
Bryan, Dickson v. - - - - -	673
Buccleuch, Duke of, Sturrock (Clerk to the Police Commissioners of Dalkeith) v. - - - - -	575
Buchan, Earl of, Vincent v. - - - - -	637
Bulloch, &c. (Clouston's Trustees) v. Bulloch, - - - - -	937
Cairns v. Caledonian Railway Co., - - - - -	618
Caledonian Railway Co., Cairns v. - - - - -	618
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Chisholm, - - - - -	622
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Cross & Sons, - - - - -	584
Callander Coal Co., Watson v. - - - - -	111
Cameron, Duke of Argyll v. - - - - -	139
Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, - - - - -	1007
Campbell, &c. (Campbell's Trustees), Currie v. - - - - -	237
Campbell, Lord Macdonald v. - - - - -	540
Campbell's Trustee, Marshall & Aitken v. - - - - -	895
Campbell, Stewart v. - - - - -	346
Carritt, &c. (Bannerman's Executors), Whyte, &c. (Dalglish's Trustees) v. - - - - -	559

	Page
Carron Co., Henderson v. - - - - -	633
Cheape v. Kinmont, - - - - -	144
Chisholm, Caledonian Railway Co. v. - - - - -	622
Christie's Trustees v. Christie, &c. (Murray's Trustees), - - - - -	913
Ciceri & Co. v. Sutton & Co., - - - - -	814
Clark, Jamieson and Another (Lord Glasgow's Trustees) v. - - - - -	545
Clarke, M'Nab v. - - - - -	610
Clouston's Trustees v. Bulloch, - - - - -	937
Cohen & Co., Scottish Provident Institution v. - - - - -	112
Colston, &c. (Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge), Delaney v. - - - - -	753
Coltness Iron Co., Limited, Weir v. - - - - -	614
Colvils, Lowden, & Co. (Owners of "Ethelreda"), Cunningham v. - - - - -	295
Cook v. Wallace & Wilson, - - - - -	565
Cormack v. School Board of Wick and Pulteneytown, - - - - -	812
Coulthart, Mackenzie v. - - - - -	1127
Couper, &c. (Couper's Trustees) v. National Bank of Scotland, - - - - -	412
Cowan, &c. (Cowan's Trustees) v. Cowan, - - - - -	7
Cowie (Cowie's Executrix), Ross v. - - - - -	224
Creevy v. Hannay's Patents Co., Limited, - - - - -	993
Cross & Sons, Caledonian Railway Co. v. - - - - -	584
Croucher v. Inglis, - - - - -	774
Cunningham v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co. (Owners of "Ethelreda"), - - - - -	295
Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, - - - - -	383
Currie v. Campbell, &c. (Campbell's Trustees), - - - - -	237
Currys v. Walker, &c. (Walker's Trustees), - - - - -	355
Cuthbert v. Whitton, - - - - -	259
Dalglish's Trustees v. Carritt, &c. (Bannerman's Executors), - - - - -	559
Dalhousie's, Earl of, Trustees v. Young, - - - - -	681
Dalkeith Police Commissioners v. Duke of Buccleuch, - - - - -	575
Dalmellington Iron Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., - - - - -	523
Dawson (Russell's Trustee), Distillers Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	479
Delaney v. Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, - - - - -	753
Dewar, &c. (Durie's Trustees) v. Earl of Elgin, - - - - -	1104
Dick & Stevenson v. Woodside Steel and Iron Co., - - - - -	242
Dickson and Others (Dickson's Trustees), - - - - -	519
Dickson v. Bryan, - - - - -	673
Dickson, Eaglesham & Co. v. - - - - -	557
Distillers Co., Limited, v. Dawson (Russell's Trustee), - - - - -	479
Dominion Bank v. Bank of Scotland, - - - - -	1081
Duff v. National Telephone Co., Limited, - - - - -	675
Duncan & Jamieson, Cunningham v. - - - - -	383
Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin, - - - - -	1104
Duthie's Trustees v. Forlong, - - - - -	1002
Eaglesham & Co. v. Dickson, - - - - -	557
East India Co. for Exploration and Mining, Limited, Klenck v. - - - - -	271
Easton (Easton's Executor), M'Meekin v. - - - - -	363
Eckford School Board v. Rutherford, - - - - -	377
Edinburgh City Parish, Inspector of Poor of, v. Inspector of Poor of South Leith, - - - - -	18
Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, Delaney v. - - - - -	753
Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., Rixon v. - - - - -	653
Edinburgh University, Pattison's Trustees v. - - - - -	73
Edmonstone, &c. (Lumsden's Trustees) v. Seton, - - - - -	1
Edwards v. Hutcheon, - - - - -	694
Eldred & Bignold, Welsh v. - - - - -	927
Elgin, Earl of, Dewar, &c. (Durie's Trustees) v. - - - - -	1104
"Ethelreda," Owners of the, Cunningham v. - - - - -	295
Falconer, Robertson & Sons v. - - - - -	235

INDEX OF NAMES.

vii

	Page
Fergus, M'Intyre, &c. (Mitchell's Trustees) v.	902
Fettes Trust, Governors of, Piggott v.	199
Ford & Sons v. Stephenson,	24
Fordoun, Inspector of Poor of, v. Trefusis, &c. (Ratepayers of Fordoun),	568
Forlong, Murray, &c. (Duthie's Trustees) v.	1002
Fotheringham's Trustees v. Fotheringham,	873
Fraser (M'Dougall's Trustee) v. Gibbon,	740
Freeth, Hamilton & Co. v.	1022
Gardiner v. Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Co.,	658
Gardner, Robertson, &c. (Robertson's Trustees) v.	705
Gavin v. Arrol & Co.,	509
Geddes (Miller's Trustee), Tod (Sutherland's Trustee) v.	10
General Property Investment Co., v. Matheson, &c. (Matheson's Trustees),	282
Gibbon, Fraser (M'Dougall's Trustee) v.	740
Gilchrist v. Pentland, &c. (Gilchrist's Trustees),	1118
Gill's Trustees v. Patrick,	403
Glasgow's, Lord, Trustees v. Clark,	545
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v.	104
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Dalmellington Iron Co. v.	523
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Yeats's Trustees (Bellfield Colliery Co.) v.	535
Gordon (Young's Judicial Factor) v. Western, &c. (Williams' Trustees),	980
Gourlay (Wingate, Birrell, & Co.'s Trustee), Rose, Murison, & Thomson v.	1132
Graham, &c. (Campbell's Trustees) v. Campbell,	1007
Grant, &c. (Grant's Tutors),	365
Great North of Scotland Railway Co., Adams v.	843
Greig, Murdoch & Co., Limited, v.	396
Greig v. Simpson,	18
Gudgeon v. Outram & Co.,	183
Hamilton, &c. (Hamilton's Trustees), Ball v.	1001
Hamilton & Co. v. Freeth,	1022
Hamilton v. Hardie, &c. (Hardie's Executors),	192
Hamilton, Stuart v.	1030
Hannay's Patents Co., Limited, Creevy v.	993
Happer, Trotter v.	141
Hardie, &c. (Hardie's Executors), Hamilton v.	192
Hastie v. M'Murtrie,	715
Hattie v. Leitch,	1128
Henderson v. Carron Co.,	633
Henderson v. Henderson,	5, 84
Henderson v. Lord Advocate,	147
Henderson v. Robb,	341
Highland Railway Co. v. Income-Tax Commissioners,	950
Highland Railway Co., Smith v.	57
Highland Railway Co., Stewart v.	580
Hill, M'Laren (Nicol's Trustee) v.	416
Hogarth and Another (Fotheringham's Trustees) v. Fotheringham,	873
Hogarth, &c. (Owners of the "Westfalia") v. Miller, Brother, & Co.,	599
Horneby, Wylie & Lochhead v.	907
Horsburgh, &c. (Christie's Trustees) v. Christie, &c. (Murray's Trustees),	913
Horsburgh (Scott's Trustee), Scott v.	504, 507
Hutcheon, Edwards v.	694
Income-Tax Commissioners, Highland Railway Co. v.	950
Inglis, Croucher v.	774
Inland Revenue, Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co., Limited, v.	64
Inland Revenue, Macgregor v.	438
Inland Revenue, Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v.	461
Inland Revenue, Texas Land and Cattle Co., Limited, v.	69

	Page
Jack, Simpson v. - - - - -	131
Jackson, Morley v. - - - - -	78
Jamieson and Another (Lord Glasgow's Trustees) v. Clark, et e contra , -	545
Jamieson v. Lesslie, &c. (Lesslie's Trustees), - - - - -	807
Jamieson v. Robertson, - - - - -	15
Jenkins (Macdougall & Co.'s Trustee), Stephen (Stephen's Trustee) v. -	779
Keith, Ross v. - - - - -	86
Kennedy v. Stewart, - - - - -	421, 521, 857, 890
King, Marshall v. - - - - -	40
Kinmont, Cheape v. - - - - -	144
Kippen's Trustees v. Leitch, - - - - -	668
Kirkwood, &c. (Kirkwood's Trustees) v. Leith and Bremner, -	255
Klenck v. East India Co. for Exploration and Mining, Limited, -	271
Laidlay, &c. (Laidlay's Trustees), Lord Advocate v. - - - - -	959
Laming & Co. v. Seater, - - - - -	828
Lamont & Co., Bank of Scotland v. - - - - -	769
Lang v. Latta, &c. (Lang's Trustees), - - - - -	590
Latta, &c. (Lang's Trustees), Lang v. - - - - -	590
Laurie v. Motherwell, - - - - -	122
Lawrie v. Pearson, - - - - -	62
Leitch, Hattie v. - - - - -	1128
Leitch, &c. (Kippen's Trustees) v. Leitch, - - - - -	668
Leith and Bremner, Kirkwood, &c. (Kirkwood's Trustees) v. -	255
Lesslie, &c. (Lesslie's Trustees), Jamieson v. - - - - -	807
Lochhead, Thomson, Jackson, Gourlay, & Taylor v. - - - - -	373
Lochore and Capledrae Cannel Coal Co., - - - - -	556
Lothians Racing Club and Reid, Blasquez v. - - - - -	893
Lumsden's Trustees v. Seton, - - - - -	1
Lundie, &c. (Lundie's Trustees), M'Elmail v. - - - - -	47
M'Bain (Thomson's Trustee), Thomson v. - - - - -	333
M'Bride & Smith, Smith v. - - - - -	36
M'Callum, M'Phedron and Currie v. - - - - -	45
Macdonald, Lord, v. Campbell, - - - - -	540
Macdonald v. Macdonald, - - - - -	758
Macdonald v. Mackessack, - - - - -	168
M'Dougall's Trustee v. Gibbon, - - - - -	740
Macdougall & Co.'s Trustee, Stephen (Stephen's Trustee) v. -	779
M'Elmail v. Lundie, &c. (Lundie's Trustees), - - - - -	47
M'Farlane, Browne v. - - - - -	368
Macfarlane, &c. (Pattison's Trustees) v. Edinburgh University, -	73
Macfarlane v. Matheson, - - - - -	230
Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Co., Gardiner v. - - - - -	658
M'Geoghs, Munro v. - - - - -	93
Macgregor v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	438
M'Intyre, &c. (Mitchell's Trustees) v. Fergus, - - - - -	902
Mackay, &c. (Rossborough's Trustees) v. Rossborough, - -	157
Mackenzie v. Coulthart, - - - - -	1127
Mackenzie, Ross v. - - - - -	871
Mackessack, Macdonald v. - - - - -	168
M'Laren (Nicol's Trustee) v. Hill, - - - - -	416
M'Lean v. Adam, - - - - -	175
Maclean, &c. (Maclean's Trustees) v. Macleans, - - - - -	1095
Maclean, Parr v. - - - - -	810
MacLulich, M'Murphy v. - - - - -	678
M'Meehin v. Easton (Easton's Executor), - - - - -	363
M'Murphy v. MacLulich, - - - - -	678
M'Murtrie, Hastie v. - - - - -	715
M'Nab v. Clarke, - - - - -	610
M'Phedron and Currie v. M'Callum, - - - - -	45

INDEX OF NAMES.

ix

	Page
Macpherson, &c. (Anderson's Bursary Trustees) v. Sutherland,	574
Macrae v. Sutherland,	476
Marshall v. King,	40
Marshall & Aitken v. Millar (Campbell's Trustee),	895
Martin v. Stewart,	185
Matheson, &c. (Matheson's Trustees), General Property Investment Co. v.	282
Matheson, Macfarlane v.	230
Matheson (Matheson's Curator Bonis) v. Mathesons,	701
Millar (Campbell's Trustee), Marshall & Aitken v.	895
Miller, Allan v.	557
Miller, Brother, & Co., Hogarth, &c. (Owners of the "Westfalia") v.	599
Miller's Trustee, Tod (Sutherland's Trustee) v.	10
Milne, &c. (Russell's Executors) Aiton v.	625
Mitchell's Trustees v. Fergus,	902
Mitchell v. Motherwell,	122
Mitchell v. Rawyards Coal Co.	117
Mollison v. Noltie,	350
Morley v. Jackson,	78
Morrison & Mason v. Scottish Employers' Liability and Accident Assurance Co., Limited,	212
Morrison v. Tawse (Tawse's Executrix),	247
Motherwell, Laurie v.	122
Motherwell, Mitchell v.	122
Muir, &c. (Muir's Trustees) v. Muir,	954
Munro v. M'Geogha,	93
Murdoch & Co., Limited, v. Greig,	396
Murray, &c. (Duthie's Trustees) v. Forlong,	1002
Murray's Trustees, Horsbrugh, &c. (Christie's Trustees) v.	913
Murray, Whyte v.	95
National Bank of Scotland, Couper, &c. (Couper's Trustees) v.	412
National Telephone Co., Limited, Duff v.	675
Nelson v. Assets Co., Limited,	898
Nicol's Trustee v. Hill,	416
Noltie, Mollison v.	350
North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Blair v.	325, 947
North, Stewart v.	927
Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co., Limited, v. Whyte,	100
Outram & Co., Gudgeon v.	183
Outram & Co., Wright & Greig v.	1004
Parnell v. Walter,	917
Parr v. Maclean,	810
Paterson, Bowie, &c. (Bowie's Trustees) v.	983
Patrick, Gill's Trustees v.	403
Pattison's Trustees v. Edinburgh University,	73
Pearson, Lawrie v.	62
Penland, &c. (Gilchrist's Trustees), Gilchrist v.	1118
Piggott v. Governors of Fettes Trust,	199
Ramsay v. Robin, M'Millan, & Co.,	690
Rawyards Coal Co., Mitchell v.	117
Reid (Reid's Executrix) v. Somerville & Co.,	751
Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co.,	653
Robb, Henderson v.	341
Robertson, Jamieson v.	15
Robertson & Sons v. Falconer,	235
Robertson, &c. (Robertson's Trustees) v. Gardner,	705
Robin, M'Millan, & Co., Ramsay v.	690
Rose, Murison, & Thomson v. Gourlay (Wingate, Birrell, & Co.'s Trustee),	1132
Ross v. Cowie (Cowie's Executrix),	224

	Page
Ross v. Keith, - - - - -	86
Ross v. Mackenzie, - - - - -	871
Rossborough's Trustees v. Rossborough, - - - - -	157
Russell's Executors, Aiton v. - - - - -	625
Russell's Trustee, Distillers Company, Limited, v. - - - - -	479
Rutherford, Eckford School Board v. - - - - -	377
Schaw v. Black, - - - - -	336
Scotland, Bank of, Dominion Bank v. - - - - -	1081
Scotland, Bank of, v. Lamont & Co., - - - - -	769
Scott v. Horsbrugh (Scott's Trustee), - - - - -	504, 507
Scott v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited, - - - - -	630
Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited, Scott v. - - - - -	630
Scottish Assurance Corporation, Limited, Shiells v. - - - - -	1014
Scottish Employers' Liability and Accident Assurance Co., Limited, Morrison & Mason v. - - - - -	212
Scottish National Heritable Property Co., Limited, Sim v. - - - - -	583
Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen & Co., - - - - -	112
Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	461
Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Smiles (Surveyor of Taxes), - - - - -	624
Seater, Laming & Co. v. - - - - -	828
Semple v. Wilson, - - - - -	790
Seivwright, Swedish Match Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	989
Seton, Edmonstone, &c. (Lumsden's Trustees) v. - - - - -	1
Shaws, Brand v. - - - - -	315
Shiells v. Scottish Assurance Corporation, Limited, - - - - -	1014
Sim v. Scottish National Heritable Property Co., Limited, - - - - -	583
Simpson v. Boson Oil Co., Limited, - - - - -	391
Simpson, Greig v. - - - - -	18
Simpson v. Jack, - - - - -	131
Smiles, Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. - - - - -	624
Smith v. Highland Railway Co., - - - - -	57
Smith v. M'Bride & Smith, - - - - -	36
Smith & Co. v. Smyth, - - - - -	392
Smyth, Smith & Co. v. - - - - -	392
Somerville & Co., Reid (Reid's Executrix) v. - - - - -	751
South Leith, Inspector of Poor of, Inspector of Poor of Edinburgh City Parish v. - - - - -	18
Steel, &c. (Steel's Trustees) v. Steel, - - - - -	204
Steel Co. of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co., - - - - -	440
Stephen (Stephen's Trustee) v. Jenkins (Macdougall & Co.'s Trustee), - - - - -	779
Stephenson, Ford & Sons v. - - - - -	24
Stewart v. Campbell, - - - - -	346
Stewart v. Highland Railway Co., - - - - -	580
Stewart, Kennedy v. - - - - -	421, 521, 857, 890
Stewart, Martin v. - - - - -	185
Stewart v. North, - - - - -	927
Strachan &c. (Strachan's Trustees) v. Williamson, - - - - -	735
Strang, Bain v. - - - - -	186
Stuart v. Hamilton, - - - - -	1030
Sturrock (Clerk to Police Commissioners of Dalkeith) v. Duke of Buccleuch, - - - - -	575
Sutherland's Trustee v. Geddes (Miller's Trustee), - - - - -	10
Sutherland, Macpherson, &c. (Anderson's Bursary Trustees) v. - - - - -	574
Sutherland, Macrae v. - - - - -	476
Sutton & Co., Ciceri & Co. v. - - - - -	814
Swedish Match Co., Limited, v. Seivwright, - - - - -	989
Tancred, Arrol, & Co., Steel Co. of Scotland v. - - - - -	440
Tawee (Tawee's Executrix), Morrison v. - - - - -	247

INDEX OF NAMES.

xi

	Page
Taxes, Surveyor of, Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v.	624
Taylor v. Union Heritable Securities Co., Limited,	711
Tennent v. Welch (Tennent's Executor),	876
Texas Land and Cattle Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue,	69
Thomson, Jackson, Gourlay, & Taylor v. Lochhead,	373
Thomson v. M'Bain (Thomson's Trustee),	333
Thomson and Others (Thomson's Trustees) v. Thomson,	517
Tod (Sutherland's Trustee) v. Geddes (Miller's Trustee),	10
Trefusis, &c. (Ratepayers of Fordoun), Bruce (Inspector of Poor of Fordoun) v.	568
Trotter v. Happer,	141
Turnbull v. Veitch,	1079
Union Heritable Securities Co., Limited, Taylor v.	711
Veitch, Turnbull v.	1079
Vincent v. Earl of Buchan,	637
Virtue & Co., Limited, Brown v.	987
Wales v. Wales,	164
Walker, &c. (Walker's Trustees), Curriers v.	355
Wallace & Wilson, Cook v.	565
Walter, -	926
Walter, Parnell v.	917
Watson v. Callander Coal Co.,	111
Watt & Wilson, Williams v.	687
Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited,	614
Welch (Tennent's Executor), Tennent v.	876
Welsh v. Eldred & Bignold,	927
Western, &c. (Williams' Trustees), Gordon (Young's Judicial Factor) v.	980
"Westfalia," Owners of the, v. Miller, Brother, & Co.,	599
Whitton, Cuthbert v.	259
Whyte, &c. (Dalglish's Trustees), v. Carritt, &c. (Bannerman's Executors),	559
Whyte v. Murray,	95
Whyte, Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co., Limited, v.	100
Wick and Pulteneytown School Board, Cormack v.	812
Williams' Trustees, Gordon (Young's Judicial Factor) v.	980
Williams v. Watt & Wilson,	687
Williamson, Strachan, &c. (Strachan's Trustees) v.	735
Wilson, Semple v.	790
Wingate (Birrell & Co.'s Trustee), Rose, Murison, & Thomson v.	1132
Woodside Steel and Iron Co., Dick & Stevenson v.	242
Wright & Greig v. Outram & Co.,	1004
Wright, &c. (Wright's Trustees) v. Wright,	677
Wylie & Lochhead v. Hornsby,	907
Yeat's Trustees (Ballfield Colliery Co.) v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.,	535
Young (Young's Executor),	92
Young, &c. (Earl of Dalhousie's Trustees) v. Young,	681
Young's Judicial Factor v. Western, &c. (Williams' Trustees),	980

REGISTRATION APPEAL CASES.

	Page
Dickson, Macdonald v. - - - - -	143
Macdonald v. Dickson, - - - - -	143
M'Guire, Watt v. - - - - -	263
Philip v. Roxburgh, - - - - -	261
Roxburgh, Philip v. - - - - -	261
Watt v. M'Guire, - - - - -	263

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL CASES.

Arbroath, Assessor for, Fraser & Sons v. - - - - -	796
Argyllshire, Assessor for, v. Marquis of Breadalbane, - - - - -	793
Breadalbane, Marquis of, Assessor for Argyllshire v. - - - - -	793
Craigton Cemetery Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, - - - - -	802
Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor for Queensferry, - - - - -	797
Fraser & Sons v. Assessor for Arbroath, - - - - -	796
Lanarkshire, Lower Ward of, Assessor for, Craigton Cemetery Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	802
Leith, Assessor for, Martin (Stewart's Factor) v. - - - - -	799
Martin (Stewart's Factor) v. Assessor for Leith, - - - - -	799
Menzies v. Assessor for Perthshire, - - - - -	805
Perthshire, Assessor for, Menzies v. - - - - -	805
Queensferry, Assessor for, Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. - - - - -	797
Stewart's Factor v. Assessor for Leith, - - - - -	799

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Adams v. Cadenhead, - - - - -	51
Advocate, Her Majesty's, v. Le Bourdais, - - - - -	68
Advocate, Her Majesty's, v. Macleods, - - - - -	1
Advocate, Her Majesty's, v. Parker and Barrie, - - - - -	5
Advocate, Her Majesty's, v. Swan, - - - - -	34
Allan, Grant v. - - - - -	87
Bain, Chalmers (Tay Salmon-Fishery District Board) v. - - - - -	77
Birrell, M'Farlane v. - - - - -	28
Bourdais, Her Majesty's Advocate v. - - - - -	68
Cadenhead, Adams v. - - - - -	51
Cairns v. Linton, - - - - -	81
Campbell, Muir v. - - - - -	20
Carnochan, Ferguson v. - - - - -	93
Chalmers (Tay Salmon-Fishery District Board) v. Bain, - - - - -	77

INDEX OF NAMES.

xiii

	Page
Dewar, Gray v. - - - - -	97
Duncan v. Laing, - - - - -	20
Dunlop v. Weir, - - - - -	14
Falconer, Skene v. - - - - -	72
Ferguson v. Carnochan, - - - - -	93
Galloway v. Weber, - - - - -	46
Grant v. Allan, - - - - -	87
Gray v. Dewar, - - - - -	97
Hoggan v. Wood, - - - - -	95
Kidger v. M'Phee, - - - - -	24
Laing, Duncan v. - - - - -	20
Le Bourdais, Her Majesty's Advocate v. - - - - -	68
Linton, Cairns v. - - - - -	81
M'Farlane v. Birrell, - - - - -	28
M'Guire, Wilson v. - - - - -	89
M'Kenzie v. M'Phee, - - - - -	43, 53
Macleods, Her Majesty's Advocate v. - - - - -	1
M'Phee, Kidger v. - - - - -	24
M'Phee, M'Kenzie v. - - - - -	43, 53
Marsland, Maxwell v. - - - - -	48
Maxwell v. Marsland, - - - - -	48
Muir v. Campbell, - - - - -	20
Parker and Barrie, Her Majesty's Advocate v. - - - - -	5
Skene v. Falconer, - - - - -	72
Swan, Her Majesty's Advocate v. - - - - -	34
Tay Salmon-Fishery District Board v. Bain, - - - - -	77
Thom, Wylie v. - - - - -	90
Weber, Galloway v. - - - - -	46
Weir, Dunlop v. - - - - -	14
Wilson v. M'Guire, - - - - -	89
Wood, Hoggan v. - - - - -	95
Wylie v. Thom, - - - - -	90

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Alison, Hood, &c. (Gregory's Trustees) v. - - - - -	10
Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees, - - - - -	23
Binnie's Trustees, Binnie v. - - - - -	23
Campbell, Scottish Drainage and Improvement Co. v. - - - - -	16
Gregory's Trustees v. Alison, - - - - -	10
Hecla Foundry Co. v. Walker, Hunter, & Co., - - - - -	27
Hood, &c. (Gregory's Trustees) v. Alison, - - - - -	10
Mackill & Co. v. Wright Brothers & Co., - - - - -	1
Meek, Raes v. - - - - -	31
Murray, Hood v. - - - - -	10
Raes v. Meek, - - - - -	31
Scottish Drainage and Improvement Co. v. Campbell, - - - - -	16
Walker, Hunter, & Co., Hecla Foundry Co. v. - - - - -	27
Wright Brothers & Co., Mackill & Co. v. - - - - -	1

ERRATUM.

---

P. 793.—Add Crole as counsel for Marquis of Breadalbane.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS,

1888-89.

ROBERT MACKILL & COMPANY AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Appellants.—

Finlay, Q.C.—Leck.

WRIGHT BROTHERS & COMPANY (Defenders), Respondents.—

J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C.—W. S. Robson.

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

Ship—Charter-party—Guarantee that ship should carry a certain dead-weight—Stowage of machinery and coal—Construction of charter-party with reference to cargo contemplated by the parties.—By a charter-party it was agreed that the vessel should proceed to G, and there load “all such goods and merchandise as the charterers” should tender alongside, “not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry”; that the charterers should pay a lump sum of £2200 for the voyage; that the “owners guarantee that the vessel should carry not less than 2000 tons dead-weight of cargo”; that, “should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead-weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made” from the freight. At the time the charter-party was signed, this unsigned note was written upon its margin with consent of the parties, “including machinery, the largest pieces measure about say,”—the dimensions and weight of twenty-five pieces of machinery being then given.

The charterers tendered 2000 tons of cargo, consisting partly of large pieces of machinery, including, in addition to the twenty-five pieces mentioned in the note, sixty additional pieces of the same description, and partly of coal and of general cargo. In consequence of the large space required by the machinery, which was stowed separately, only 1691 tons were shipped. Had the coals and machinery been stowed together, the vessel would have held the 2000 tons.

In an action for payment of the balance of freight, the charterers claimed deduction in respect of the 309 tons not shipped, on the grounds (1) that by the contract the freight was limited to the dead-weight actually carried, and (2) that the short shipment was due to improper stowage, held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that, as the owners had provided a vessel capable of carrying a dead-weight of 2000 tons, and as the short shipment was not due to improper stowage, but to the charterers providing a cargo more bulky than that contemplated by the parties when they entered into the contract, the charterers were not entitled to any deduction from the full freight.

(In the Court of Session, July 5, 1887, 14 R. 863.)

By charter-party, dated London, 28th May 1886, it was mutually agreed between Robert Mackill & Company, of Glasgow, managing owners of the steamship “Lauderdale” (then at sea), therein described as of 1134 tons nett register and 1738 tons gross register, and Wright Brothers & Company, merchants, of London, inter alia, as follows:—“That the said

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Mac-
naghten.

No. 1. steamship shall, with all convenient speed, proceed to such loading-quay, berth in Glasgow, in such dock as ordered, and there . . . load from the factors of the said charterers all such goods and merchandise as the said charterers or their agents shall tender alongside for shipment (including acids on deck to the extent of ten tons weight if required by charterers), not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle," &c. "The whole of the vessel to be at the disposal, except room for eighty tons extra bunker coal, of the charterers for the conveyance of goods. . . . Owners guarantee that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead-weight of cargo. . . . A regular stevedore and clerks as customary, appointed by the charterers, to be employed by the owners to stow and take account of all goods received on board, with the measurements, &c., to be paid by, and to be under the direction of, the master, who is responsible for improper stowage. . . . Cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at merchants' risk and expense, and being so loaded, shall, on being despatched by charterers, therewith proceed under steam via the Suez Canal to Kurrachee, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same . . . on being paid freight as follows—say, for the use and hire of the said steamer a lump sum of £2200 . . . Should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead-weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made from the first payment of freight."*

In pursuance of the charter-party, Wright Brothers & Company tendered 2000 tons of cargo for shipment, including over and above the twenty-five pieces of machinery specified in the memorandum sixty pieces of large machinery of the same description, two parcels of coal of respectively 100 and 270 tons of dead-weight. The remainder of the cargo was general goods.

The machinery and the coals were stowed in separate holds, and being so stowed, the vessel was able to take on board only 1691 tons of the cargo tendered. Had the machinery and the coals been stowed together so that the coal filled up the interstices of the machinery, the whole 2000 tons tendered could have been loaded. The vessel left Glasgow with only 1691 tons on board.

Wright Brothers paid certain sums to account of freight, but claimed to be entitled to retain from the balance a sum in respect of the 309 tons short shipped.

Mackill & Company and the other owners, on 2d November 1886, brought an action against Wright Brothers & Company for payment of the full balance.

(1) On the construction of the contract, the pursuers, the shipowners, contended that all they had guaranteed was that the vessel should be able to carry a dead-weight of 2000 tons, while the defenders, the charterers, contended that the guarantee was that the vessel should be able to carry 2000 tons of any cargo.

(2) The defenders further contended that the machinery and coals should have been stowed together, and that, on the assumption that it would not have been proper stowage to put the machinery and coals

---

* During the meeting at which the charter-party was signed, the following note, which was not signed, was by consent of both parties written upon its margin :—"Including machinery, the largest pieces measure about say—

10 pieces	25·10 × 9·6 × 4·5	and weighs about 12 tons 12 cwt. each.
10 "	20·10 × 8·1 × 5·1	" " 10 " 6 " "
5 "	36·0 × 3·1 × 1·0	" " 6 " 3 " "

together without the consent of the owners of such cargo, it was the duty of the shipowners to have obtained the consent of the respective owners of the machinery and of the coal. The pursuers disputed both of these contentions.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), after a proof, gave decree against the defenders for the portion of freight for which they admitted liability, and quoad ultra assoilzied them.

The pursuers having reclaimed, the Second Division (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The pursuers appealed.

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question in this case arises on a charter-party dated the 28th of May 1886.

The owners of the screw steamer "Lauderdale" (the appellants) and the charterers (the respondents) agreed upon the face of that document that the "Lauderdale," then on a voyage, should proceed to Glasgow and there load all such goods and merchandise as the charterers or their agents should tender alongside for shipment. The whole of the vessel was to be at the disposal of the charterers except room for eighty tons extra bunker coal.

By the charter-party the owners guaranteed that the vessel should carry not less than 2000 tons dead-weight of cargo. It was also further provided that a regular stevedore and clerks, as customary, to be appointed by the charterers, should be employed by the owners to stow and take account of the goods received on board.

The freight was to be a lump sum of £2200; and it was provided that "should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead-weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made from the first payment of freight."

I have omitted to notice for the moment the marginal note upon the charter-party, with which I propose to deal separately.

The vessel reached Glasgow on the 5th of June 1886. The cargo included machinery consisting of locomotives and tenders, and two parcels of coal of 100 tons and 270 tons respectively. On the loading of the vessel being completed it was found that only 1691 tons of cargo had been shipped.

The respondents maintain that the appellants are responsible for the short shipment, and claim a deduction proportionate to the amount by which the cargo fell short of 2000 tons.

I have very great difficulty in reconciling the somewhat divergent views of the learned Judges below with the conclusion at which they have nevertheless arrived.

The Lord Ordinary in terms finds the owners' guarantee is subject to the implied condition that the charterers shall tender for shipment 2000 tons of cargo of such a description as could to that weight be stowed in the vessel.

His Lordship proceeds to decide against the shipowners apparently upon the ground that the coal should have been stowed as was customary among the machinery in holds 1 and 2, the size and character of the machinery making it inevitable that large spaces would be left unoccupied in the holds where it was stowed.

His Lordship finds as a fact proved that it is quite customary to stow coals among heavy pieces of machinery—provided that the owners or shippers of both coals and machinery consent to this being done. But he further holds that

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

without such consent it is not customary, and would be improper stowage, for the consequences of which the owners would be liable not only at common law, but also under the stipulations of the charter-party in question.

The Lord Ordinary's judgment assumes that—given the machinery which in fact the charterers tendered and the quantity of coal—it would be impossible properly to stow cargo up to the guaranteed amount; this, together with the implied limit which the learned Judge places on the guarantee, would lead to a conclusion the opposite to that at which the learned Judge arrived. But the argument which appears to have decided the learned Judge's view is that the appellants were bound to obtain the consent of the owner of the machinery and of the coals, and as it is admitted they did not obtain it, he holds them liable.

This seems to be a wholly novel principle, and one to which I cannot assent. The charterers are to tender the cargo, and if, as the Lord Ordinary says, the owners' guarantee is subject to the implied condition that the charterers should tender for shipment 2000 tons of cargo of such a description as could to that weight be stowed, it is obvious to ask from what part of this contract am I to infer an obligation upon the part of the shipowners to procure the consents of different owners to that which it is admitted but for such consent would be improper stowage.

I am unable to agree, as I have said, with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, but it is consistent with itself, and if the principle insisted on, namely, the obligation to procure the consents, existed on the part of the owners, I should agree in the conclusion.

I am not so certain that I am able to follow the reasoning of the Lord Justice-Clerk or Lord Young. I find the Lord Justice-Clerk, after describing the cargo, and giving his exposition of the true construction of the guarantee to be that it was a guarantee applying to the capacity and not to the actual fact, points out that "the stevedore acting on his own responsibility put the machinery into one part of the hold of the vessel and the coals into the other. Unquestionably by so doing," he says, "a good deal of space was occupied by the machinery which might have been occupied by ordinary cargo." His Lordship adds: "It appears that the coals might have been packed with the machinery, so as to fill up the interstices of space, but that it does not appear that there was any duty on the stevedore to do it." His Lordship thinks that there was "no sufficient evidence that the stevedore did anything but what was reasonable and right in the stowage, and that such a stowage might be injurious both to the machinery and to the coal." I cannot reconcile this series of propositions.

I can only understand the learned Judge's judgment on the view that the guarantee on its true construction is an absolute guarantee to carry 2000 tons of cargo of whatever kind the cargo may be, and that, inasmuch as in fact the cargo fell short of that amount, the owners are responsible. Such a construction gives no effect to the words "dead-weight."

Lord Young, on the other hand, holds that if the cargo presented can only properly be stowed to the weight of 1600 odd tons, "that does not shew that the vessel is not of the guaranteed dead-weight carrying capacity, because, whatever the dead-weight carrying capacity of a ship may be, it is quite plain that it will not carry any cargo up to that weight. The area of a ship will not permit it."

To this view I entirely assent. The guarantee is the dead-weight carrying capacity, and no one acquainted with ships or mercantile usage could suppose that such a guarantee would involve the obligation to carry any sort of cargo whatsoever up to the guaranteed amount. The guarantee is as to dead-weight. But I so far agree with Lord Young that if it could be truly asserted that both parties were acquainted with the nature of the cargo that was to be carried, it would be unreasonable in construing a mercantile contract of this character not to suppose that both parties used the general language with reference to the particular subject-matter as to which they were contracting, but I fail to see that the learned Judge is justified in holding that this was an ordinary cargo "exactly such as was expected," namely, coals and machinery. I am not quite certain in what sense I am to understand the adverb "exactly," or in a later part of his judgment the words "the very cargo." It seems to me that a serious question would have arisen without the aid of the marginal note, which I have reserved for special treatment: whether the disproportionate excess of bulk over dead-weight would not have been so unreasonable as that the cargo would not, according to the ordinary mercantile understanding of such a contract, have been a reasonable cargo. But the marginal note upon the charter-party, whether part of the contract or not, seems to me to free the question from all doubt. It certainly was information afforded to the shipowners for the purposes of the contract, and I think I may invert the terms of the judgment of Lord Young;—the cargo tendered was not "the very cargo," nor "exactly" such as was expected, as indicated by the marginal note in question. The bulk so far exceeded the proportion of dead-weight that the cargo tendered was not at all the cargo expected and represented in the declared contemplation, and I think the reasoning of the learned Judge should have led to an opposite conclusion.

I only notice for the sake of dismissing a suggestion made in argument before your Lordships, but of which I cannot find any trace in the Courts below, that there was some breach of duty by the shipowners in not informing the charterers as soon as it was ascertained that the ship could not carry to the guaranteed amount with the cargo then being loaded.

I doubt very much whether till the loading was completed, or nearly completed, the shipowners could in fact conjecture how far the loaded cargo would fall short, if at all, of the guaranteed amount, but if they could, it appears to me that those who are responsible for tendering the cargo should have themselves ascertained from time to time what would be the ultimate effect upon the carrying capacity of the vessel of the goods that they were entitled to tender, and which it is manifest the shipowners would have no right to refuse. Such a claim is an entire novelty, for which no authority whatever was advanced, and would certainly be imposing upon the shipowner a new liability recognised by neither lawyers nor merchants up to the present time. I agree entirely with the judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark.

Under these circumstances I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed.

LORD WATSON.—By the contract of affreightment upon which this action is laid the appellants guaranteed that their steamship, the "Lauderdale," would, over and above eighty tons of extra bunker coal, "carry not less than 2000 tons dead-weight of cargo." With reference to that warranty, it was stipulated that, "should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead-weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.

Mackill &amp; Co.

v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

No. 1.
Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

ton to be made from the first payment of freight." The latter clause simply imports that, should the charterers furnish a suitable cargo, within the meaning of the guarantee, and the vessel prove incapable, with proper stowage, of fulfilling it, her owners must allow a deduction from the lump freight, proportioned to the tonnage of cargo short shipped, together with the costs occasioned by their breach of contract.

The construction of the guarantee is attended with more difficulty. The appellants undertake, in common form, to load "all such goods and merchandise as the charterers or their agents shall tender alongside, not exceeding what the vessel can reasonably stow or carry." To hold that the terms in which that obligation is conceived are necessarily conclusive in determining the kind of cargo which comes within the scope of the guarantee, would, in my opinion, neither be consistent with mercantile usage nor with the principles of the law merchant. Business men are in the habit of making shipping contracts in these general terms for the purposes of a particular adventure; and wherever it appears that the precise nature of the cargo which the charterers had in their contemplation to ship was mutually understood, and was in the view of both parties at the time when they contracted, it becomes matter of reasonable inference that such an obligation as is involved in the guarantee given by the appellants was meant to apply only to cargo of that description. Of course no such inference can be admitted when it is inconsistent with the express or implied conditions of the charter-party. But in cases like the present it is competent to investigate the whole facts and circumstances attendant upon the execution of the charter-party, with the view of ascertaining what particular kind of goods, if any, it was then in the contemplation of both parties should be shipped and carried, that being the cargo with reference to which it must be presumed, in the absence of express or implied stipulation to the contrary, that the guarantee was given and accepted.

There is really no conflict of evidence with respect to the mutual understanding of the parties to this appeal, before and at the time when they contracted, regarding the character of the cargo which it was then intended that they should respectively provide and carry. It was to be a general cargo, consisting in part of railway locomotive machinery, some portions of which occupy an extent of stowage room out of all proportion to their dead-weight. During the same meeting at which the charter-party was signed (whether before or after signature does not clearly appear) a note, unauthenticated by their subscription or otherwise, was by consent of both parties written upon its margin, specifying the "largest pieces" of machinery which were to be included in the cargo by number, weight, and measurement. These, as described in the note, were to consist of twenty-five pieces in all, of which twenty appear to have required about 375 tons stowage space, calculated at 40 cubic feet per ton, with an aggregate dead-weight of 229 tons. For the purposes of this case it is not necessary to consider whether the note in question ought to be regarded as pars contractus, or as an unsigned jotting, because in either view it leads practically to the same legal result. Assuming it to be a mere memorandum, it nevertheless amounts to a distinct representation by the charterers that the appellants would not be required under their guarantee to carry more than twenty-five pieces of machinery of the size and character which it describes. That being the case, if the fact that the "Lauderdale" did actually stow and carry only 1690 tons dead-weight of cargo was attributable to the respondents having sent forward large machinery in excess of their representation, their claim to a rateable deduction from freight is as effectually barred as if the representation had been embodied in the contract and made an express condition of the guarantee.

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

It appears from the evidence of the witnesses for the appellants that, over and above the twenty-five pieces specified in the marginal note, there were forwarded for shipment by the respondents, and carried by the "Lauderdale," no less than sixty pieces of large machinery, of the same description, consisting of ten tenders and ten tender frames, weighing about four tons a-piece, the other forty pieces each weighing from two to four tons. That extra machinery was an awkward species of cargo, and if stowed by itself was calculated to interfere seriously with the dead-weight carrying capacity of the ship. When so stowed, the tenders alone must, according to the estimates given by different witnesses, have occupied from 186 to 240 tons of measurement space, in excess of their dead-weight. No attempt was made by the respondents to impugn that testimony, either on cross-examination or in their own evidence.

The respondents, in their statement of facts, allege that, in the list of machinery which they furnished to the appellants for their guidance in loading the vessel, there were included two parcels of 100 and 270 tons of coal respectively, which they intended to be "stowed in odd places beside and among the machinery and locomotives, so as to fill up the spaces between the large pieces, and utilise the ship's space to the best advantage." That was admittedly not done; but they say that it ought to have been done, in accordance with the mercantile usage; and an examination of their record and evidence has satisfied me that they offer no other substantial excuse for having shipped large machinery in excess of their representation. Mr William Wright, one of the partners of the respondents' firm, who went to the ship and found that the coals and machinery had been kept separate, says,—“I was very much surprised at that, because I expected to see the coals stowed amongst the machinery. That was our intention when we ordered the coals”; and he adds that it is “invariably done.” That was obviously the intention and belief of the witness and of his firm; and, at the trial of the cause before the Lord Ordinary, they adduced no less than eight witnesses with the view of proving that the packing of coals amongst machinery is proper stowage. Unfortunately for the respondents, the testimony of their own witnesses disproves their contention. It merely comes to this, that when coals are stowed along with machinery not much harm is done to the latter, but the damage to the coals may be considerable; that coals are frequently stowed in that manner by special arrangement between the parties interested in ship and cargo; and that in such cases it is usual for the ship-owner to allow a deduction from the freight of the coals, varying from 2s. to 3s. per ton, in order to cover damages. It is in vain to represent a practice of that kind, depending upon special agreement, as constituting a proper mercantile custom; and upon this point I agree with the learned Judges in both Courts below, who were all of opinion that loading coals amongst machinery is improper stowage.

By the charter-party the appellants are made responsible to all concerned for improper stowage; but it was suggested in the argument for the respondents, and it appears to have been strongly urged in the Court of Session, that it was the duty of the appellants to obtain permission from the respective owners of the machinery and coals to stow them together. The suggestion appears to me to be utterly unreasonable. I am of opinion with Lord Rutherford Clark that

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

the respondents, if they desired the stowage to be in accordance with their own views, were bound to obtain the requisite permissions from all interested, and to furnish these to the appellants before the proper time arrived for loading the machinery and coals. That they admittedly declined to do, and therefore the cargo must be held to have been properly stowed within the meaning of the contract of affreightment.

There is only one other argument addressed to us on behalf of the respondents which I think it necessary to notice. It was said that whenever it became known to those engaged in loading the ship that she could not, owing to the character of the goods sent forward, carry 2000 tons dead-weight, they were bound to make an intimation to that effect, so as to give the respondents an opportunity of substituting other goods for the extra machinery. But the respondents were fully aware of the terms of their contract, and of the representation which they had made in regard to the larger machinery. In my apprehension, it was for them to consider what amount or description of cargo they would furnish. So long as the goods which they chose to send alongside were capable of being properly stowed and carried, without danger to the ship or her navigation, the appellants could not reject them on the ground that they were not of the precise description contemplated in the guarantee. The appellants might be thereby released, either in whole or in part, from their undertaking to carry 2000 tons dead-weight; but they would not have been justified in refusing to carry any safe and otherwise suitable cargo which the charterers might find it possible or convenient to ship.

I have accordingly come to the conclusion that the so-called failure of the appellants to fulfil their guarantee was due, not to any act of theirs, but to the act of the respondents; and that the judgments appealed from must therefore be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The question turns upon the true construction of a charter-party in some respects peculiar. It is a charter for the hire of a vessel for a lump sum from Glasgow to Kurrachee. It has a note in the margin as to the description of part of the proposed cargo, and it contains this guarantee, "Owners guarantee that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead-weight of cargo." In effect, the charterers say to the owners, "We want a vessel to carry to Kurrachee a general cargo, including parcels of machinery; we give you the dimensions and number of the largest pieces; will your vessel carry 2000 tons dead-weight?" The owners say "It will." That is, I think, something more than a mere guarantee of carrying capacity. It is a guarantee of the vessel's carrying capacity with reference to the contemplated voyage and the description of the cargo proposed to be shipped, so far as that description was made known to the owners.

It is not disputed that the "Lauderdale" possessed a carrying capacity of more than 2000 tons dead-weight.

It is admitted that the "Lauderdale" did not, in fact, carry 2000 tons.

It is admitted that a cargo up to but not in excess of that weight, and consisting partly of machinery and partly of coal and other goods, was tendered by the charterers.

It is not disputed that the cargo so tendered could not have been carried on the "Lauderdale," unless the coal had been packed with the machinery.

Though not admitted by the charterers, it is, I think, clear upon the evidence, and proved even by the testimony of the charterers' witnesses, that it is not proper stowage to pack machinery and coal together. The coal is invariably crushed and injured. The machinery generally suffers too, especially if the coal be damp or the machinery of delicate construction.

No. 1.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Mackill & Co.
v. Wright
Brothers & Co.

Further, it seems to me that the fair result of the evidence is, that in regard to the machinery which was tendered for shipment and shipped, the cargo was not such a cargo as was contemplated by the charter-party. It contained more large pieces; it was more bulky in comparison to its weight, and it was more awkward for stowage than the terms of the charter-party would naturally have led the owners to expect.

These being the material facts of the case, the clause in the charter-party on which the question turns remains to be considered. The charter-party has this provision:—"Should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead-weight, as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata deduction per ton to be made from the first payment of freight."

What is the meaning of this provision? What is the event contemplated? Is it the case of the vessel (1) not actually carrying 2000 tons dead-weight from any cause whatever; or (2) not carrying that weight from any cause not attributable to the charterers?

I think it would be unreasonable to read the provision as allowing abatement in the freight in every case of short-weight. Such a construction would place the shipowners at the mercy of the charterers. They might fill the whole space at their disposal, and yet the cargo might be much under the contemplated weight, and so the shipowners would lose their full freight without any fault on their part.

I think that the provision was intended to have effect in the event of the vessel not carrying the specified weight, assuming the cargo tendered to be such a cargo as was contemplated by the charter-party; that is, an ordinary general cargo, with a fair and reasonable proportion of machinery corresponding as to the largest pieces with the numbers, dimensions, and weights specified in the margin of the charter-party. In other words (to put it most favourably for the charterers), the provision was to come into effect in the event of the vessel not carrying 2000 tons dead-weight from any cause not attributable to the charterers.

I think that the loss of cargo space and the short-weight of the cargo carried on the "Lauderdale" were attributable to the charterers. It was their doing; I do not say it was their fault. They have committed no breach of the charter-party. They were not bound to load a full and complete cargo, and no blame, therefore, in the proper sense of the word, attaches to them. But I do not think that they could take advantage of the stipulation for reduction of freight unless they tendered a cargo of the contemplated description and not in excess of the specified weight. They did tender a cargo of proper weight, but it was not of the contemplated description, and the result was that that cargo could only be stowed on board if stowed improperly. The charterers were at liberty to load the vessel with such goods as they pleased not inconsistent with the intention of the charter-party. They did not take the trouble to avail themselves of the whole space at their disposal. Why should the shipowners be fined for that?

I think that the charterers were altogether wrong in contending that the shipowners ought to have obtained the consent of the owners of the machinery and the consent of the owners of the coal to a method of stowage which would have

No. 1. been improper without the consent of both. I am unable to understand how any obligation of that sort could fall on the shipowners.
 Dec. 18, 1888. It was said that the shipowners placed some coal of their own for which space Mackill & Co. was reserved by the charter-party, among the machinery. But that does not
 v. Wright prove that it was a proper thing to do. The observation seems to be matter of Brothers & Co. recrimination rather than argument.

It was urged by the learned counsel for the respondents that the charterers knew nothing about the vessel except what was told them in the charter-party. After the charter was signed they gave the shipowners in ample time a list of the goods they proposed to ship, specifying weight and dimensions. With this list before him the stevedore, it was said, had as good means of judging whether the whole 2000 tons could be shipped as if the goods had been arranged on the quay alongside. It was contended that the shipowners and the stevedore ought to have prepared a scheme for loading the vessel, and that when it was found that the whole quantity of cargo could not be shipped, the shipowners ought to have communicated with the charterers and given them an opportunity of altering or re-arranging the cargo. Now, that might have been a reasonable course for the owners to have taken; I say nothing to the contrary. But advice unsought is not always welcome, and I am not sure that if any such advice had been given to the charterers they would not have told the shipowners that it was their business to take the cargo and stow it the best way they could. Of course the shipowners knew more about their vessel than the charterers. But the charterers ought to have known more about the cargo they proposed to ship. There is no evidence tending to shew that the vessel was of peculiar construction or different in any respect from what a charterer with the charter-party before him would have been led to expect. I cannot help adding that if the charterers really felt so much in the dark and so helpless as they are now represented to be, it would have been more natural for them to have consulted the shipowners and the stevedore than to have waited for advice, without giving any intimation that advice was expected or that advice would be well received.

Neither the appellants nor the respondents were, I think, conspicuously reasonable. But the respondents were the more unreasonable of the two, and what is more to the purpose, I think they took a wrong view of the construction of the charter-party, and of their own position.

I therefore agree that the appeal ought to be allowed.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed with costs, and cause remitted to Court of Session with directions to give the appellants decree for the sum claimed by them, together with their expenses in the Court of Session.

LOWLESS & Co.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—STIBBARD, GIBSON, & Co.—
 BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.

No. 2. HENRY JOHN HOOD AND ANOTHER (Mrs Gregory's Trustees) (Second Parties), Appellants.—Sir Horace Davey, Q.C.—Murray—Haldane.
 April 8, 1889. SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, BART., AND OTHERS (Fifth Parties), Respondents.
 Gregory's —Rigby, Q.C.—Low.
 Trustees v. Alison.

Succession—Vesting—Destination to "nearest of kin."—In a postnuptial contract of marriage the spouses conveyed "each of them to the other, in case of his or her survivancy, in liferent," and to the children of the marriage in fee, divisible as after mentioned, their whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, it being declared "that the said funds and estate hereby settled upon the children of the present marriage in fee, in manner above mentioned, shall be divisible amongst such children in such shares as their father should appoint, and failing such appointment, equally." The deed further declared, "that in the event of the dissolution of the said marriage by the predecease of any of the said spouses without leaving children, or of the decease of all such children during the lifetime of the survivor," then "it shall be in the power of the said married parties severally to dispose by testament of the proper share of the said funds and effects belonging to the said parties severally, but such disposition not to take effect until the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties, and failing any such disposition, then, and in that case, the said whole funds and estate settled by these presents shall, after the decease of the said parties, suffer division in manner after mentioned—that is to say, the whole funds and estate after mentioned belonging or which may belong to" the husband "shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin," and the wife's property to her nearest of kin.

The husband died without leaving any further deed, and was survived by his widow and by one child. The latter died, leaving one child. Both predeceased the widow.

In a question raised after the widow's death as to the right to the husband's moveable estate, held (rev. judgment of the First Division) (1) that on the husband's death the fee of his moveable estate vested in the only child of the marriage, and that as he was his father's "nearest of kin," in the sense of the deed, his right was not subject to divestiture in the event (which happened) of his predeceasing his mother, the liferentrix.

Observed that the deed being a contract executed in 1840, and not of a testamentary nature, the construction of the words "nearest of kin" was not affected by the passing of the Moveable Succession Act, 1855.

Wannop (Haldane's Trustees) v. Murphy, 9 R. 269, questioned.

(In the Court of Session, 21st Jan. 1887, 14 R. 368.)

The second parties, the trustees and executors of Mrs Gregory, appealed.

The fifth parties alone appeared as respondents.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, this appeal depends upon the construction of a destination by the late Dr William Gregory, which occurs in a postnuptial contract between him and the deceased Mrs Lisette Scott or Gregory, executed in March 1840. The spouses thereby conveyed, each to the other in the event of his or her surviving in liferent, and to the children of the marriage in fee, certain funds and estate specially described, and in general, the whole estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to them or which might be acquired by them during the subsistence of the marriage. Power was given to Dr Gregory to apportion the fee amongst the children; and failing appointment by him it was declared that they should take share and share alike. Two declarations are added, the first of which reserves power to the spouses severally to dispose of their own estate by testament, to take effect at the death of the longest liver, in the events either of there being no children of the marriage alive at the death of the predeceaser, or of children then existing but dying in the lifetime of the survivor. The second provides that, in the same events, and failing such disposition by will, the whole estates settled shall, on the expiry of the survivor's liferent, "suffer division in manner after mentioned, that is to say, the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging or which may belong to the said Dr William Gregory shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin; and the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging to or which may belong to the said Mrs Lisette Scott or Gregory shall fall to and become the property of her own nearest of kin."

No. 2.

April 8, 1889.
Gregory's
Trustees v.
Alison.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Mac-
naghten.

No. 2.

April 8, 1889.
Gregory's
Trustees v.
Alison.

Dr Gregory died in 1858 survived by his widow and by one child of their marriage, James Liebig Gregory, who died in 1863, leaving an infant son, Henry, born in November 1862. The estate specifically conveyed by Dr Gregory consisted of moveables; but in the year 1848 he purchased with his own funds (whether acquired before or after the date of the postnuptial contract does not appear) certain heritable subjects in Princes Street, Edinburgh, at the price of £2275. The liferentrix, who had made up a title to these subjects upon the assumption that the deed of 1840 gave her a right of fee, sold them in 1877 for £7500. In consequence of objections taken by the purchasers to the validity of her title, an arrangement was come to by which she executed a disposition in their favour, with the consent and concurrence of her grandson Henry, then a minor (who subsequently expedite a title through his father James Liebig Gregory), and the price was invested in the names of three gentlemen, who granted a declaration of trust, acknowledging that they held the money as a surrogatum for the subjects sold, to be applied in terms of the destination and conditions in the postnuptial contract. Henry Gregory died in 1881 unmarried and in minority, leaving a settlement by which he bequeathed to his grandmother his whole right and interest in and to the trust-fund of £7500.

Mrs Gregory died in May 1885, when the fund in question was claimed by various parties. In order to ascertain judicially which of them had the best right to it, a special case was presented to the Court of Session by (1) trustees of the fund, who are mere stakeholders; (2) the testamentary trustees of Mrs Gregory; (3) the heirs in heritage of Dr Gregory, and also of Henry Gregory, as at the death of the liferentrix; (4) the representatives of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Gregory, who was the heir-at-law ab intestato of Henry Gregory; and (5) the next of kin of Dr Gregory as at the time of his widow's death. A majority of the First Division, consisting of the Lord President Inglis, with Lords Mure and Adam, dissentiente Lord Shand, by interlocutor dated the 21st January 1887, preferred the parties of the fifth part, who are the only respondents appearing in this appeal, the appellants being the trustees of Mrs Gregory, the parties of the second part, who claim the fund as personal estate of Henry Gregory, which was carried to their author by his mortis causa settlement.

The conveyance of Dr Gregory's estate was, according to its terms, to take effect at his death, and there being a direct destination of the fee to children necessarily natis, and not nascituris, I think it vested in James Liebig Gregory upon his father's decease. In considering the quality of the interest which then vested in him, the power reserved to Dr Gregory to make another disposition of his estate in the events which have since occurred need not be taken into account. In Balderston and Fulton (Jan. 23, 1857, 19 D. 293) it was held that the existence of such a power does not impede vesting, and in the present case it was never exercised by Dr Gregory, and expired with him. Whether James Liebig Gregory took a right of property, absolute or subject to defeasance, must depend upon the terms of the second declaration. He was the nearest of blood to his father in both lines of succession at the death of the latter in 1858, and if he was also "nearest of kin" within the meaning of the deed, he became the absolute owner of the estate conveyed by Dr Gregory. If, on the other hand, the words "nearest of kin" be taken to represent a class ascertainable at the death of the liferentrix, and therefore exclusive of the settler's descendants, the fee which vested in him and his issue was subject to divestiture, and became divested by their failure in the lifetime of Mrs Gregory.

No. 2.

April 8, 1889.
 Gregory's
 Trustees v.
 Alison.

So long as the old law governing the descent of personal estate remained unaltered, the term "nearest of kin" and equivalent expressions were used to designate the class of blood relations entitled to the moveable succession of an intestate. That succession belonged, as stated by Lord Stair (III 8, 31), "to the nearest of kin, who are the defunct's whole agnates, male or female, being the kinsmen of the father's side, of the nearest degree, without primogeniture or right of representation; wherein those joined to the defunct by both bloods do exclude the agnates by one blood." In the common law of Scotland next of kin and heirs in mobilibus meant one and the same thing, but another meaning might of course be impressed upon the term next of kin, occurring in a written instrument, if the context shewed, either expressly or by reasonable implication, that the testator or settler used it in a different sense. Thus, in Connell v. Grierson (Feb. 14, 1867, 5 Macph. 379), where the succession to a landed estate held under a deed of entail feudalised in 1782 devolved in the year 1863, in terms of the ultimate substitution, upon the entailor's "own nearest of kin and their heirs and assignees and disponees whomsoever," the Court, having regard to the whole tenor and objects of the deed, were of opinion that the entailor meant by these words to describe his nearest blood relation in the line of heritable succession, and they accordingly gave the estate to his heir of line, in preference to an agnate who was one degree nearer in blood. Again, in Scott v. Scott (14 D. 1057), a testator directed the residue of his trust-estate to be paid over to his "nearest relations," and the Second Division held that the settlement contained sufficient indications of his intention to include in that term nephews and nieces of the half as well as of the full blood. In affirming the judgment the Lord Chancellor (Cranworth) (2 Macq. 281<sup>1</sup>) said,—"If, indeed, the words of his will had been merely that the testator gave the residue to his nearest relations without more, no doubt the words would, according to the law of Scotland, mean those persons who would have taken in the event of his intestacy. But here the question is not who would take in the event of intestacy, because the testator has been his own interpreter of what he intended."

The Act 18 and 19 Vict. cap. 23, altered the rule of moveable succession by admitting representation among descendants, and in the collateral line among brothers and sisters and their descendants, and also by giving a share to the father, and in the case of his predecease, to the mother of an intestate dying without issue. But the term "next of kin" is still used in that statute to denote those persons who would have been the legal heirs of the intestate under the old law; and it expressly reserves to them exclusive right to the office of executor, in competition with children or remoter descendants of persons who would have been next of kin if they had survived the intestate. The effect which these enactments may have upon the significance of the words "nearest of kin" was recently discussed by the learned Judges of the First Division in Young's Trustees v. James (Dec. 10, 1880, 8 R. 242), but the circumstances of the case made it unnecessary to give any decision on the point. One thing is clear, that the expression is no longer equivalent to legal heirs in mobilibus, inasmuch as it does not include all the members of that class. It appears to me, however, that, in its legal sense, the expression is still applicable to those members of the class who would have been the sole heirs before the passing of the Act, and are now preferably

<sup>1</sup> Scott v. Scott, May 10, 1855, Paters. Ap. 507, 27 Scot. Jur. 372.

No. 2.

April 8, 1889.
Gregory's
Trustees v.
Alison.

entitled to administer the succession of the intestate. There may be a question whether and how far the surviving parent of a defunct ought to be regarded as one of his next of kin. Upon that point, which does not arise in this case, I express no opinion.

Of the three learned Judges constituting the majority in the Court below one only relies upon the case of Wannop v. Murphy (Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269), which was decided in 1881 by a bench of seven Judges. Lord Adam no doubt considered himself bound by that decision, which, if well founded, appears to me to be a direct authority for the judgment now appealed from. In that case a testatrix who died in 1877 directed her trustees to pay the whole income of the residue of her estate equally to and between her nieces A and B during their lifetime, and on their deaths, to convey one half of the capital to the children of A, and the other half to the children of B, declaring that it should be in the power of the trustees to delay the division until the children attained the age of twenty-two, they receiving the free income in the meantime. In the event of A and B dying without issue, or of such issue predeceasing the last mentioned period of division, the trustees were directed to pay and convey the residue to and among the truster's "own nearest heirs in moveables whomsoever, the division always being per stirpes and not per capita." A and B both died without having had issue. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) with Lords Deas, Young, and Craighill, held, in these circumstances,—(1) That no interest vested in the heirs whatsoever of the testatrix before the period of distribution; and (2) that these heirs were a class to be ascertained as at that period, and not as at her death, and decree was pronounced in accordance with their opinions. The Lord President (Ingليس) and also Lords Mure and Shand, dissented from the judgment, being of opinion—(1) That the residue vested a morte testatoris in the heirs called by the ultimate destination, subject to defeasance to the extent of one half in the event of A having issue, and to the extent of the other half in the event of B having issue; and (2) that A and B the liferentrics, being among the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix at the time of her death, each took a share of the capital, which passed to their representatives. Upon both these points I concur in the opinion of the minority. I cannot reconcile the judgment of the majority upon the first point with the decision of this House in Taylor v. Gilbert, July 12, 1878 (L. R. 3 App. Ca. 1287, 5 R. (H. L.) 217), and, upon the second, with its decisions in Bullock v. Downes, July 24, 1840 (9 Clark, H. L. Ca. 1) and Mortimore v. Mortimore, May 15, 1879, (L. R. 4 App. Ca. 488). These last were not Scotch cases, but in neither did the judgment of the House proceed upon any specialty of English law, and the canon of construction which they recognise appears to me to be applicable to the language of a Scotch deed, which has not acquired technical significance, and falls to be construed according to the intention of the maker. The rule, as I understand it, is simply this, that in cases where a testator or settler in order to define the persons to whom he is making a gift, employs language commonly descriptive of a class ascertainable at the time of his own death, he must prima facie, and in the absence of expressions indicating a different intention, be understood to refer to that period for the selection of the persons whom he means to favour. In my opinion, the rule has no other effect than to attribute to the words used their natural and primary meaning, unless that meaning is displaced by the context.

In the present case I do not think it necessary to consider what would have been the result of attributing to the expression "nearest of kin" the meaning which it may be taken to have borne since the Act of 1855 became law. The deed which we have to construe is not a will which might be held to speak as at the decease of Dr Gregory. So far as the interests of children of the marriage are concerned, it is, in substance as well as form, a mutual contract; and its pactional provisions must be construed now in the same sense in which they were understood by the contracting parties at the time of its execution in 1840. I cannot conceive that they meant the class whom they then preferred to vary with subsequent alterations in the law of intestacy. Their deed of contract contains no invocation of intestacy, in the proper sense of the word. Dr Gregory's estate is not left to descend ab intestato, but the then existing law is referred to for the purpose of describing the persons who are to take provisione hominis. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that his "~~nearest of kin~~," within the meaning of the deed, are the same person or persons to whom the law prevailing in 1840 would have assigned his intestate moveable succession at the time of his death in 1858. I can find nothing adverse to that interpretation of the deed, unless it be the suggestion that it is improbable the spouses should have intended to make a direct conveyance to their children, and also to include them in the destination to their "nearest of kin." That is a kind of probability which has frequently been put forward without success in cases of this description; and whenever it is, as here, unsupported by the context, it can only afford material for conjecture.

In the course of the argument it was pointed out that, in the event of your Lordships holding that the subject of this litigation vested absolutely in James Liebig Gregory at the time of his father's death, that would reopen a question between the present appellants and the parties of the fourth part, who represent the heir of line of his son Henry. They claim upon the footing that the trust-fund was heritable in the person of Henry, who died in minority, and did not pass by his will. They were called as respondents, but did not appear by counsel, and it was not against their interest that the interlocutor under appeal should be reversed. Had I not, on consideration, been of opinion that their claim is untenable, I should have thought it advisable either to give them an opportunity of being heard for their interest before disposing of the appeal or to remit the cause. But it has long been settled that a minor pubes can dispose of his heritable estate with the effect of altering his succession by an onerous contract of sale. It remains open to him, or to his heir-at-law, to set aside the transaction intra quadriennium utile on proving that it was to the enorm lesion of the minor. But the period limited for such challenge has run out, and the sale of 1877 is now as valid as if Henry Gregory had been of full age at the time. The terms of the trust, under which the price is still held, were intended for the protection of contingent interests which might be set up under the deed of 1840, and cannot affect the rights inter se of Henry Gregory's representatives.

For these reasons I am of opinion that your Lordships ought to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, and to declare that the appellants, the parties of the second part, are entitled to the whole funds held in trust by the parties of the first part, and I move accordingly.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion which has just been delivered by the noble and learned Lord, and I desire to add nothing to what he has said.

No. 2.

April 8, 1889.
Gregory's
Trustees v.
Alison.

No. 2.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I also desire to express my entire concurrence in the opinion of my noble and learned friend.

April 8, 1889.
Gregory's
Trustees v.
Alison.

INTERLOCUTOR, so far as appealed from, reversed: Declared that the appellants, the parties of the second part, are entitled to the whole funds held in trust by the parties of the first part.

LEE & PEMBERTON—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—HANBURY & WHITTING—
J. S. & J. W. FRASER TYTLER, W.S.

No. 3.

SCOTTISH DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT COMPANY (Pursuers), Appellants.

—Asher, Q.C.—Sir Horace Davey, Q.C.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

REV. J. P. CAMPBELL (Defender), Respondent.—Rigby, Q.C.—J. Wallace.

Statute—Construction of private Act—Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. lxx.)—Right in security—Personal action.—Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Act, 1856, imposes no personal liability upon a landowner to whom advances are made under the Act, and that a personal action against such landowner for payment of the annual rent charge is incompetent.

Observed per Lord Herschell that when a private Act is obtained by a company incorporated for purposes of profit, to confer upon them rights and powers which they would not have at common law, the provisions of such a statute must be somewhat jealously scrutinised, and that they ought not to be held to possess any right unless it be given in plain terms, or arises as a necessary inference from the language used.

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.
Ld. Fitzgerald.

(IN the Court of Session, Dec. 2, 1887, 15 R. 108.)

The pursuers appealed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The only question that arises upon this appeal is whether the appellants can maintain a personal action against the respondent in respect of his occupation of certain land over which they have obtained a charge. That charge has been obtained by reason of an advance made in pursuance of the provisions of the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company's Act, 1856, under which a limited owner is enabled to obtain an advance for the improvement of his land and, by pursuing the course there prescribed, to give a charge upon the land which binds it in the hands of his successors.

The 52d section of the Act provides that "when the fee of any land is, in pursuance of this Act, charged with any money, the company shall be entitled to, and shall have from the time from which such rent-charge shall commence and take effect a charge upon such land for the money ascertained and approved by the Commissioners as aforesaid,"—that is, the Inclosure Commissioners, whose assent must be obtained in order to create a valid charge under the Act. The section further provides that "such lands shall thenceforth be and continue liable to the payment of such charge," and it gives the charge priority, speaking generally, over all other charges. It, therefore, in terms not merely creates a charge upon the land, but provides that the land is to be liable for the payment of the charge. So far as that section is concerned it is obvious that there can be no question of the creation of any personal liability, and, if that provision stood alone, it is conceded on the part of the appellants that the only remedy of the Drainage Company must be by real diligence,—that is to say, by proceeding according to Scotch law for recovery of the payments, to be made out of the land.

But the appellants place reliance upon the 61st section of the company's Act as giving them the right to enforce the liability personally which they claim by this action to enforce against the respondent. Before applying myself to the terms of that section, I desire to say that when an Act of this description is obtained by a company, incorporated for purposes of profit, to confer upon them rights and powers which they would not have at common law, the provisions of such a statute must be somewhat jealously scrutinized, and I think that they ought not to be held to possess any right unless it be given in plain terms or arises as a necessary inference from the language used. The 61st section does not in terms create any personal liability. The appellants seek to infer that liability solely from the nature of the remedy which that section gives to the company. The section provides that "every charge on land by virtue of this Act may be recovered by the company" "by the same means and in like manner in all respects as any feu-duties, or rent, or annualrent, or other payment out of the same lands would be recoverable in Scotland." Now, it is said that that provision was unnecessary if the only effect of it was to enable the appellants to enforce a charge by real diligence. I do not stop to inquire whether that view be correct or not. I think it is only natural, even if the Court would have inferred such a right from the mere creation of the charge, that the right should be given in express terms when what was being created was a charge of this peculiar character,—a charge which was created pursuant to these statutory provisions. However that may be, I think it clear that the language of this section is, at least primarily, directed to the mode of recovering the charge itself out of the land.

No. 3.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

The contention of the appellants rested mainly upon the provision relating to the recovery of feu-duties. It was said that feu-duties are recoverable not only by real diligence but also by a personal action against the original vassal or against any person who subsequently comes into occupation of the land in terms of the feu-charter, and that inasmuch as this section provided that the charge might be recovered "by the same means and in like manner in all respects as any feu-duties out of the same lands," that by implication must mean that the same kind of personal action which the superior would have against any person in occupation as his vassal was intended by this Act to be possessed by the Drainage Company against the person in occupation of the land over which the charge was created.

Now, I think that the language of the Act does not necessarily, and does not even naturally, bear such a construction. It is obvious that the words "feu-duties, or rent, or annualrent, or other payment out of the same lands" are all coupled together, and the use of the word "other" before the word "payment" indicates clearly that the Legislature is speaking of "feu-duties, or rent, or annualrent" in relation to their being "payments out of the land." They are bound together by that common character that they are all obligations for payment out of the land, and it is only in so far as they are payments out of or would be recoverable as payments out of "the same lands" that they are made recoverable in the case of this particular charge; because they are to be recoverable by the same means, and in like manner in all respects, as feu-duties or other payments out of the same lands. And what is made recoverable? The provision in respect of recovery has relation to a "charge on land." It is only in respect of its being a charge that it is made recoverable in the same way as feu-duties or other payments out of the land.

Those words are perfectly apt to confer upon the company, for the enforcement of that charge to which the land has been in terms rendered liable, every

No. 3.

June 24, 1889.
 Scottish
 Drainage and Improvement
 Co. v. Camp-
 bell.

mode of recovery, every mode of real diligence, which was open for the enforcement of any of these other payments which were charges upon the land in respect of their being payments out of the land. Is it possible to say that beyond those rights there has been conferred upon the company a right to enforce a personal liability? No doubt personal liability may be enforced, as regards feu-duties, not only against the original vassal, but also against any occupier taking subsequently under the feu-charter. But if such a liability be enforceable, it does not arise by reason of the charge upon the land, it is not a mode of enforcing the payment out of the land, but it is a mode of enforcing a personal obligation which comes into existence owing to the creation of the relation of superior and vassal, or, it may be said, owing to the covenant for payment which arises from the original feu-charter running with the land, and passing to the person who afterwards takes the land from the original vassal. In whatever light it is to be regarded, that certainly is the enforcement either of a contractual or of a quasi-contractual obligation. Now, here there is no such original liability created at all in respect of the payment—it is never made anything except a charge upon the land; and there is certainly no such relation created between the Drainage Company and the occupier from time to time of the land as is created between the feuar and his vassal, or the person representing the feuar and any subsequent vassal.

I have dealt principally with the words “feu-duties,” which are here used, because those were most relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants; but I do not think that the other words render the case any stronger in the direction of his contention. On the contrary, as was pointed out by Lord M'Laren, if you are to regard these words as implying personal liability, the person who would become, upon the death of an occupier, liable to these payments would not in all cases be the same.<sup>1</sup> In the case of rent it might be the executor, in the case of feu-duty the successor; and consequently it would involve one in very considerable difficulties if he were to say that this clause, which only relates to the mode of recovery, also determines the person against whom the recovery is to be had; because the contention of the appellants is and must be not merely that this section in effect says that there shall be a personal action in respect of this liability, but that it also determines against whom that personal action can be maintained, namely, the person in occupation in succession to the original occupier, or the occupier for the time being.

Therefore, upon the construction of section 61, I am unable to find anything which by necessary inference confers upon the company a right which undoubtedly is not conferred upon them anywhere in terms, or creates a personal liability which undoubtedly there is no language expressly to create.

Certain other sections of the Act were relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants as throwing light upon the section with which I have been dealing—those were principally sections 68 and 69. The 68th section contains a provision in the first instance dealing with the liability to this charge as between persons becoming in succession entitled to the land upon which the charge is created; and then it has a proviso, I admit, of a somewhat singular character: “Provided that any such person entitled to succeed and becoming entitled in possession shall not be liable to pay any arrears of the charge remaining unpaid at the time of his succession or right to succeed exceeding the amount of one year's payment of such charge." Now, it is said that this, by implication, No. 3.

<sup>1</sup> 15 R., note at p. 110.

shows that the person succeeding was to be personally liable for one year's arrears.

(It was admitted that if you were to take the analogy of feu-duties the successor would not be liable for the arrears in any personal action.) There is no creation, in terms, of such liability. The argument was this—you must infer from these words that the Legislature created a liability as to one year's arrears, and therefore it could hardly be supposed that it was not intended by the other section to make the successor liable in respect of his occupation of the land for payments which became due during the time of his occupation. Whatever may be the meaning of this section, such an argument appears to me to be somewhat far-fetched. It cannot be put higher than this, that if that construction be correct it would render it probable that the Legislature would have made a provision creating a personal liability. We cannot from any such suggestion of probability come to the conclusion that a right has been given and a liability imposed which we do not find in the words which are said to create or impose it.

Then the 69th section undoubtedly speaks of "the person for the time being bound to pay the yearly or other periodical payments of such charge." I say again, with regard to that clause, that it is not possible, whatever may be the meaning of those words, and however they may have come to be used, to derive from them such assistance in construing the other section as to find in it the imposition of a liability which the words are not, I think, apt to create.

There is one other provision, to which I drew attention in the course of the argument, which I think is not without importance. By the 59th section of the original Act it is provided that, "if any charge payable under this Act to the company shall be in arrear, the same shall not bear interest for a longer period than six months," but that it shall for that period bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. By the later Act amending the company's original Act, namely, the Act of 1860,* that provision was modified to this extent, that if there were not upon the land charged sufficient to answer and satisfy the arrears and interest for the period of six calendar months, then the arrears should continue to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent until payment or satisfaction, and such interest might be recovered in the same manner as the sum in arrear. Now, if the only remedy were against the land, that provision would be perfectly intelligible, and by no means unreasonable; but looking at the provisions in the earlier Act and its manifest purpose, it seems to me that it would be very strange if, because there was not enough upon the land to enable the company to enforce to the full extent their charge, they should therefore be allowed to permit the payments to run into arrear, and interest on these arrears to run, enforceable (interest as well as arrears) at any subsequent time, at all events until barred by some Statute of Limitations, against the occupier of the land. I think, therefore, that this points in the opposite direction. I do not lay great stress upon it, but looking at the other parts of the Act as well as section 61, it certainly appears to me that they do not all point in the same direction, and that the safer course is to limit ourselves really to the interpretation of the only section which it can be contended confers the right which the appellants are now seeking to enforce.

Upon these grounds I think that the judgment of the Court below was right, and I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

* 23 and 24 Vict. c. clxx. sec. 12.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

No. 3.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

LORD WATSON.—Notwithstanding the able and ingenious argument of Mr Asher, I have been unable to discover any good ground for disturbing the judgment of the Court below.

There are two sets of clauses in these statutes which require to be attended to, the first constituting as the debt the money advanced by the company for the purpose of drainage or improvements; and the second prescribing the remedies by which that debt is to be recovered by the company. As to the construction of the first set of clauses there is no controversy—their terms are perfectly plain—they declare the money advanced in terms of the Act to be a charge upon the estate, and raise no personal liability either against the representatives of the original borrower or against his successor in the lands drained or improved. The controversy is confined to the 61st section of the statute. It is said that the effect of that clause is to attach to the debitum fundi not only the remedies which are ordinarily competent by the law of Scotland in such a case, but also the remedies which are applicable to a mere personal debt.

Now, I think that, in construing the clause, it is necessary to keep in view the fact that a personal action is not an action for the recovery of a charge upon land. It is a misnomer, a contradiction in terms, to say that a creditor is recovering a charge upon land when he brings a personal action of debt for the purpose of obtaining a decree under which he can recover payment out of any part of the debtor's estate, or (at the time when these Acts were passed) by his incarceration. In the same way, a sum recovered under a personal contract or obligation is in no sense a sum recovered out of land or a payment out of land. So also in the case of a feu-duty. When the superior sues on the express personal contract which is contained in the writs constituting the feudal relation between him and his vassal, he does not seek to attach the land or the accessories of the land. The same is true of "rent or annualrent," when in addition to its being made a charge upon the land it is matter of personal stipulation between the parties that the executors or successors of the owner or landlord shall be liable.

It is unnecessary for me, after the observations which have been made by the noble and learned Lord in the chair, to say anything further upon the terms of the 61st clause. I may say in a single word that the only remedies which it appears to me to give to the company are the remedies applicable to feu-duties, rent, and annualrent, in so far as these are charges upon land or payments out of land, and not in so far as they are matters of personal contract.

LORD FITZGERALD.—At the close of the address of Mr Asher I was in considerable doubt, possibly created by an impression that the pursuers ought to have judgment on the merits. There is no doubt as to the existence of the debt; there is no doubt as to its being a charge upon the land; and there is no question that the present incumbent of the parish, who has succeeded to the reverend gentleman who procured this loan, is in possession of the thing charged and in receipt of the rents and profits. It did seem to me at first to be a very strong thing to say that the company should have no personal remedy against this present incumbent (in respect of the profits he has received) but must resort to the land and the land only. However, we are dealing now not with a public but a private Act of Parliament, and I have always understood, with reference to private Acts as contradistinguished from public Acts of Parliament, that if a charge is imposed upon the person of an individual it must be so imposed in clear and express terms and not left to implication.

The original Act of 1856 seems to have been prepared with very considerable care, and I would say with a due regard to the rights and interest of others. But, after all, the language of this Act is the language of the Drainage Company. I presume they had no opponents. The Act presents the language of the company and of the company alone.

No. 3.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

Now, it has been already observed that all through this Act until you come to the 61st section there is no doubt that the Legislature is dealing only with a charge upon land, a real security, which by no means imports a personal obligation. One may further observe, too, that before a loan under this Act of Parliament is sanctioned an inquiry is made, and it is only sanctioned by the Commissioners when they are satisfied that there is to be a permanent and real improvement of the land commensurate with the sum to be advanced, and with the annuity with which the land would thereupon become charged.

The Act being for the improvement and reclamation of land deals with public improvements as well as private improvements, and as to some of the classes of improvements it would be exceedingly difficult either to import a personal obligation, or to ascertain against whom it was to be enforced. I may refer for instance to the 4th section of the Act, and to the 12th class of improvements referred to in it, namely,—“The construction or improvement of jetties or landing-places on the sea coast or on the banks of navigable rivers or lakes, for the transport of cattle, sheep, or other agricultural stock and produce.” It would appear to me in reference to these words that it would be difficult to ascertain where the personal responsibility could rest if it was intended to be imposed. But proceeding further on we find that the company is to be incorporated. What powers is the company to have? Such powers and authorities as by this Act are granted, and none other.

The provisional contract deals with the sum to be charged as “an improvement loan on such land” (sec. 33); and the charging section (sec. 49) makes it a charge on the fee of the land, and to take effect as such charge, and so far no allusion is made to any personal liability save in sec. 37, but that section, so far from importing any personal liability beyond its express provision, seems to me to negative it, for according to that section “the Inclosure Commissioners may require security by bond or otherwise” from the parties making the application, for the payment of the expenses; and if they do not grant a provisional order, “such payment shall be made by such landowner or by the company, and shall not be a charge on the land to which such application relates.” That provision dealing with personal liability does not support the contention of the pursuers.

If there was nothing further in the statute, it is clear that the party would be left to the enforcement of his charge upon the land, and that alone. Possibly he would have been in a better position without the aid of sec. 61, for then the law might step in and provide him with some adequate remedy if it were not given by the Act. But sec. 61 gives a remedy, and when a remedy is given by an Act of Parliament of this kind you must pursue that remedy.

Then, referring to sec. 61, upon which the argument principally turned, what does it do? The thing to be recovered, with which it deals, is a “charge on land by virtue of this Act.” It provides for the means and manner by which that liability of the land may be enforced, but it uses no words or terms whatever to indicate that any mere personal liability is cast on either the landowner or his successor in title or in occupation, or that he shall be liable in respect of or to the extent of profits received. Two things are referred to, the charge on

No. 3.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

the lands, and the recovery of it out of the same lands, which is to be "by the same means and in like manner in all respects as any feu-duties or rent, or annualrent, or other payment out of the same lands would be recoverable in Scotland."

We were very much pressed by Mr Asher with this argument, that the 61st section did refer to an action "in like manner in all respects as any feu-duties" might be recovered by; and he called our attention to this circumstance, that in certain instances feu-duties were recoverable by what might be termed a personal action. But that was only in cases in which the superior sued upon the obligation of an express contract of the vassal for the payment of the feu-duty.

I do not mean to say that the original contract between the company and the applicant might not possibly have been so framed as to give them a right to resort to his personal security. I express no opinion upon that, but I observe that in this case there is nothing urged in the summons or its conclusions to shew any personal liability in respect of contract or in respect of the receipt of rents or profits of the land.

My noble and learned friend in the chair has referred to sec. 68, but that section creates no real difficulty, for it only determines as between the land-owner and his successor their respective rights; and if his successor should be compelled, in respect of the land, to pay "one year's payment of such charge" in arrear, which his predecessor ought to have paid, then he has a personal right to recover it from his predecessor.

After four years' trial of this Act of Parliament there came an amending Act; and there are some provisions in the amending Act which are deserving of observation. Sec. 4 contains the same definition of improvements or even a larger one than had been in the original Act, and the 13th subsection of that section is applicable to "the construction or improvement of jetties or landing-places on the sea coast or on the banks of navigable rivers or lakes." Then, by sec. 11, when the land to which the application for a provisional order relates is land held in right of any church, the advance cannot be made without the consent of the presbytery of the bounds and the patron of the benefice. Sec. 13, which is not unimportant, provides for fire insurance. "Where any farm-houses, farm-buildings, or works susceptible of damage by fire have been erected, improved, or added to" under these Acts, fire insurance is to be effected—"the person for the time being bound to make the yearly or other periodical payments of such charge shall insure and keep insured against damage by fire all such farm-houses," and so on, and in the event of his not doing so "it shall be lawful for the company, with the assent of the Inclosure Commissioners, to insure against damage by fire the said farm-houses, farm-buildings, and works in an amount not exceeding the principal amount originally secured by such charge"—the company may pay the premium, and he is bound to "repay to the company" (and here a personal right is given) "any sums so paid by them" in respect of premiums on fire insurance.

Now, when we are dealing with this amending Act it is not unworthy of observation that the only reference in it to any personal obligation is the obligation to keep up the fire-insurance premium, and if that is not done by the person in possession the company may pay it, and then, and then only, they have a personal right to sue, not for the charge, but for the sum paid in respect of fire insurance.

Both these Acts of Parliament were no doubt very beneficial for their purposes; they gave a security charged only upon the land without any words which would import a personal obligation either upon the part of the original borrower or of the landowner in succession, or, in the case of an advance upon glebe land, which would make either the original incumbent or the next incumbent personally liable. Whilst I feel coerced to agree with the motion which is to be presently put from the chair that the decision of the Court below be affirmed, I do so somewhat unwillingly. If there is any property which would require for improvement purposes the aid of an advance of money upon such easy terms as are provided by this Act, it would be such property as glebe lands and residences. I presume that this case is not defended by the present respondent merely in his own interest—probably he may be supposed to represent the interests of a large class; and I see this very clearly, that after the decision of this appeal it will be difficult, if not impracticable, to obtain from the Drainage Company advances of money upon such a security as the present.

I concur in the judgment which has been proposed, affirming the decision of the Court of Session, and dismissing the appeal.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—JOHN GRAHAM—MENZIES, COVENTRY, & BLACK, W.S.

No. 3.

June 24, 1889.
Scottish
Drainage and Improvement
Co. v. Campbell.

WILLIAM BINNIE (Pursuer), Appellant.—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.
DAVID BROOM AND OTHERS (Binnie's Trustees) (Defenders), Respondents.
—Lord Adv. Robertson—Shiress Will, Q.C.

No. 4.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

Process—Proof.—In an action of damages brought by the beneficiaries under a trust-settlement against the trustees the pursuers averred that in 1857 and 1858 when the trustees entered upon office, the testator's heritable property might have been sold for £42,980, which was sufficient to pay the testator's debts and leave a surplus of £17,000; that instead of selling, the trustees had borrowed £26,000 on the security of the heritage, and that the result was that the trust-estate had proved insufficient to pay debts.

The Court remitted to an accountant "to inquire into the amount of the trust-estate from the date of the truster's death, the amount of debts due by the truster and paid by the trustees, and the yearly income and expenditure of the trust, and to report." The accountant reported valuations of the heritage at various dates, and the Court, on the basis of his report, found that if the heritage had been sold soon after the testator's death, the trust-estate would have been insufficient to pay his debts, and assolized the defenders, on the ground that the pursuers had failed to prove that they had sustained loss.

In an appeal the pursuers maintained that as they had not renounced probation, they were entitled to a proof of their averments as to the value of the testator's heritage. The defenders craved that in the event of the pursuers being allowed a proof, they (the defenders) should be allowed a proof of their averments as to the circumstances which led them to borrow.

Held that as the pursuers had not renounced probation they were entitled to a proof of their averment as to the value of the testator's heritage, and that the defenders were entitled to a proof of their averments relating to the circumstances which induced them to borrow on the security of the heritage.

Opinions (per Lord Herschell, Lord Watson, and Lord Fitzgerald) that the fact that trustees in the exercise of an express or implied power have borrowed money for trust purposes on the security of the trust-estate does not necessarily involve personal liability in the event of loss resulting to the estate from the

No. 4. transaction, their liability depending on whether the transaction was a prudent one in the circumstances.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

(In the Court of Session, February 10, 1888, 15 R. 417.)

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.
Ld. Fitzgerald.

The pursuer William Binnie appealed, and contended that the pursuers were entitled to a proof of their averments as to the value of the testator's heritage at the commencement of the trust, as they had not renounced probation.

The defenders maintained that if the pursuers were allowed a proof, they (the defenders) should be allowed to prove their averments as to the circumstances which induced them to borrow money on the security of the heritage.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I have had an opportunity of perusing the opinion which my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson) is about to deliver, and I entirely concur in it.

LORD WATSON.—I have come, with much regret, to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the inquiry which has already been made in the Court below, the facts of this case have not been sufficiently investigated to enable your Lordships to dispose of it by a final judgment.

The action was brought in November 1886 by the appellant and two others, sons of William Binnie, builder in Glasgow, who died in October 1857, as beneficiaries under their father's settlement, against the respondents, who are the trustees or representatives of trustees who accepted office and administered the trust created by that deed. The trust-estate chiefly consisted of house property in Glasgow, burdened with an heritable debt of £12,000. The truster left a large amount of personal debt, and the trustees borrowed £26,000 upon the security of the real estate, with which they paid the charge of £12,000 and other debts, leaving a considerable balance unpaid. It is sufficient to say here that the results of their administration, whether prudent or not, were unfortunate, and that in June 1867 the trustees applied for a sequestration of the estate, which was accordingly realised and distributed under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts, some of the creditors receiving less than 20s. in the pound.

The pursuers averred that in 1857 and 1858, after the trustees entered upon office, the heritable property was worth and could have been sold for £42,980—a sum sufficient to pay the whole debt and leave a substantial margin for the beneficiaries—and that the trustees exceeded their powers and violated their duty in borrowing money on the security of the property instead of selling it. The defenders denied these allegations, and stated a variety of circumstances, which it is unnecessary to detail, in explanation and justification of the course of management which was pursued by the trustees.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) allowed the parties a proof of their averments, but his interlocutor was recalled by their Lordships of the First Division, who remitted to an accountant "to inquire into the amount of the trust-estate from the date of the truster's death, the debts due by the truster and paid by the trustees, and the yearly income and expenditure of the trust, and to report." The course thus adopted in order to prepare the case for judgment was in my opinion an expedient one, because a remit to an accountant of skill is a much more satisfactory method of investigating the details of trust management and its pecuniary results than a general proof. At the same time a remit of that kind does not deprive the parties of their right to prove in the ordinary way disputed facts which are not proper matters of accounting.

The report when completed disclosed the following facts upon which the controversy between the parties came to depend in the Court below—(1) That the heritable property was valued as for a loan, part of it in May, before the trusteer's death, and part in October 1857, after that event, the sum of the two valuations being £42,980; (2) that in the year 1862, after the sale of one tenement in November 1861 at the price of £7000, the remainder was valued, with a view to sale, at £29,748; and (3) that the entire property was sold in parcels between November 1861 and March 1870, the prices realised amounting in cumulo to £41,900. The reporter also stated that "as any sum that may be arrived at as the value of the property at the date of the trusteer's death must necessarily be a valuation," there would in his opinion be no injustice done to either party if £41,900 were taken to represent its value at that date.

No. 4.
Aug. 8, 1889.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

When the case was heard upon the report the pursuers impeached it, without lodging a note of objections according to the usual practice, and insisted that they were entitled to a proof of their whole averments on record.

They offered, however, to waive their demand for proof, and to take the report as the evidence in the case, upon condition of the Court accepting as conclusive the accountant's view with regard to the value of the real property. Both alternatives were very properly rejected by the Court. The first of them was again pressed by the appellant at the bar of the House, but it is clear that a party who has joined issue with his opponents, and has been fully heard before the reporter upon proper questions of accounting, cannot be permitted to re-open these questions in a proof at large.

Neither of the parties having moved for a limited proof, the First Division proceeded to dispose finally of the case upon the basis of the report. Their Lordships assoilzied the defenders upon the ground as expressed in the interlocutor, "that the pursuers have failed to prove that they have sustained any loss through the misconduct of the trustees." It appears from the judgments delivered at the advising of the cause that their Lordships were of opinion that the trustees had been guilty of misconduct which would have involved the defenders in liability, had not the pursuer's injuria been sine damno. But their Lordships, differing therein from the reporter, estimated the heritable property of the trust at £36,748, adopting the valuation of 1862 plus the sum received for the part sold in 1861. To that estimate they added £573 as the amount of the personal estate, making the total charge against the trustees £37,321. On the other side of the account their Lordships held that the trustees were entitled to credit for debts and charges paid by them, or by the trustee in the sequestration, to the amount in all of £37,521, the result being that had the real estate been sold at the time when the appellant alleges it ought to have been the liabilities of the trust would have exceeded its assets by £200, nothing whatever being left for the beneficiaries.

Were it now necessary to determine the market value of the property at the commencement of the trust with no other assistance than the information contained in the report, I should hesitate to disagree with the conclusion which was arrived at in the Court below. I certainly do not think that the prices which it fetched when sold in lots between the years 1861 and 1870 can fairly be taken to represent its selling value in the end of 1857, and experience leads me to doubt whether a valuation obtained in 1857 solely for the purpose of a loan can be safely relied on as an approximate estimate of its value for immediate sale. Besides, I do not find anything in the report tending to the inference that the

No. 4.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

market value of such properties was higher in 1857-58 than in 1862. But the appellant has now insisted before us for a proof of his averments touching the value of the subjects for sale at the time when the trustees entered upon office and could have sold, and seeing that he has never renounced probation, or agreed to accept the report as containing all the evidence which he desires to adduce, I cannot advise your Lordships that he ought not to have the opportunity which he asks for. He may at this distance of time have some difficulty in bringing forward evidence of market value in 1857 of a more direct and less speculative character than that which is to be found in the report, but that circumstance cannot affect his right to make the attempt. The respondents, in the event of the appellant being allowed a proof, expressed their desire to have an opportunity of instructing their averments bearing on the motives which induced the trustees to borrow, and I think their request ought to be conceded.

Besides the main question regarding the value of the real estate, two items in the accounting were fully discussed in the course of the argument. The appellant maintained that the Court ought to have charged the trustees with £562, being the estimated value in 1857 of furniture liferented by his mother, who is still alive. I am of opinion, for the reasons assigned in the judgment of the Lord President (Inglist), that the charge was rightly disallowed. Again, the respondents argued that the trustees ought to have had credit for the sum of £2652 which represents payments made to the widow for the maintenance of herself and the children who lived with her until her re-marriage in 1861, and payments made between 1857 and 1867 towards the maintenance and education of beneficiaries who were not living with their mother. These sums were no doubt in excess of the free income of the trust, but the trustees had under the trust-settlement a power of advancement out of capital sufficient in my opinion to validate such payments in any question with the appellant and others beneficially interested. The estimate of the house property which the Court below adopted made it unnecessary to decide as to this item, but if it were added to the sums with which the trustees have been credited the balance would still be against them if the appellant's statements with regard to the value of the property were established.

I should have contented myself with making these observations, which are sufficient for the disposal of this appeal, had it not been that in the Court below the learned Judges have expressed themselves with regard to the conduct of these trustees, and of trustees generally, in terms to which I cannot assent. The Lord President, with the concurrence of Lords Mure and Adam, said (15 R. 422),—"The conduct of trustees in borrowing money under any circumstances is highly imprudent. If it turns out to be a mistake, it subjects the trustees to personal liability." I do not know whether by these words the Lord President intended to lay down a principle of law or a proposition of fact; the result in either aspect might prove very unfortunate so far as the interests of beneficiaries are concerned. A trustee would incur unnecessary risk (which his duty in no case compels him to do), if he borrowed in order to pay debts prudently and with a reasonable prospect of securing a considerable reversion to the beneficiaries, and he would be justified for his own protection in at once selling, to the destruction of their interests, although no prudent person (himself included) thought it the better course to pursue. But there is really no such rule in existence. All that the law requires from a trustee who has power to sell or borrow is, that he shall follow the dictates of ordinary prudence in adopting the one course or the other, and the question whether he did or did not act prudently is one of fact which must be solved according to the circumstances of each case.

Looking to the terms of Mr Binnie's trust-deed, I see no reason to doubt that the trustees had implied power either to sell or borrow for the purpose of paying debt if the exigencies of the trust required it; and I am consequently of opinion that the conduct of the trustees in borrowing and not selling raises a question of prudent management only. If it were not for the unbending rule which they laid down as to the imprudence of borrowing in any circumstances, there might be difficulty in reconciling the views which the learned Judges took of the conduct of these trustees with the considerations which led them to fix the value of the property at £36,748. These were that house property in Glasgow became in the end of 1857 greatly depreciated in value and in many cases unsaleable. In that state of the market I cannot help thinking that prudent men would have been most reluctant to sell if that step could by possibility be avoided. I have thought it proper to make these remarks with no desire to prejudice any question which may arise when the facts are ascertained, but in order to guard against its being supposed that in my opinion the appellant will be necessarily entitled to prevail in this action if he succeeds in proving the value which he has alleged.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from, in so far as these concern the appellant, ought to be reversed, and the cause remitted to the Court of Session with directions to allow the appellant a proof of his averments with respect to the value of the heritable property, and to the respondents a proof of their averments relating to the circumstances which induced the trustees to borrow on its security. If the appellant had asked in the Court below for the restricted proof which has been allowed him here, I see no reason whatever for supposing either that the respondents would have resisted the motion or that the Court would have hesitated to grant it, and I am therefore of opinion (seeing that the appellant sues in forma pauperis) that there ought to be no costs of this appeal.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I entirely concur in the judgment, and have nothing to add.

THE cause was remitted to the Court of Session with directions to allow the appellant a proof of his averments with respect to the value of the heritable property, and to the respondents a proof of their averments relating to the circumstances which induced the trustees to borrow on its security.

SCOLLES & COMPANY—MARCUS J. BROWN, S.S.C.—BIRCHAM & COMPANY—HENRY & SCOTT, S.S.C.

HECLA FOUNDRY COMPANY (Respondents), Appellants.—

Att.-Gen. Sir R. E. Webster—Healey.

WALKER, HUNTER, & COMPANY (Complainers), Respondents.—

Asher, Q.C.—Üre.

No. 5.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Hecla Foundry
Co. v. Walker,
Hunter, & Co.

Copyright of designs—Infringement—Registration “for shape or configuration”
—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 57), sec. 58.—A design was registered for shape or configuration, under the 60th section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, the application being for “a range door with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to

No. 4.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Binnie v.
Binnie's
Trustees.

No. 5. be registered." The drawing shewed a moulding on the top of the door fitting into the moulding on the front of the range and flush with it. Held (in aff. judg. Aug. 8, 1889. ment of First Division), that another design, which differed from the above in Hecla Foundry this, that the moulding on the door overlapped the moulding on the front of the Co. v. Walker, range was, when compared with the other, an "obvious imitation" of the registered design, and an infringement of it. Hunter, & Co.

Observed that the test of infringement was whether the shape in the two designs was the same.

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.
Ld. Fitzgerald.

(IN the Court of Session, May 25, 1888, 15 R. 660.)

The respondents in the suspension and interdict appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD HERSCHELL.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the First Division refusing a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary finding it proved that the appellants at your Lordships' bar had infringed the respondents' exclusive privilege of making for sale fire-doors of the pattern produced, and interdicting the appellants accordingly.

The respondents in November 1884 registered a design, the nature of which was stated in the application to be "range fire-door with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered."

The drawing which accompanied the application shewed a rectangular door for a fire-range, with a moulding at the top of it of a form which appears to be known as ogee.

The sole question for determination is, whether a fire-door manufactured by the appellants is an infringement of the right secured to the respondents by the registration of their design? It undoubtedly is so if it is either the same design or a fraudulent or obvious imitation of it.

The Lord Ordinary in delivering his opinion used the following language—"Now, upon the question whether there is here an infringement, nothing was said to the contrary of the complainers' proposition that mere differences in the outline of the moulding would not take the respondents' design out of the patented copyright. That seems to me perfectly clear, because there is nothing original in the moulding, and in the claim of registration it is made evident that the registration was claimed, not for the particular moulding, but for the material form given by placing a moulding—any suitable moulding—upon a fire-door in the described position. Well, then, I have to consider if there was no exclusive privilege claimed for the particular pattern of moulding, whether the exclusive privilege is limited to the case of a moulding which exactly fits into the adjoining mouldings so as to present a continuous flowing surface, or whether it is not a privilege granted for putting such a moulding upon a fire-door in such a manner as to exclude air, and to accomplish the object which had been previously accomplished by putting the moulding upon the fire-cover or fall-bar." The Lord President adopted this language of the Lord Ordinary, and the view which he had taken of the subject-matter of the claim of the present respondents.

With all respect for these learned Judges, I cannot but think that they took into account elements which were not proper to be considered for the purpose of determining what was the design protected by the registration, and whether there had been an infringement of the copyright in that design.

By section 60 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883 "design" is defined as meaning "any design applicable to any article of manufacture or to any substance . . . whether the design is applicable for the pattern, or for the shape or configuration, or for the ornament thereof." In the present case the applicant declared that it was for "the shape" that he desired registration. Under the designs part of the Act of 1883 I do not think the object which the designer has in view in adopting the particular shape, or the useful purpose which the shape is intended to serve, or does serve, ought to be regarded in considering what is the design protected. The scheme of this part of the Act is entirely different from that relating to patents for inventions, where the object attained by the invention for which the patent is granted is of course very material to the inquiry what is the subject-matter, and whether there has been an infringement. I cannot agree therefore that the registration was claimed, or could be claimed, "not for the particular moulding," but for the form given by placing "any suitable moulding" upon a fire-door in the described position, or that a privilege was granted "for putting a moulding upon a fire-door in such a manner as to accomplish" a particular object. I think the protection was granted for the shape, and for that alone, and that in such a case when an infringement is alleged the only question is, whether the shape of that which is impeached is the same, or whether the one is an obvious imitation of the other, without reference to whether it does or does not accomplish the same useful end. I quite agree with what was said by Lord Shand in Walker v. The Falkirk Iron Company, 14 R. 1072, that "the Act in this branch gives protection only to the shape or configuration or to the design for the shape or configuration in such a case as the present. The result of such protection may be, however, to secure important advantages such as attend a mechanical contrivance if these advantages should be the result, directly or indirectly, of the shape or configuration adopted." But this is a mere incident. If such advantages are obtained it is only because no shape not substantially the same, and which is therefore not an infringement, will achieve the same end. The test of infringement must always be whether the shape is or is not the same. If it be, then the exclusive privilege has been infringed, even though the same object be not accomplished; if it be not, then, though the object be accomplished, there has been no infringement. In the present case, for example, by a very slight deviation from the design, which would scarcely be apparent, the air might be admitted to the fire. I do not think that a person making such a fire-door could successfully answer the complaint that he had infringed the rights of the proprietor of the design by shewing that when applied to a range it would not exclude the air.

It seems to me, therefore, that the eye must be the judge in such a case as this, and that the question must be determined by placing the designs side by side, and asking whether they are the same, or whether the one is an obvious imitation of the other. I ought perhaps to qualify this by saying that as a design to be registered must, by section 47, "be a new or original design, not previously published in the United Kingdom," one may be entitled to take into account the state of knowledge at the time of registration, and in what respects the design was new or original when considering whether any variations from the registered design which appear in the alleged infringement are substantial or immaterial.

Applying the test which I have laid down, I have come to the conclusion that there has been a violation of the respondents' rights. There are no doubt certain distinctions between the door shewn on their drawing and that manufactured by the appellants. But to establish this is not enough to free them from liability. By section 58 of the Act it is not lawful for any person to apply

No. 5.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Hecla Foundry
Co. v. Walker,
Hunter, & Co.

No. 5. either the design, or any "obvious imitation thereof," in the same class of goods in which the design is registered. It is impossible in such a case as the present to give reasons for the opinion formed. I can only say that to me it appears without doubt that the door complained of is an obvious imitation of the registered design.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Hecla Foundry
Co. v. Walker,
Hunter, & Co.

I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The evidence led before the Lord Ordinary shews that until 1884 kitchen-ranges were commonly made with a cornice or ogee moulding running along the whole front of the range, that part of the moulding which is opposite to the furnace being invariably attached either to the fire-bar or to the hot-plate which forms the cover of the range. In November of that year the respondents registered in terms of the Act of 1883 the drawing or design of a door which, in compliance with the statutory rules issued by the Board of Trade, they described as a "range fire-door with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered."

The witnesses appear to have generally agreed that the attachment of the moulding to the fire-door, or the making it part of the door itself, as shewn in the respondents' design, was an improvement upon previous arrangements, because it obviated various disadvantages which were inseparable from these arrangements. That may be so, but in my opinion such considerations are of no relevancy in the present case. It is quite immaterial for the purposes of registration under the Act of 1883 whether a design is useful or devoid of utility. All that the statute requires, in order to its registration and protection, is that it shall be new or original, and shall not have been previously published in the United Kingdom, and the person registering acquires no exclusive right except to the shape and configuration of his design. If his design should be calculated to serve some useful purpose, it is nevertheless open to every member of the public to attain the same end by using an article which differs from it in shape and configuration. The statutory prohibition which constitutes the measure of his privilege is to the effect that so long as his copyright endures, it shall not be lawful for any person, without his licence or consent in writing, to apply his design "or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof," in the class of goods in which such design is registered.

Accordingly, the only relevant consideration in any question of infringement is, whether the article complained of is a copy, or a fraudulent or an obvious imitation of the registered design. The observations which were made by Lord Westbury in Holdsworth v. M'Rea, 2 Eng. & Ir. App. 388, with reference to the Acts now repealed, are in my opinion equally applicable to the provisions of the recent statute. His Lordship there said—"Now in the case of those things as to which the merit of the invention lies in the drawing or in forms that can be copied, the appeal is to the eye, and the eye alone is the judge of the identity of the two things. Whether therefore there be piracy or not is referred at once to an unerring judge, namely, the eye, which takes the one figure and the other figure, and ascertains whether they are or are not the same."

I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that the appellants' fire-door is an obvious imitation of the respondents' registered design, and I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be disallowed.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur in the two judgments which have just been delivered. I may remind your Lordships that in the course of the discussion at the bar one of the learned counsel asked us to put the two things side by side, and said that we should see by a look that the article produced by the appellants was an obvious imitation of the registered design of the respondents. I looked minutely at the two things then, and I came to the conclusion that the door of the appellants was clearly an obvious imitation of the registered design of the respondents, and from that moment I thought the argument was at an end.

No. 5.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Hecle Foundry
Co. v. Walker,
Hunter, & Co.

THE interlocutor appealed from dismissed, with costs.

MARTIN & LESLIE—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—GRAHAMES, CUREKY, & SPENS—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.

No. 6.

JANE DONALDSON REID RAE AND ANOTHER (Pursuers), Appellants.—

Asher, Q.C.—Rhind—M'Iraith.

JOHN MEEK (Defender), Respondent.—D.-F. Balfour, Q.C.—G. W. Burnet. Aug. 8, 1889.
Rae v. Meek.

HOTSON & HOWIE (Defenders), Respondents.—Rigby, Q.C.—Law.

Trust—Investment—Liability of trustees—Law-agent.—A marriage-contract empowered the trustees acting under it (two of whom were the spouses) to lend on, inter alia, heritable securities, or personal securities or obligations, and declared that the trustees should not be answerable "for errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases." The greater part of the trust-funds was lent by the trustees on the security of buildings in the course of erection, the rents of which, after their completion, turned out to be insufficient to meet the interest on the loan, and the borrower became bankrupt. While both spouses were alive the children of the marriage, whose interest under the contract was during the marriage contingent merely, brought an action against the trustees and the law-agent to the trust, concluding to have them ordained, "conjunctly and severally, or severally," or in such other way or manner as should seem just, to restore the money to the trust. The law-agent and one of the trustees lodged defences.

It appeared from a proof that the buildings, which were in Glasgow, were of the nature of a speculation in the particular locality, and that the speculation wholly failed. The proposal for the loan was (along with others) placed before the trustees at a meeting where the spouses were present, and with it a valuation by an architect which had been obtained by the borrower. This valuation shewed an ample margin on the estimated value of the buildings when completed. The trustees obtained no separate valuation, nor did their law-agent suggest the propriety of obtaining one. The loan was agreed to at the meetings at which it was placed before the trustees.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division and consulted Judges), that the pursuers had no title to sue the law-agent, because he had not been employed by them.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division and consulted Judges), (1) that the trustee, in making the investment, had failed to shew the reasonable care that a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own business, and therefore (2) that he was personally liable for the trust-funds so invested, the clause of immunity affording no protection for such negligence.

Knox v. Mackinnon, August 7, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 83, followed.

Judicial Factor.—Appointment of judicial factor to protect contingent interests.

(In the Court of Session, July 19, 1888, 15 R. 1033.)

The pursuers appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.
Ld. Fitzgerald.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The circumstances of this case are somewhat peculiar. The appellants are the children of the marriage of Robert Reid Rae and

No. 6. Jessie Croil, and the défendant Meek is one of the trustees of the marriage-contract between these parties, entered into on the 7th of September 1852.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Rae v. Meek.

Under this contract Robert Reid Rae and his wife were also appointed trustees, a major part of whom was to form a quorum, the wife during her lifetime being a sine qua non. By this contract Jessie Croil conveyed all her estate inherited from her deceased father to the trustees named in it for behoof of herself in liferent, and in case she survived her husband absolutely in fee. In case Robert Reid Rae survived her, he was to enjoy a liferent so long as he remained unmarried. Upon his death or marriage the property was to pass to the children of Robert Reid Rae and Jessie Croil. The trustees were authorised to invest the trust property "in the purchase of heritable property, feu-duties or ground-annuals, or Government or bank stocks, or heritable securities, or even upon such personal securities or obligations as they may approve of as good and sufficient."

In 1874 the trustees sold a portion of the trust property for £2750, and received payment of another sum of £2000, which had been lent on heritable security. They had thus £4750 to invest. On the 5th of May in that year, a meeting of the trustees took place, at which Mr and Mrs Rae and Mr Meek were present, when it was resolved that a loan should be made to Mr William Anderson on the security of unfinished buildings in the Gallowgate, Glasgow, provided Mr Hotson, their law-agent, should be satisfied with the title, and that such part of the loan should be deposited in a bank in the joint names of the parties' law-agents as Mr Burnet, an architect who had valued the buildings, should deem to be sufficient for finishing them.

The loan was accordingly made, and the entire sum of £4500 ultimately paid to Anderson. I shall have presently to revert to the circumstances attending the loan, but it will suffice for the present to state that the transaction turned out a disastrous one for the trustees, and that the money lent has been lost to the trust-estate. This action has been brought by the present appellants to compel the défendant Meek to make good the loss. The law-agents who acted for the trustees at the time of the loan were joined as défendants, and the same relief was claimed against them.

The Lord Ordinary required the appellants to elect whether they would proceed against the trustee or the law-agents, and on their declining to do so, dismissed the action on the ground that the trustee and the law-agents ought not to have been sued in the same action. This interlocutor was recalled by the Inner-House, and the parties were allowed to proceed to proof. After proof had been led the cause was argued before the Second Division and three Judges of the First Division of the Court. The Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Adam delivered their opinions in favour of all the defenders. Lord Young concurred in thinking that the defender Meek was not liable, but held that a case had been made out against the law-agents. Lords Mure, Shand, and Rutherford Clark thought that the liability of the trustee had been established, but that there was no case against the law-agents.

At the conclusion of the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants all your Lordships were of opinion that they had failed to shew any ground for their action against the law-agents; I share the difficulty which was felt by the Lord Ordinary. I cannot see how the law advisers could in any view be held liable to restore to the trust-fund the money lost, which was the claim against the other defender. If an action be maintainable against them at all it could only be to compel payment of such damages as the appellants have sustained by reason of their failure of duty. And considering the contingent nature of the appellants' interest in the fund it is obvious that this must be something very different from the amount of the loss to the estate. Liability as against the defenders with whose case I am now dealing could in my opinion only be established by proof that they were employed to give advice either by the appellants or by some person on their behalf, and that having undertaken this employment they neglected their duty. Now, they certainly were not employed by the appellants, nor do I think they were employed on their behalf. The alleged duty, if it existed at all, was to the trustees and not to the beneficiaries. If there has been a breach of it, the trustees and not the beneficiaries are the parties to sue. There may be cases where, if trustees failed to call to account those who are under liability in respect of acts injurious to the trust-estate, the beneficiaries may compel them to do so, or even enforce the right themselves. But no such question is raised by the averments in the present action. But further, I think it right to say that in my judgment the evidence does not establish that the law-agents were employed to advise the trustees as to the sufficiency of the security, or that the trustees acted on any such advice. It seems to me, therefore, that the case against these defenders entirely fails, and that the appeal as against them ought to be dismissed.

No. 6.

Aug. 8, 1889.

Rae v. Meek.

I turn now to the case against the defender Meek, which has given rise to such divergence of opinion amongst the learned Judges in the Court below. I may remark at the outset that if a breach of duty on his part has been proved, I think it is competent for the appellants to maintain this action. It is clear that neither Mr nor Mrs Rae could obtain any relief against the defender Meek, for if there has been a violation of duty they were as much parties to it as he was. They cannot claim to have the sum lost replaced, to be held on the trusts of the marriage-contract so far as those trusts are for their benefit. But I see no reason why the appellants may not claim to have their contingent interest under the trusts of the marriage-contract protected.

The law bearing upon the liability of trustees has been recently considered by your Lordships in the cases of Whiteley v. Learoyd, August 1, 1887, L. R. 12 App. Ca. 727, and Knox v. Mackinnon, August 7, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 83, the one coming from the English, the other from the Scottish Courts. I think these cases establish that the law in both countries requires of a trustee the same degree of diligence that a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own affairs. The Lord President in the present case did not adopt this as the test. "We must not demand," he said, "of Mr Meek any more prudence or diligence or knowledge than he actually possesses or uses in the management of his own business. For that purpose we must consider what Mr Meek is." As a result of this consideration he came to the conclusion that Meek was not a man of business habits, or of great intelligence or discretion. I do not think the inquiry thus entered upon was a relevant one. The test which the Lord President applied was rejected as erroneous by this House in Knox v. Mackinnon. Lord Watson there said,—"It was seriously argued that according to the law of Scotland the responsibility of a gratuitous trustee must (apart from any special dispensation by the truster), be tested by reference not to an average standard but to the degree of care and prudence which he uses in the management of his private affairs. The rule, which is quite new to me, would be highly inconvenient in practice. In every case where neglect of duty is

No. 6. imputed to a body of trustees it would necessitate an exhaustive inquiry into the private transactions of each individual member, the interest of the trustee being to shew that he was a stupid fellow, careless in money matters, and that of his opponents to prove that he was a man of superior intelligence and exceptional shrewdness."

Aug. 8, 1889.
Raes v. Meek.

I think therefore that the ground upon which the Lord President, and the learned Judges who concurred with him, rested their judgments upon this part of the case cannot be supported.

Has it then been shewn that the trustee failed to exercise that degree of diligence which a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own affairs? In order to answer this question it is necessary to lay the facts before your Lordships more fully than I have hitherto done.

The buildings which were to form the security for the loan agreed upon at the meeting of the trustees to which I have referred were an unfinished portion of a large block which the borrower was erecting in Gallowgate upon a site which was part of an area cleared of a very inferior class of buildings in the course of the city improvements. The ground-annual upon that portion which was to be the security of the trustees amounted to £192. The buildings in course of erection were intended for use as warehouses and offices, and were of a character hitherto unknown in that locality. The only guide which the trustees possessed as to the adequacy of the security was an estimate of Mr Burnet, who valued the buildings when finished at £6500, over and above the annual feu-duty. This valuation was contained in a letter addressed by Mr Burnet to the agents of the borrower by whom it had been obtained. The trustees sought for no independent valuation. They made no inquiry before agreeing to the loan as to the rentals to be anticipated from the property, and had no estimate of those rentals before them. It has been suggested that they were advised by their law-agents that the security was sufficient. I can find no evidence of this. Mr Meek asked whether they could lend on unfinished buildings, and received the answer that they could, and that such loans were common. I see no reason to doubt that this answer was correct. If the buildings in course of erection had been of the same character as those which previously existed on the same site, and these had been constantly let, I do not think that the mere fact that the new buildings were unfinished would be material if due security were taken for their completion. I lay no stress therefore on the mere fact that they were not completed at the time of the loan. But I have said enough to shew that the erection of these warehouses was an adventure on the part of Mr Anderson, the borrower. Whether it proved successful or not would depend entirely upon whether the business the purposes of which they were intended to serve took root in the locality or not. This was a pure matter of speculation. No doubt Mr Anderson was sanguine as to its success, and he was entitled to run what risk he pleased. But the duty of the trustees was to obtain a safe investment which would afford a security for the money advanced, and not to hazard it upon a speculation. The event which happened was such as ought to have been anticipated by any person of prudence, if not as a probable, at least as a possible one. The buildings remained in great part untenanted, the rents never reaching a sufficient sum to discharge the ground-annual. Anderson became insolvent, and the trust fund has been lost. I cannot think that under these circumstances the defender Meek exhibited in this transaction the care which a person of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own affairs.

No. 6.

The Lord President, who took the view most favourable to him in the Court below, used the following language with reference to the security taken :—"The failure of the security arose from this, that the erection of buildings of the character of those which were erected in this locality—that is, in the Gallowgate of Glasgow—was in itself a very great risk, and an experiment, and turned out to be an entirely unsuccessful experiment." The defender not only advanced money upon such a security, but he obtained no independent opinion as to the value of the property, the rental it was likely to yield, or the prospects of speedily obtaining tenants. He was content to rely exclusively on the lump valuation of the borrower's architect, obtained for the purposes of the loan. To hold that a trustee who thus acted had discharged his duty, and was under no liability if the security proved worthless, would, I think, be highly dangerous.

Aug. 8, 1889.
Rae v. Meek.

But it was urged on behalf of the defender that this did not conclude the case against him, inasmuch as he was protected by the clause of immunity contained in the trust-deed. That clause is in the following terms :—"That the said trustees shall not be answerable for errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases, nor singuli in solidum, or for the intromissions of each other or of their factor, but each for his or her actual intromissions only." Such a provision, in terms identical or not distinguishable in their effect, is a common one, and is to be found in many trust-deeds. It does not now come before the Courts for construction for the first time. Its effect was considered with great care in the case of Seton v. Dawson, Dec. 18, 1841, 4 D. 310, long before the preparation of the trust-deed with which we have to deal. And it has been the subject of discussion in several cases since the date of that decision. I adopt the law as laid down by Lord Watson in this House in Knox v. Mackinnon, 15 R. (H. L.) 86, which I think is well warranted by the authorities—"It is settled in the law of Scotland that such a clause is ineffectual to protect a trustee against the consequences of culpa lata or gross negligence on his part, or of any conduct which is inconsistent with bona fides. I think it is equally clear that the clause will afford no protection to trustees who from motives, however laudable in themselves, act in plain violation of the duty which they owe to the individuals beneficially interested in the funds which they administer. I agree with the opinions expressed by Lords Ivory, Gillies, and Murray in Seton v. Dawson, to the effect that clauses of this kind do not protect against positive breaches of duty."

It is impossible to draw any hard and fast line between the want of that care which a man of ordinary prudence would display in the management of his own affairs and that high degree of negligence which is termed culpa lata. But I have arrived without hesitation at the conclusion that there was culpa lata in the present case. Indeed, I think that to advance money on such a security, with only such information and under such circumstances as I have described, was a positive breach of duty on the part of the trustee towards those beneficially entitled to the trust fund.

I feel some regret at being compelled to arrive at the conclusion that the defender is liable, for I should be most unwilling to press the case hardly against any trustee who has acted honestly and without any improper motive. But it is the bounden duty of the Courts to enforce against trustees the obligations they have undertaken, and to protect the trust funds committed to their charge.

I have already said that no order ought to be made in this case from which

No. 6.
 Aug. 8, 1889.
 RAE v. MECK.

Mr or Mrs Rae can obtain any benefit. It is impossible therefore to ordain simpliciter that the defender should replace the lost trust fund, and that the fund thus replaced should be held subject to the trusts of the marriage-contract. I think the order should be as follows:—That the judgment be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed as regards the respondents other than John Meek, and that as regards that respondent the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remitted to the Court below with directions to ordain the said respondent to pay to a judicial factor to be appointed by the Court the sum of £4500, to be held by him for the trusts and purposes following—that is to say, to pay to the said John Meek the interest derived from the investment of the fund, less the necessary expenses, during the joint lives of Robert Reid Rae and Jessie Rae. In case the said Jessie Rae should survive the said Robert Reid Rae, then to transfer the said £4500, or the securities representing the same, to the said John Meek, but in case the said Robert Reid Rae should survive the said Jessie Rae, then to pay to the said John Meek the interest derived from the investment of the fund, less the necessary expenses, so long as the said Robert Reid Rae shall live and remain unmarried, and upon the decease or second marriage of the said Robert Reid Rae, to hold the fund upon the trusts declared by the marriage-contract. And to further ordain that upon payment of the aforementioned sum to the judicial factor the security relating to the Gallowgate property be transferred to the respondent Meek at his expense, if he shall so require. And that the said respondent do pay the appellants their expenses of process in the Court below, so far as occasioned by his defence to the action; and that the said respondent do pay to the appellants two-thirds of their costs of this appeal, to be taxed in the manner usual when the appellants sue in forma pauperis. I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, I have had an opportunity of considering the terms of the judgment which has just been delivered, in which I entirely concur.

LORD FITZGERALD.—My Lords, I have carefully listened to the judgment delivered by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, and I entirely concur in it; in fact it is in accordance with what we agreed upon at the close of the argument.

THE HOUSE ordered in the terms proposed by Lord Herschell.

A. BEVERIDGE—W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—W. ROBERTSON—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—
 MURRAY, HUTCHENS, & STIRLING—HOTSON & BROWN, Glasgow.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

1888-89.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Sym, A.-D.—J. C. C. Brown.

SIMON MACLEOD.—Ure.

RODERICK GEORGE MACLEOD.—Strachan.

No. 1.

Sept. 12, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Macleods.

Specification—Indictment—Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Trader obtaining goods on credit by means of false representations as to capital.—Two persons were indicted on the charge that “you having” while carrying on business in partnership “formed a fraudulent scheme for obtaining on credit the goods of others on false pretences, and appropriating them to your own use, did in pursuance thereof” make certain specified false representations “concerning your means and financial position” to other traders, and did thereby deceive and impose upon them, “and did thus induce” them “to supply you on credit with . . . goods to the value specified” in the indictment, “towards the settlement of which you did not pay more” than certain sums specified, “and you did thus cheat and defraud” these traders of certain specified amounts, being the difference between the sum paid by the accused and the total value of the goods. Objections were taken to the relevancy of the charge, viz, first, that the alleged false representations were not stated to be the cause of obtaining the goods, and second, that the indictment did not set forth a crime, because it appeared from its own terms that part of the goods had been paid for, and that to the credit thence arising the delivery of the other goods must be ascribed. The Court repelled both objections.

Contravention of Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), sec. 13, subsection B (3)—Obtaining property by any fraud within four months of sequestration.—Two persons who were sequestered on 17th March 1888 were charged with an offence against the Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 13, subsection B (3),* in respect that within four months prior to sequestration they obtained by means of fraudulent representations, made more than four months prior thereto, property on credit, and which had not been paid for, viz, “from R. Walker & Sons to the extent of £297, 6s. 7d.,” and from four other traders specified “to the extent of” certain specified sums. Held that the charge was irrelevant, because it did not specify the particular goods supplied within the four months.

Opinion, per Lord M'Laren, that in order to a relevant charge under the subsection the prosecutor must aver that the false representation by means of which the goods were obtained was itself made within the four months prior to the sequestration.

---

* The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, section 13, provides that “the debtor in a process of sequestration or cessio shall be deemed guilty of a crime and offence . . . subsection B, in each of the cases following . . . (3) if within four months next before the presentation of the petition for sequestration or cessio he by any false representation or other fraud has obtained any property on credit, and has not paid for the same.”

No. 1.

Sept. 12, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Macleod.

HIGH COURT
(GLASGOW).
Ld. McLaren.
Lord Lee.
Justiciary
Clerk.

SIMON MACLEOD and RODERICK GEORGE MACLEOD were indicted before the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow on two charges set forth as follows in the indictment, viz. :—"The charges against you are that you, while carrying on business as hosiery manufacturers under the firm of S. & R. G. Macleod, at 73 Mitchell Street, Glasgow, having formed a fraudulent scheme for obtaining on credit the goods of others on false pretences, and appropriating them to your own use, did, in pursuance thereof, on 13th December 1886, write and despatch to R. Walker & Sons, manufacturers, Leicester, the letter No. 6 of the productions lodged herewith, which letter was duly received by them, and the representations as to your means and financial position therein contained were false, and on the dates in 1887 in the first column of the schedule annexed hereto, in your said premises, you did verbally make the same or similar false representations as those contained in the said letter to the persons named and designed in the second column of said schedule, and in addition you falsely stated to the said persons mentioned in the said second column, that £10,000 of the capital in your said business was your own, all made since you began business; and did by said letter, and by the foresaid false verbal representations to John Peach Butlin, referred to in said schedule, deceive and impose upon him and upon the said firm of R. Walker & Sons, and by said false verbal representations, deceive and impose upon the other persons named in the second column of said schedule, and did thus induce the said firm of R. Walker & Sons, and the other firms mentioned in said schedule, during the period in the third column of said schedule set opposite to the respective names of the said firms in the said third column, to supply you on credit with yarn and hosiery goods to the values specified opposite to the respective names of the said firms in the fourth column of said schedule, towards the settlement of which you did not pay more than the sums in the fifth column of said schedule, and you thus did cheat and defraud the said firm of R. Walker & Sons, and the other persons in the second column of said schedule, or the said firms represented by them, of the amounts respectively specified in the sixth column of said schedule; or otherwise, the estates of the said S. and R. G. Macleod, and of you the said Simon Macleod and Roderick George Macleod, having been sequestrated on 17th March 1888, and you being thus debtors in a process of sequestration, did in your said premises in Mitchell Street, between 17th November 1887 and 17th March 1888, being within four months of the presentation by you of the petition for the sequestration of your estates, by means of the said false representations, obtain property on credit, which has not been paid for, from (1) the said R. Walker & Sons to the extent of £297, 6s. 7d.; (2) Robert Pringle & Son to the extent of £5, 13s. 7d.; and from the following firms named in said schedule, viz. (3) John Paton, Son, & Company, to the extent of £19, 14s.; and (4) David Sandeman & Company to the extent of £440, 12s., contrary to the Act 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34, section 13, subsection B (3)."

Objection was taken on behalf of the panels to the relevancy of both charges.

Argued for them;—1. The common law charge was defective in specification, and made no averment of crime. It was clear that there was no case of fraud here, for the indictment itself, by the words "towards the settlement of which [goods] you did not pay more than the sums in the fifth column of said schedule," shewed that the prisoners had paid part of the price before they were overtaken by misfortune. The indictment and schedules shewed a course of dealing with payments at intervals. Credit, it must be presumed, would be given because of satisfaction with these honest payments, and not because of representations made before the course of dealing began. The indictment, further, did not connect the alleged false representations with the obtaining of the goods. 2. The statutory charge was bad, because the alleged "fraud" was, according to the indictment, committed more than four months before the sequestration. The simple grammatical reading of the statute was that the whole crime, of which the fraud was the essence, must be committed within the four months. In any view that was a natural reading, and being the more favourable for the prisoner was the reading which the Court would favour in scanning an indictment. 3. The statutory charge did not specify the goods obtained within the four months.

No. 1.

Sept. 12, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
MacIsoda.

Argued for the Crown ;—1. The indictment contained every essential element of relevancy in common law charges of obtaining the goods of others by fraud, for it set forth (1) that false representations were made, (2) that they were made for the purpose of cheating, and (3) to the effect of obtaining the goods of the person cheated. The false representations were connected with their successful result by the words "deceive and impose upon" certain persons, and "did thus induce" them to part with their goods. The objection that they supplied the goods in part because the goods first supplied had been paid for probably would be a good objection if the proof did not negative it, but it was no objection to relevancy. 2. The statutory charge was relevant. The statute placed the limit of time on the "obtaining" of the goods, not the misrepresentation. A fraud once committed lived on into the future dealing. The reading proposed by the prisoners would defeat the statute.

LORD M'LAREN.—There are two charges here, one at common law and the other under the Debtors Act of 1880. As regards the common law charge it does not appear that the indictment is open to any exception on the ground of failure on the part of the prosecutor to set forth the particulars of the crime. There have been cases—I know of one that occurred since the passing of the new Procedure Act—in which it was laid down that you do not necessarily make a relevant indictment by just copying the words of the schedule, because every indictment must be considered with reference to the particulars of the case, and it might be necessary to expand the description of the crime which is in substance indicated in the schedule of the Criminal Procedure Act. In the present case it appears to me that there is a full and fair specification both of the representations on the faith of which the goods are said to have been obtained, and of the particular transactions resulting in the loss to the dealers who gave credit. Two objections to the relevancy of the indictment have been stated, one of them being that there are no words properly connecting the representations with the obtaining of the goods, for the one is said not to be the direct consequence of the other. It is possible that the indictment might have been made more precise in this respect, but I think the words which follow the narrative of the representations made, viz., "and you did thus induce the said" firms to supply the goods, are sufficient to connect the representations with the resulting injury. The second objection is, that it is of the essence of the crime of obtaining goods on false pretences that the goods should not be paid for. It is argued, no matter whether the representation be true or false, if the goods are paid for no fraud is committed; there may be a moral fraud, but no one is defrauded in the sense of being injured in his property. Now, it may be that in the investigation of the facts stated in this indictment the prisoners will be able to establish that they paid for certain of the specified goods; and in that case a question will arise

No. 1.

Sept. 12, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Macleods.

for the consideration of the jury, whether the goods subsequently obtained were obtained in reliance on the original representation? If it were shewn, for example, that the seller had meantime become aware that these representations were not trustworthy, and had nevertheless gone on supplying goods to the panels because he had been paid for those already supplied, and hoped for payment against future orders, then the case would very likely break down. If, on the other hand, it was proved that the seller supplied goods on the faith of the original representations, it would not be any answer to a case of that kind to say that an interval of time had elapsed between the representations and the obtaining of the goods, and that in that interval other goods had been got and paid for. Mr Ure's observation, though entitled to weight, ought to be addressed to the jury on the import of the evidence rather than to us on the question of relevancy.

Regarding the charge under the statute, I agree with my brother Lord Lee that in order to make a relevant charge under the Debtors Act, 1880, there must be a separate schedule setting forth the particular goods that were obtained within the period of four months; the schedule in the indictment framed with reference to the common law charge—extending over a period of two years—is not properly applicable to the statutory charge. It would be necessary either to have a separate schedule or to have the particular items stated that were intended to be made applicable to the statutory charge. That appears to me to be sufficient to dispose of the question of relevancy arising on the statutory charge.

I may say, further, although it is not necessary for the decision of the case that I have the greatest possible doubt whether any relevant charge under the statute could be framed upon the facts of this case. It appears to me that there is one possible interpretation of the statute which would be adverse to the relevancy, viz., that the representation and supplying the goods must both be within the specified period of four months. No doubt there is another possible interpretation, viz., that, provided the goods were obtained within four months of sequestration on the faith of a written representation previously made, an offence is committed. But as between the two interpretations, neither being a strained interpretation, but both fair and possible readings of the statute, I think that, in accordance with known rules, we ought to apply the principle of "strict construction," that is to say, the construction which gives the least extension to this new category of crime.

LORD LEE.—I have arrived at the same result, and upon both the objections, though upon the objection to the charge under the statute I am not prepared to assent to the opinion which your Lordship has indicated upon the construction of the statute. With regard to the first charge, and indeed with regard to both charges, the kind of case which I think this indictment discloses is that of obtaining goods by false pretences,—of persuading men of business by means of a false representation concerning the financial condition of a firm to enter upon a course of dealing the result of which is that goods are supplied on credit and not paid for. I am of opinion that that kind of charge is sufficiently alleged in the first part of the indictment. As regards the common law charge, it is in my opinion sufficiently set forth that this false representation was made by the panels in pursuance of a scheme, and secondly, that the result of these false representations was to induce the persons alleged to have been defrauded to supply the goods on credit to their ultimate loss. There then arises the question upon the facts, whether the balance of goods supplied to the panels after the first goods had been sent to them and paid for, were or were not supplied on the false representation? That is a question for the jury, and I say nothing upon it at present. I am of opinion, therefore, that the common law charge is relevant.

No. 1.

Sept. 12, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Macleods.

With regard to the statutory charge, I am of opinion with your Lordship, that it is necessary that there should be a sufficiently distinct allegation that the panel has by false representations obtained property on credit which has not been paid for, and that it is necessary that the goods so obtained must be specified. I do not find that they are. The only allegation here is that the panels fraudulently obtained goods from various firms amounting in value to (1) £290, (2) £5, (3) £19, and (4) £440, within four months of sequestration. I do not think that is a sufficient compliance with the statute. What were the particular articles so supplied? Is this sum of £440 to be made up out of goods supplied prior to the period of four months? What were the goods that the prosecutor undertakes to shew were delivered in that four months, and amounting in value to the sums mentioned in the schedule? I do not find that there is any specification of these in the indictment, and I think that is sufficient for our decision on the relevancy of the statutory charge. I agree with your Lordship, that either of the constructions of the statute suggested by your Lordship is possible, but I do not propose to give any opinion as to which is to be preferred. I am for sustaining the objection to the relevancy of the statutory charge, but repelling the objection to the charge at common law.

The objections to the first charge were repelled, and the statutory charge was found irrelevant. The panels were convicted on the common law charge, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

PROCURATOR-FISCAL FOR LANARKSHIRE—BORLAND, KING, & SHAW, Writers—MACBEAN & MACDONALD, Writers—Agents.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Sol.-Gen. Darling—Wallace, A.-D.

JAMES PARKER.—J. C. Thomson—M'Lennan.

JAMES BARRIE.—C. S. Dickson—Younger.

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

Indictment—Ship—Collision—Competency of charging pilots of respective ships in one indictment—Culpable and reckless steering—Culpable homicide.—Two pilots, J. P. and J. B., were charged in one indictment, setting forth that on an occasion and at a place libelled, "you, J. P., when pilot in charge of the ship 'Balmoral Castle,' there being risk of a collision between the said vessel and the steamship 'Princess of Wales,' did fail to slacken speed by stopping and reversing, contrary to article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862, and you J. B., when pilot in charge of the said steamship 'Princess of Wales,' there being risk of collision as aforesaid, did fail to slacken speed by stopping and reversing, and did put to starboard the helm of the said steamship 'Princess of Wales,' contrary to articles 18 and 15 of said Regulations, and you did both fail to navigate your respective vessels with proper and seamanlike care, and did cause said vessels to come into collision, and did thus kill certain persons."

Held (1) that it was competent to try both the accused under one indictment for their alleged separate and unconnected acts of negligence; and (2) on a motion to separate the trials, that the trials ought not to be separated.

Held further, that the indictment was relevant, repelling objections to the relevancy (1) that the Regulations founded on were neither referred to in the manner prescribed by sec. 9 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, rendering quotation of statutes unnecessary, nor fully and correctly quoted; (2)

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

that the charge of "failing to navigate your respective vessels with proper and reasonable care" was defective in specification.

Indictment—Relevancy—Use of qualifying words—Criminal Law Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 8.—Held that a libel in the terms above quoted was a relevant charge of culpable homicide, although not containing words such as "culpably and recklessly" qualifying the acts charged.

Observations on the case of Her Majesty's Advocate v. Dingwall, May 26, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 69.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Justiciary
Clerk.

JAMES PARKER and JAMES BARRIE were indicted before the High Court of Justiciary on the charge "that on 16th June 1888, on the Clyde, near Skelmorlie, Ayrshire, you, James Parker, when pilot in charge of the steamship 'Balmoral Castle,' there being risk of a collision between the said vessel and the steamship 'Princess of Wales,' did fail to slacken speed by stopping and reversing, contrary to article 18* of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, and you, James Barrie, when pilot in charge of the said steamship 'Princess of Wales,' there being risk of collision as aforesaid, did fail to slacken speed by stopping and reversing, and did put to starboard the helm of the said steamship 'Princess of Wales,' contrary to articles 18 and 15 of said Regulations, and you did both fail to navigate your respective vessels with proper and seamanlike care, and did cause said vessels to come into collision, and did thus kill Andrew Ferguson, joiner, Cross Street, Partick," and two other persons named, "who were on board the said steamship 'Princess of Wales,'"

In the list of productions notice was given that the Crown would produce an "official Copy of Orders in Council containing regulations now in force for preventing collisions at sea."

At the first diet before the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire the following objections were stated to the relevancy of the libel, viz. :—"(1) That both panels are charged in one indictment, while the acts of negligence are separate; (2) that the rules founded on are not sufficiently set forth; (3) that facts are not alleged sufficient to infer a breach of the rules; (4) that the charge of failure to navigate with proper and seamanlike care is wanting in specification; (5) culpa is not set forth in the libel, culpa being of the essence of the crime; (6) that the indictment does not set forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable offence."

These objections were reserved for the consideration of the Court at the second diet.

Argued for the panels;—It was incompetent to try the accused under one indictment. The result would be that one of them would cross-examine the witnesses for the Crown, lead his own evidence, and close his case without having an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses brought for the other prisoner, who might, and indeed would, in the case made for him, throw the whole blame on his fellow-accused. In such circumstances it would be in vain that the jury should be directed not to consider the evidence led for one prisoner as affecting the case against the other. The jury could not, if they would, refuse weight to that evidence. The case was not one of concert between two prisoners to * Art. 18.—"Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse, if necessary."

Art. 15.—"If two ships under steam are meeting end on or nearly end on so as to involve risk of collision, each shall alter her course to starboard, so that each may pass on the port side of the other."

"This article only applies to cases where ships are meeting end on or nearly end on in such a manner as to involve risk of collision."

commit a crime. It was one in which the whole blame, criminal or civil, might rest with one of the accused, and the case of the other would be to shew that. It had been decided in a recent case<sup>1</sup> that in a charge of such a kind it was incompetent to charge both the accused in one libel. [LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That case was different, because it was not set out in the libel what each accused did or failed to do. Here, on the contrary, the prosecutor has set out what particulars he proposes to prove against each prisoner.] But the judgment was that the use of one libel for such a case was incompetent. Lord M'Laren's opinion made that clear. No reported case could be cited on the other side in which the masters of two ships charged with culpable and reckless steering had been tried on one indictment. It was true that in an unreported case tried at Inveraray Circuit in 1868, such a charge had been sustained, but it had not been objected to, probably because the accused thought it for their interest not to take the objection. In the case of Rowbotham,<sup>2</sup> where the manager and locomotive superintendent of a railway company had been tried along with a telegraph officer for neglect of duty, no objection was taken to the competency of trying the prisoners together, and a motion to separate the telegraph officer's trial was refused, but other persons accused as to blame for the same accident were tried under a separate libel.<sup>3</sup> But further, the libel was irrelevant from deficient specification in that part of it which set forth a breach of regulations for preventing collisions at sea issued by Order of Council by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendments Act, 1862, sec. 20 et seq. If an Act of Parliament or similar document were quoted under the old practice it required to be fully and accurately quoted. It might now be referred to, but here the reference was attempted by means of an inaccurate quotation of rules 15 and 18 of the rules founded on. It was not said, for example, that stopping and reversing was "necessary," but the rule said that a vessel shall, in circumstances in which it applied, "slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary." So also the quotation of rule 15 was inaccurate. It was a case to which sec. 9 of the Criminal Law Procedure Act, 1887, applied, and not sec. 15.* If so, a reference would have sufficed, but an inaccurate paraphrase was inadmissible.

Again, the general statement that the accused "did fail to navigate your respective vessels with proper and seamanlike care, and did cause said vessels to come into collision," was clearly defective in specification. The prosecutor must allege specific fault. In the most recent case of this class there had been such an averment,<sup>4</sup> and in the case of Fail<sup>5</sup> an

<sup>1</sup> Clelland v. Sinclair, March 18, 1887, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 23.

<sup>2</sup> H. M. Advocate v. Rowbotham and Petre, March 15-19, 1855, 2 Irv. 89, 27 Scot. Jur. 338.

<sup>3</sup> H. M. Advocate v. William M'Intosh and William Wilson, March 19, 1855, 2 Irv. 136.

* Sec. 9.—"It shall not be necessary in an indictment for a crime punishable under any Act of Parliament to quote the Act of Parliament or any part of it, but it shall be sufficient to allege that the crime was committed contrary to such Act of Parliament, and to refer to the Act and any section of the Act founded on without setting forth the enactment in words at length."

Sec. 15.—"Where in an indictment any document requires to be referred to, it shall not be necessary to set forth the document, or any part of it, in such indictment, but it shall be sufficient to refer to such document by a general description, and where it is to be produced, by the number given to it in the list of productions for the prosecution."

<sup>4</sup> H. M. Advocate v. Drever and Tyre, Nov. 2, 1885, 5 Couper, 680.

<sup>5</sup> H. M. Advocate v. Fail, Sept. 13, 1877, 3 Couper, 497.

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

indictment for criminal carelessness in conducting blasting operations had been held irrelevant for want of it.

Lastly, the indictment was irrelevant on the simple ground that it did not contain any charge of crime. It was of the essence of the crime charged that the acts averred be done wilfully, or culpably and recklessly, and this was not averred. It had been decided in the case of Dingwall<sup>1</sup> that where the acts stated in the charge were indifferent the indictment must contain words shewing that these acts were in the circumstances criminal. Here this was the more necessary, because the rules founded on derived their force from the Act of 1862, which, in sec. 27, enacted that the master of a ship should be punished for breach of them if he was in "wilful default."

Argued for the Crown;—It was quite competent to charge and try two prisoners under one libel though their acts of crime were stated to be separate, and joint purpose was not part of the case. The case of Clelland was no authority to the contrary. The objection to the conviction in that case, which the Court sustained, was that the prosecutor had not stated in his libel what negligence he charged against each of the accused. The opinion of Lord McLaren as to the trying of the accused on one libel was obiter merely. Nor could any other authority for the proposition maintained on the other side be produced.

In the case of H. M. Advocate v. M'Taggart and M'Lachlan (n. r.), tried at Inveraray in 1868, two captains of steamers had been tried in one libel on a charge of reckless steering similar to that made in the present case. So it was a familiar thing to try in one libel two railway servants, e.g., a signalman and a station-master, whose separate acts of negligence had conduced to a railway accident.

The objection to the statement of the rules for navigation which the accused were said to have transgressed seemed to assume that the charge was one of breach of these rules. But the charge was a common law charge of culpable homicide, and the rules were to be produced in evidence in support of that charge. The prisoners had nothing to complain of in the way in which they were stated, for the prosecutor had shut himself up to prove that the particular duty of the accused was to adopt one of the alternatives mentioned in the rules, viz., that of stopping and reversing, and that that was "necessary."

It was unnecessary to use the words "culpably and recklessly." The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, did not require it. The specimen charge of culpable homicide in the schedule of the Act did not use these words.* They were read into the charge by the Act itself, and need not be libelled.† Assuming the soundness of Dingwall's case its doctrine need not be extended to one of a different class. A similar objection taken in the unre-

<sup>1</sup> H. M. Advocate v. Dingwall, May 26, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 69.

* Schedule A of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, gives this example:—"You did, when acting as a railway signalman, lower a danger signal and allow a train to enter on a part of the line protected by the signals under your charge, and did cause a collision, and did kill William Peters, commercial traveller, of Brook Street, Carlisle, a passenger in said train."

† Sec. 8 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), provides,—“It shall not be necessary, in any indictment, to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done or omitted to be done ‘wilfully,’ or ‘maliciously,’ or ‘wickedly and feloniously,’ . . . or ‘culpably and recklessly,’ or ‘negligently,’ or ‘in breach of duty,’ or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged, but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which, according to the existing law and practice its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant.”

ported case of Macleod, 14th May 1888, to a charge of knocking down part of a march fence, had been repelled by Lord Trayner. No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have listened to a very able argument indeed, and have received every possible assistance in dealing with the questions raised. The first objection taken at the former diet was that both panels are charged in one indictment, while the acts of negligence are separate. That to me is a novel objection relating to a case in which, whatever were the offences committed by the panels at the bar, they were offences committed simultaneously, and led to one result, being that which brought about this criminal investigation. There have been in the course of the last thirty or forty years very many cases in which two persons, by separate acts committed at the same time, contributed to the unfortunate result of loss of life, involving them in the charge of culpable homicide. I think I am right in saying that in no single case that has occurred, so far as I know, has there been an instance of a separate prosecution against two persons so charged. In every case the prosecution has been against both together, and in no case, so far as I know, has any objection been made to the competency of such a proceeding. I can see, on the other hand, that there would be very unsatisfactory results if in every case in which two, or three, or four people, by separate acts of carelessness in the execution of their duty, and by their combined fault, caused an accident, each prisoner was to be tried separately before a separate jury, and if the Court had not the full facts of the whole case completely before it in one inquiry. It is said by Mr Thomson that it would be perfectly vain, after a jury had heard evidence led in a case of this kind for one of the panels, which might tend to throw guilt upon the other, to direct them that, as regards the other prisoner, they were not entitled to take that evidence into account at all. But I am bound to assume—and there is nothing that has occurred in the history of this country to lead any Judge to assume the contrary—that when a jury receive a distinct direction in law from the Judge sitting on the bench the jury will regard it.

The case of Glelland is the only case which has been quoted from the bar which has any bearing on this case. That case, however, was a very different one indeed. It was a case in which the prosecutor charged the masters of two steam vessels together before the River Bailie in Glasgow under a complaint which practically made no statement of facts whatever. Both of them, he said, had mismanaged their vessels, and the vessels had come into collision. That would not in any circumstance be considered a relevant charge. It would simply be a statement that two people behaved recklessly, and nothing more. Of course that never would be dealt with, even in the most summary Court, as being a fair and relevant statement for the information of the prisoners as to what each of them did in order to contribute to the disaster which followed. It is true that Lord M'Laren in the course of his opinion says—"The collision may have been the result of the negligence of one or of both, but if the last were the case, then there were separate acts of negligence, and it is not in accordance with the spirit of our criminal law that two persons should be charged, in the circumstances of this case, in one libel." If I had considered that that was the ground of judgment of the three Judges who heard the case, I should certainly feel myself bound by it, however much I might differ from it, and however much I might be satisfied—as I am satisfied—that the whole course of decisions is quite contrary to that doctrine. But I take that statement of Lord M'Laren to be an expression

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

of his individual view alone, because I find in the opinions both of his Lordship and of the other Judges the real grounds upon which they proceeded—viz., that it was an act of oppression to charge the two men simply with having caused a collision without any explanation whatever of what either of them did, and to put them upon their trial without either of them having the slightest notice as to what was the fault attributed to him. Now, it is different here. The indictment here makes a specific and separate statement in regard to each prisoner, and it will be in the power of counsel at the bar in addressing the jury—and it will be the duty of myself in charging the jury—to point out what are the specific things alleged against each of the prisoners, and what are the specific things which must be proved before either of them can be found guilty upon the charge made against him. I am not now speaking on the question whether the charge is sufficient. I am speaking merely of the fact that this case is different from the case of Clelland in respect that there is a specific allegation against each of the accused. While I am speaking of that, I may as well refer to the objection which was taken to the general statement that “you did both fail to navigate your respective vessels with proper and seamanlike care.” I quite concur with Mr Thomson that that by itself would be a wholly irrelevant charge; but then the prosecutor does not undertake to prove that as a separate charge at all. Nor does he make it as a separate charge. He makes his specific charges, and makes his general statement. In the case of other crimes, before the passing of the recent statute, it was almost the invariable practice to state in the statement of specific facts that the act was committed in a certain manner, which was described, and to add “or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown.” If that latter statement was made in the form of a specific and separate charge it was irrelevant. In one case a charge was held irrelevant in which the prosecutor prefixed to these latter words “you did then and there,” making it read “you did then and there” commit the crime libelled “in some manner and by some means to the prosecutor unknown.” That was held irrelevant for want of specification; but in another indictment raised against the same person the words were again used in the proper way to cover slight differences in evidence, and not as a substantive charge, and the indictment was held relevant. I refer to the case M'Que (H.C.), February 20, 1860, 3 Irv. 552 and 578, and 32 Scot. Jur. 478. Therefore, as regards the first and fourth objections, I have no difficulty in repelling them.

The second objection is that the rules or regulations founded on are not sufficiently set forth. Now, it must be kept in view that this is a charge of culpable homicide brought at common law, and the prosecutor is perfectly entitled in making such a charge to make the rules which are issued for the guidance of persons of skill in executing their duties a test as to whether they acted with reasonable care and skill. The regulations in this case are merely documents for the information of the prisoners and their advisers in order that they may meet the case which the prosecutor intends to make. The Act of Parliament provides that where it is necessary to set forth documents in an indictment it shall be sufficient to refer to such documents by general description, and the present regulations are just a document to be produced. Now, in the indictment I find the regulations are referred to as being regulations issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862, and that notice is given in the list of productions that an official copy of these regulations is to be produced. The section applicable is not section 9 of the Act of 1887, which was referred to, but section 15, which provides—"Where in an indictment any document requires to be referred to, it shall not be necessary to set forth the document, or any part of it, in such indictment, but it shall be sufficient to refer to such document by a general description, and where it is to be produced, by the number given to it in the list of productions for the prosecution." Therefore I must also repel the second objection.

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

The third objection is that facts are not averred sufficient to infer breach of duty. Mr Thomson made the statement that the rules are not accurately quoted in the indictment. The prosecutor has taken one of two alternatives, and has charged each of the prisoners with not stopping and reversing when they ought to have done so. I think that they can have no reason to complain of want of specification by the prosecutor limiting himself to one and not stating the two alternatives, which would have given him a general latitude.

The last and most formidable objection I have to deal with is the objection based upon the case of Dingwall,—that the indictment should have contained as a preliminary statement the words "culpably and recklessly, and in breach of your duty," and that according to the case of Dingwall this indictment should be considered irrelevant. That brings me to the question whether the case of Dingwall compels me to hold this indictment to be irrelevant because it does not contain the words which the Statute of 1887 says in express terms it need not contain. The question is a somewhat difficult one. Either the case of Dingwall implies that in all cases of crime the words, or some of them, given in section 8 of the Statute of 1887 must be used, or it implies that in certain cases they, or some of them, must be used. After giving the question the best consideration I can, I cannot accept the decision in the case of Dingwall as applying generally to all cases, and that for two reasons. In the first place, to hold that it applied generally would be simply to wipe out a clause (and relative schedule) of the statute as if it had not been enacted. Second, I cannot accept Dingwall's decision as applying generally, because I gather from statements made by the learned Judges, in giving their opinions, that they did not consider that the schedule contained an example relative to the case they were deciding. Now, as regards the first point, I cannot hold myself bound by a decision of two Judges against the strong dissent of another, and against numerous decisions of Judges in previous cases giving effect to sections 2 and 8. Indeed, I hold myself bound, on the contrary, to assume that their Lordships did not intend altogether to set aside these clauses of a statute, and that therefore their decision is not to be so read. It is no doubt true that Lord Young in Dingwall's case speaks in a tone of ridicule of the omission of the expressions referred to in section 8, and asks, "Will anyone give me a good reason why these words should be omitted? There are plenty of superfluous and unnecessary words, e.g. the name and designation of the public prosecutor, which is always the same. Is it economy? You would save more by omitting 'by authority of Her Majesty's Advocate' than by omitting 'falsely and fraudulently.'" But even assuming that the clause were in its intent ridiculous, it is a perfectly clear and distinct enacting clause. The prosecutor cannot be held to have tabled an irrelevant indictment merely because he has obeyed the statute and left out words which the statute has said may be left out and shall be implied. No doubt, also, Lord McLaren says,—“I should only like to add that every libel must, in my opinion, set forth a crime—must set forth what conveys the notion of a crime—and that, I think, this indictment does not.” But the answer to

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

that is, that if the statute declares that certain words wherever they would have been necessary to relevancy under the old form are to be implied, then a Court of law is bound, in reading the indictment, to read in such words just as if they had been actually written. To refuse to read them in, and to throw out the indictment for want of them, would be nothing else than disobedience to express and unambiguous statutory enactments. The order given by the statute must be obeyed, and if the order is distinct and intelligible, a Court of law is bound to give effect to it. To hold otherwise would be to justify disobedience to statutory enactments on grounds relating to the policy or propriety of their contents. This would be to change the position of the Judge from that of an interpreter and administrator of the law and to constitute him its censor, entitled to veto its provisions if unable to consider them expedient or agree with the reasons which led to their being passed into law. I cannot, therefore, accept the case of Dingwall as an authority binding the Court in every case to ignore the provisions of clause 8, and to reject indictments framed in strict accordance with section 2 and schedule A.

The second point, viz., that the learned Judges held that the schedule was not applicable to the particular case, I gather to have been the real ground of judgment. For Lord Young, referring to Lord Rutherford Clark's opinion, says that he understands Lord Rutherford Clark to "assume that the case given in the schedule under the name of Norah Omond is a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition." And his Lordship adds, "I see no reason for arriving at that conclusion. . . . The case is toto cælo different from the specimen relied on." And Lord M'Laren says,—“When we look into the schedule it appears uncertain whether the case is meant as a statement of the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, or of dishonest appropriation, a new nomen juris introduced by this statute.” I may be permitted to say that while willing to submit to the decision where it clearly applies, yet until it has been considered by a full bench I dissent altogether from the reasons given. I dissent from what is laid down by Lord Young, because while I know he has a strong view that to obtain goods on the false pretence of bona fide business purchase with the distinct intention not to pay for them is not a crime by the law of Scotland, the contrary has been affirmed by a full bench in the case of Witherington, 4 Coup. 475. And that case was really following up numerous previous decisions of the High Court, sitting with a bench of three Judges. This was what the prosecutor averred in the case of Dingwall, and this is what his Lordship in that case stated was not crime by the law of Scotland. In this conflict of opinion I am bound by that of the full bench, with which I concur in every particular.

Again, with reference to the reasons given by Lord M'Laren, I find from his opinion above quoted that his Lordship proceeds in Dingwall's case on the assumption that the statute has created, as regards crimes relating to property, a new nomen juris, viz., “dishonest appropriation of property.” Lest it should be supposed that I acquiesce in that statement of what is contained in the Act, I must here say parenthetically that his Lordship has fallen into an unaccountable error in matter of fact. For the statute, in no part of it, establishes any new nomen juris. It is a procedure Act, intended to abolish the use of nomina juris. It does not mention such words as “dishonest appropriation of property” in any connection applicable to a substantive charge of crime. The words “dishonest appropriation of property” do not occur in the part of the statute which deals with the libelling of the crime charged. They relate to the notice of previous convictions to be used in evidence after trial and conviction, and to nothing else. As the statute extends the use of previous conviction in aggravation (after proof of crime) to all convictions for offence of a similar nature, it for convenience permits a number of these convictions to be described in the indictment by a comprehensive phrase, which is a form of notice intended to prevent surprise, the particulars being afterwards duly given in the list of productions. It is therefore clear that to speak of these words as a novel nomen juris for crime is entirely to mistake the meaning of the Act. But the important fact brought out by Lord M'Laren's special reference to these words in the case of Dingwall is that it is thus indicated that, in the opinion he was giving, he intended, as Lord Young also plainly intended, to deal with cases relating to offences against property, and to such offences only. I have therefore no hesitation in holding that, pending the decision of a full bench, I am not bound by that decision, except in so far as it relates to the particular crime in question in the case of Dingwall, and to the part of the schedule A applicable to that crime. The charge here is that the accused did guiltily do, or fail to do, certain acts libelled. The prosecutor undertakes to prove, according to what is required by law, the guilty character of the acts alleged to have been done. It is important to observe that it is the responsible public prosecutor alone to whom the privilege of thus libelling is given. He, on his responsibility, indicts and accuses of crime. The statute declares that the acts he specifies are to be read as being alleged to be done contrary to the criminal law of the country, and that if the charge with certain words read in would have been sufficient under the former law to make a relevant accusation, then they should be read in. Obeying the statute, I read them in here. It is not disputed that if these words were written in, the indictment would be relevant. The statute says they should be implied. That means that, for the purposes of relevancy, they are in the indictment.

I have only to add on the question of relevancy that Lord M'Laren refers to one case, in which the qualifying word "wilfully" is used in the schedule, in support of his view. He refers to the schedule, which gives an instance of the charge of fire-raising thus:—"You did set fire to a warehouse . . . and the fire took effect on said warehouse, and this you did wilfully (or culpably and recklessly)." But that very exception proves the rule, instead of being, as his Lordship suggests, an illustration of the application of the rule as he understands it. There are but few cases where the same acts described in the same words may fall into one or other of two categories of crime, and where a description in ordinary words without adjectives will not set forth the difference clearly enough—as, for example, between murder and causing death without murderous intent. But there are certain cases in which general words will not indicate any difference. The case of crime by raising fire is one of these. To say that a man set fire to a house gives him no notice whether he is accused of malicious crime or only of criminal carelessness. In such a case, therefore, where the same general words apply equally to an offence of great malignity and deliberate criminality and to an offence in which there was no wicked intent but only punishable carelessness, the schedule indicates that if the higher offence is to be charged this intention shall be given notice of. But here, in this case, and in most other cases, no such ambiguity exists, and there is no need for the specification given in the case of fire-raising. That case, by its exceptional character, brings into relief other cases in the schedule in which no such words are used,

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and Barrie.

No. 2.

Nov. 5, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Parker and
Barrie.

and the statute expressly declares that these forms may be used. I hold that the prosecutor has properly applied the schedule in this case, and repel the objections to the relevancy.

Thomson, for the panel Parker, then moved for a separation of trials, maintaining that prejudice would arise to him if the case against Barrie was proceeded with at the same time. If it were done, Barrie's counsel would lead evidence which he, on behalf of Parker, could not test by cross-examination, but which would be intended to shew that Parker was responsible for the collision, which undoubtedly occurred. Parker would thus not have the last word to the jury. It was the practice of the Court to accede to such an application when, as here, it was stated by a prisoner's counsel, on his responsibility as the prisoner's adviser, that he anticipated great prejudice from the cases proceeding together.

The Solicitor-General opposed the motion, on the ground that it would be inexpedient and unjust that the whole case should not be heard at one time by the same jury.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am afraid that in this matter the only assistance I have obtained in the argument is the statement which Mr Thomson has made on his responsibility as the counsel for one of the accused, that it would be to his prejudice if the trials were not separated. But I confess I do not see the grounds on which that view is presented. If I did I would be willing and anxious to agree to a separation of the trials. My opinion however is, not being able to appreciate the grounds on which the motion is rested, that there is no case for a separation of the trials. The facts of both cases must be intertwined. I think that if the cases were separated difficult and complicated questions would of necessity arise. I think that great inconvenience would arise from the separation which is proposed. I think the case is one which of all cases is fitting to be sent to a jury as a whole, and that no prejudice to the panels will arise from that course being taken.

I therefore refuse the motion to separate the trials.

The case then proceeded against both prisoners. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against both.

SENTENCE, four months' imprisonment.

CROWN AGENT—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 3.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Dunlop v.
Weir.

GABRIEL DUNLOP, Appellant.—A. S. D. Thomson.
ROBERT WEIR (Procurator-Fiscal of J. P. Court of Lanarkshire), Respondent.—Dundas.

Contravention of Contagious Diseases Animals Acts, 1878 to 1886—Permitting cattle to be moved without declaration of freedom from pleuro-pneumonia—Animals Order, 1886.—The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, enacts that any person shall be guilty of an offence who "without lawful authority or excuse, proof whereof shall lie on him, does anything in contravention . . . of a regulation of a local authority." The "Animals Order, 1886," passed under the powers vested in the Privy Council under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, 1878 to 1886, provides that "if an animal is moved in contravention of a regulation made by a local authority . . . the owner of the animal and the person for the time being in charge thereof and the person causing, directing, or permitting the movement" shall be deemed guilty of an offence.

A cattle-dealer was charged with an offence against those provisions, in respect that he "did move or cause, direct, and permit to be moved" certain cattle without their being accompanied by a declaration in terms of the regulations of the Lanarkshire Local Authority, into whose district they were to be moved, and was convicted. A case on appeal obtained by him stated that the appellant sold the cattle in Ayrshire, that the purchaser's drover who removed them into Lanarkshire had not a declaration properly filled up and countersigned by a police-officer, in terms of the regulations of the Local Authority of Lanarkshire, and that the Justices were "of opinion that the appellant was the only person who could have made the declaration, and in permitting the removal of the cattle without such declaration, in the knowledge that they were to be moved into the county of Lanark, was guilty of the offence charged." Held that there were no grounds stated in the case to justify the conviction, and that it must be set aside.

No. 3.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Dunlop v. Weir.

Review—Appeal—Amendment of case.—Where a case obtained by a person convicted of a statutory offence disclosed no ground for a conviction, and its amendment would have involved the statement of a totally new case after a considerable interval from the date of the proof, the Court refused to remit the case to the inferior Court for amendment.

GABRIEL DUNLOP, cattle-dealer, Castle Farm, Stewarton, Ayrshire, was charged before the Justice of Peace Court at Hamilton on 6th June 1888 under a complaint at the instance of Robert Weir, procurator-fiscal that Court, setting forth that on 30th April or 1st May 1888 he did "move or cause, direct, and permit to be moved by some person, to the complainer unknown, eight cattle, of which he, the said Gabriel Dunlop, was then the owner or person in charge, from Castle Farm, Stewarton, aforesaid, being within the district of the Local Authority of the county of Ayr, by road into the district of the Local Authority of the county of Lanark without the said cattle being accompanied with the declaration required by the regulations, dated 11th April 1888, made by the said Local Authority of the county of Lanark, in virtue of the powers conferred on them by the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 to 1886, and the Animals Order of 1886, the said movement being thus contrary to the Act of Parliament, 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 74, sec. 61, subsection (1)." * [Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878]. The complaint further set forth that the accused had been previously convicted of a similar offence, and that he was liable in a certain penalty specified.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Rutherford.
Lord Lee.
Justiciary Clerk.

* The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 74), sec. 61, provides,—"If any person without lawful authority or excuse, proof whereof shall lie on him, does any of the following things he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act (1) If he does anything in contravention of this Act or of an Order of Council or of a regulation of a local authority."

By the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 32), sec. 1, the Act of 1878, the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Transfer of Parts of Districts Act, 1884, and the Act of 1886 itself, may be together cited as the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 to 1886.

"The Animals Order, 1886," being an Order in Council of 16th September 1886, in virtue of the powers vested in the Privy Council under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 to 1886, provides, by chapter 10 of Part IV., dealing with "offences," as follows, viz. :—"(5) If an animal is moved in contravention of . . . a regulation made by a local authority under the provisions of this part or of the conditions of a movement licence thereunder, the owner of the animal and the person for the time being in charge thereof, and the person causing, directing, or permitting the movement, and the person moving or conveying the animal, and the owner, the charterer, and the master of the vessel in which it is moved, and the consignee or other person receiving or keeping it, knowing it to have been moved in contravention as aforesaid, shall each according to and in respect of his own acts and defaults be deemed guilty of an offence against the Act of 1878."

No. 3.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Dunlop v.
Weir.

Dunlop pleaded not guilty, but was convicted on evidence. He took a case for appeal.

The case set forth the regulations framed by the Local Authority of Lanarkshire, which were in operation at the time of the alleged contravention.*

The case further set forth, that at the proof on 25th June "four witnesses were examined in support of the complaint, and from the evidence adduced by them we held it proved that the appellant, who is a cattle-dealer, and resides at Castle Farm, Stewarton, in the county of Ayr, had a sale of cattle at his farm on the 30th of April 1888, when over 400 animals were sold; that eight of these were purchased by Robert Forsyth, grain merchant, Chapleton, Lanarkshire; that after the sale, the purchaser of the cattle, the said Robert Forsyth, depending upon the appellant making the necessary declaration before the cattle were moved, engaged John M'Millan, residing in M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, and who at the time was assisting the appellant at the sale, to drive the cattle from Stewarton Farm to Strathaven; that the cattle were accordingly driven there; that the declaration required by the regulations of the county of Lanark did not accompany the cattle, although the appellant averred that he had

* The material regulations were as follows :—“(1) No cattle shall be moved into the district of the Local Authority of the county of Lanark except as expressly authorised by the regulations. (2) Cattle, fat or store, including cows, may be moved into said district from the district of any local authority in England, Wales, or Scotland, provided they are accompanied by a declaration signed by the owner, specifying the number and description of the cattle to be moved, the place from which and to which they are to be moved, and certifying that each head of such cattle has been in the place from which it is to be moved for at least fifty-six days immediately preceding the date of such declaration, and has not been within that time sold or exposed for sale in any market or fair or in a sale-yard or other public or private place where cattle are commonly exposed for sale, is not and has not been affected with pleuro-pneumonia, and has not been in contact with cattle affected or suspected of being affected with that disease, and that there is not at the time of making this declaration a pleuro-pneumonia infected place or a pleuro-pneumonia infected area within two miles of the farm or premises from which the cattle are to be moved, or within two miles of the road by which the cattle are to be moved.”

“(6) The declarations above provided for shall only be on forms to be supplied by the local authority, those for cattle from other districts at any police station in the county. Every declaration must be signed by the person making the same in presence of a police-constable, who shall countersign it, and add his address, and it must be returned to the office where the form was got, within four days from the date when the form was given out.”

A specimen of a form of declaration required by those regulations was one of the productions at the trial. It was in this form, viz :—“I, _____ of _____, the owner of the under-mentioned cattle, do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare that, to the best of my knowledge and belief, each of the cattle described below is not affected with pleuro-pneumonia, and has not been in contact with cattle affected, or suspected of being affected, with pleuro-pneumonia; and I further declare that each of the cattle described below has been in my possession, on the place or premises also described below, for a period of fifty-six days immediately preceding the date hereof, and has not, within that period, been sold or exposed for sale in any market or fair, or in a sale-yard or other public or private place where cattle are commonly exposed for sale, and that there is not, at the date hereof, a pleuro-pneumonia infected place within two miles of the place or premises from which the cattle are to be moved.”

The form contained spaces for the insertion of the number and description of cattle, the places from and to which they were to be moved, and the signature of the police-officer before whom the declaration might be signed.

made such declaration; that the witness, John McMillan, stated that the declaration (which was not produced) was blank, at all events not complete, and it was proved that it had not been countersigned by a police-constable, in terms of the said regulations issued by the local authority. No. 3.
Nov. 22, 1888.
Dunlop v. Weir.

The appellant contended that, in respect he neither moved nor was he the owner of the cattle nor in charge of them at the time they were removed into the county of Lanark, he was not guilty of the offence libelled. We, however, were of opinion that the appellant was the only person who could have made the declaration, and in permitting the removal of the cattle without such declaration, in the knowledge that they were to be moved into the county of Lanark, was guilty of the offence charged, and we convicted him, and adjudged him to pay the sum of £20 of modified penalty. . . . We also held proved the previous conviction libelled."

The question of law stated in the case was—"In the circumstances above set forth, was the appellant guilty of the offence charged?"

Argued for the appellant;—The cattle were removed, not by the appellant, but, as the case stated, by the purchaser, Forsyth. The appellant could not therefore be held responsible for the offence of removing without due precaution cattle which he had sold and delivered before the removal began. He had no duty to see that, before the purchaser removed them into the Lanarkshire district, he, the purchaser, made a proper declaration. The Justices had stated no fact to justify their conviction. They had simply convicted because they were "of opinion" that the appellant was the only person who could make the declaration, and that, in "permitting" the removal without it, he was guilty of the offence. It was not stated what he could have done to prevent it, and indeed it was clear he could have done nothing. Nothing having been proved to shew that he actively took part in the alleged offence, the conviction was unwarrantable.

Argued for the respondent;—It was clear that the appellant, and he only, could have made the declaration. No one else could have certified that the cattle had been his for fifty-six days, and been free of disease during that time. It had been proved that the appellant accepted the duty of making a declaration, and had given the drover a professed declaration which was not according to the regulations. The Justices ought to have found that as a fact. It would have then been seen that he took active part in the offence. The case could competently be remitted to have the facts properly stated, and that ought to be done.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—On 25th June 1888 the Justices of the Peace for the county of Ayr convicted the appellant of a contravention of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act. A case has been stated, and we have now to determine whether the conviction was right.

The respondent has moved us to remit to the Justices in order that the case may be amended, and the first question which we have to consider is whether we shall make that remit. I am of opinion that we should not. The case has no doubt been very imperfectly stated. But it was the duty of the parties to see that it was well stated, and I assume that it was submitted to them before it was finally adjusted. The imperfections are so great that it would require to be re-stated. I do not think that in the interests of justice it would be safe to direct this to be done. The time that has elapsed is very considerable, and there is of course no record of the evidence.

The charge against the appellant is that he "did move, or cause, direct, and

No. 3.

Nov. 22, 1886.

Dunlop v.

Weir.

permit to be moved," certain cattle from Ayrshire to Lanarkshire "without the said cattle being accompanied" with the statutory declaration.

The only word of which the meaning is not plain is the word "permit." I am disposed to think that it signified that if the permission had been withheld the cattle would not have been moved. But to use an obsolete formula, which is, however, well understood, we may safely hold that the charge against the appellant is that he was actor or art and part in the moving of the cattle.

It appears from the case that on 30th April 1888 the appellant had a sale of cattle on his farm, and that on that day the cattle in question were sold and delivered to Robert Forsyth, a grain merchant in Lanarkshire. It further appears that after the cattle were delivered they were moved to Lanarkshire by Forsyth, or by a person employed by him for that purpose. It is not said that the appellant in any way facilitated the removal of the cattle.

The case states that the appellant averred that he had made the statutory declaration. I presume that this averment was made to the Justices, and if so, it is nothing more than an untrue averment made in the course of the trial. Again, it is set forth that M'Millan, who was engaged by Forsyth to move the cattle, "stated that the declaration (which was not produced) was blank, at all events not complete." But it is not said that the appellant handed the declaration to M'Millan. If that had been so, there would have been room for the inference that the appellant was taking part in the moving of the cattle.

In conclusion the Justices say—"We were of opinion that the appellant was the only person who could have made the declaration, and in permitting the removal of the cattle without such declaration, in the knowledge that they were to be moved into the county of Lanark, was guilty of the offence charged."

I am disposed to think that the Justices were right in holding that the appellant was the person to make the statutory declaration. But the fact that he did not make it would not prove him guilty of the statutory offence. Yet I gather that it was from this circumstance that the Justices held the case to be proved. At least they state no other from which the guilt of the appellant can be inferred. From all that appears in the case the appellant, after he had delivered the cattle to the buyer, did nothing.

No doubt the Justices say, "in permitting the removal of the cattle," &c. This is stated, not as a fact, but as an inference, and there is nothing to support it. It is said that the appellant knew that the cattle were to be moved into Lanarkshire. It is not said that he had this knowledge before the cattle were delivered.

I am not determining any general question. I proceed entirely on the case as it has been stated to us, and on the circumstances therein set forth I am constrained to hold that the appellant was not guilty of the offence charged.

LORD LEE.—The question stated for the opinion of the Court in this case is, whether in the circumstances set forth the appellant was guilty of the offence charged?

The offence charged was that he did move, or cause, direct, and permit to be moved, certain cattle from a place in the district of Ayr into the district of Lanark without the said cattle being accompanied with the declaration required by the regulations made by the Local Authority of the county of Lanark in virtue of the powers conferred by the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1878 to 1886, and the Animals Order of 1886.

It appears from the case that the cattle in question (eight in number) had been sold by the defender on the morning before removal at his farm in the county of Ayr along with some 400 others, and it is stated as matter of fact that the purchaser, depending on the appellant making the necessary declarations before they were moved, engaged a man to drive them from the appellant's farm to Strathaven in the county of Lanark; that the cattle were accordingly driven there; that the declaration required by the regulations did not accompany them; and that although the appellant averred he had made such a declaration, it was proved that it had not been countersigned by a police-constable in terms of the regulations. The appellant's contention is stated to have been that as he neither moved, nor was the owner of the cattle, nor in charge of them at the time they were removed into the county of Lanark, he was not guilty. The finding of the Justices is stated as follows—"We, however, were of opinion that the appellant was the only person who could have made the declaration, and in permitting the removal of the cattle without such declaration, in the knowledge that they were to be moved into the county of Lanark, was guilty of the offence charged."

No. 3.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Dunlop v.
Weir.

If it had been stated as a finding in point of fact that the appellant did permit the cattle to be removed without the required declaration, I could not have answered the question before us in the negative, because I see no reason to doubt that the Justices were right in holding that under the regulations the appellant, as owner, selling and allowing the removal of the cattle, was the only person who could make a declaration of the kind required, and ought to have seen that it was made, not the less so that he ceased to be owner, before the removal into Lanark district took place. But the difficulty is that the essential fact in the case is not stated as a fact, but merely as matter of opinion. That is not sufficient, and I therefore agree that we cannot answer the question stated in the case in the affirmative.

I have had some doubt, however, whether, on the case as stated, we can answer it either way, and whether we ought not to deal with the case as insufficiently stated, and to remit to the Justices to give us the facts on which they founded their opinion. It is not satisfactory to my mind to quash the conviction merely because the Justices have not stated these facts which might or might not if stated have been sufficient to support it. I should have preferred for my own part to make a remit. But as your Lordships are against that course, and there certainly are many objections to getting the case re-stated now, I do not dissent from a finding that in the circumstances set forth it is impossible to find the appellant guilty.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur. I feel sympathy with Lord Lee's doubt whether there is enough stated in the case to enable us to dispose of the question without a remit to have the facts more properly stated. But I think we ought to safeguard somewhat strictly the course of sending such cases back to the inferior Courts for fuller statement. The magistrate is bound, at the time he states the case, to consider well whether he has fully set forth the facts on which his conviction—if he convict the accused—proceeded. It is quite proper to remit it for amendment where some slight alteration is needed to bring out the proper point. For example, a fact of importance might be stated in an ambiguous manner. But in my opinion, no case should be sent back where it is clear that what would be required would be practically the making up of a new one, or where there has been a total failure to state the real point, because

- No. 3. the accused is entitled to be heard on a case stated when the facts were fresh in the mind of the magistrate who convicted him, and ought not to have the appeal heard on a new case stated, at great disadvantage to him, after the circumstances are no longer fresh in the mind of the magistrate.
- Nov. 22, 1888.
Dunlop v. Weir.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative.

J. STEWART GELLATLY, S.S.C.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.—Agents.

- No. 4. GEORGE DUNCAN, Suspender.—Orr.
RICHARD LAING (Procurator-Fiscal of Police Court of Alloa), Respondent.
- Nov. 21, 1888.
Duncan v. Laing.
- HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Rutherford Clark.
Lord Lee.
Justiciary Clerk.
- Public-house—Breach of certificate—Keeping open house—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), (Schedule A)—Alternative charge and general conviction.*—George Duncan, hotel-keeper, Crown Hotel, Alloa, was charged before the Police Court of the burgh of Alloa at the instance of Richard Laing, Procurator-fiscal, with a breach of his certificate, which was in terms of schedule A of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, in so far as on two occasions he did “keep open house, or sell or give out” liquor during prohibited hours. He was convicted of “the offences charged.” In a suspension held, following Murray v. M’Dougall, Feb. 7, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 42, that the conviction was a general conviction on an alternative charge, and must therefore be set aside.

IRONS, ROBERTS, & Co., S.S.C., Agents.

- No. 5. WILLIAM MUIR, Appellant.—Salvesen—Shennan.
THOMAS CAMPBELL (Procurator-Fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court of Renfrewshire), Respondent.—James Clark.
- Nov. 21, 1888.
Muir v. Campbell.
- HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Rutherford Clark.
Lord Lee.
Justiciary Clerk.
- Public-house—Breach of certificate—Hawking spirits—Selling or giving out on Sunday—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35).*—The holder of a public-house licence received a bottle from a person on a Sunday, outside his licensed premises, and having entered his premises and filled the bottle with whisky, he thereafter, a short distance outside the premises, delivered it to the purchaser. Held that he was properly convicted of a breach of his certificate by selling or giving out liquor on Sunday.
- Complaint—Specification—Public-House—Breach of certificate—Name of person to whom liquor sold.*—It is not essential to the relevancy of a complaint for breach of a public-house certificate by selling or giving out liquors on Sunday that the name of the person to whom the liquor was given out should be stated.
- Observed that where the prosecutor knows the name of the person he ought to state it, and where he does not know the words “to the prosecutor unknown” ought to be inserted.
- WILLIAM MUIR, who held a public-house licence for the “Peesweep Inn,” Neilston, Renfrewshire, was, on 1st June 1888, charged before the Justice of Peace Court for Renfrewshire with a contravention of his licence. The alleged contravention was that the accused did, “at his licensed premises at Peesweep Inn aforesaid, sell or give out liquors,” on Sunday, the 6th May 1888. He objected to the relevancy of the complaint; that the description of the locus “at his licensed premises at Peesweep Inn” was insufficient; and further, that it was not averred to whom the prosecutor was to prove he had given out liquors.
- These objections were repelled. He was convicted on evidence, and fined £5.

He took a case for appeal, in which these questions were stated, viz., No. 5.
 (1) Whether the complaint was relevant? and (2) Was the accused legally convicted? Nov. 21, 1888.
 Muir v.
 Campbell.

The following was the statement of facts in the case:—"The Justices held it proved that on the afternoon of the Sunday in question Felix Mulholland, farm-labourer, Stanley Muir, in the county of Renfrew, while walking along the public road leading to Johnstone, in company with his son, David Mulholland, a labourer, residing in Paisley, halted at the gable of the Peesweep Inn (which is licensed as a public-house only), where the accused was at the time standing. Mulholland took something out of one of his pockets and handed it to the accused. Mulholland then walked slowly westwards, while the accused went into the inn, where he remained for a few minutes, when he came out and followed Mulholland. Having overtaken him, the two returned and walked eastwards till they had repassed the inn by about 400 yards, where, on the public road, the accused handed Mulholland something which he put into his breast pocket, and the two then parted—Mulholland proceeding eastwards and the accused returning towards his inn. Two police-constables (Donald Sinclair and John Collie) who had seen the manœuvre followed Mulholland, but, having been observed by the accused, he (the accused) shouted to Mulholland and drew his attention to the constables by pointing towards them with his stick, whereupon Mulholland took from his said breast pocket something clear in appearance and threw it into a peat field. The two constables, who had witnessed this from a distance of 400 yards or thereby, proceeded to the spot and there found a glass bottle (produced in Court with its contents) containing two gills or thereby of whisky, of which they took possession. The constables were 200 yards distant from Mulholland when the 'clear something' was thrown away by him, and the point at which the 'something' was thrown away and where the bottle was found was 800 yards distant from the inn."

Argued for the appellant;—The objections to relevancy ought to have been sustained. It was said in the complaint that the offence was committed "at" the licensed premises. This was too vague a specification of the locus. Secondly, the proof shewed that an offence had been committed several hundred yards from the premises. It was clear from the case that the offence, if any, was not a selling of liquors in the licensed premises, but an offence of hawking spirits. That was an offence against sec. 16 of the Public Houses Act, 1862.* A publican who sold spirits on the street or elsewhere outside his premises might be guilty of hawking spirits,<sup>1</sup> but could not be said to be thereby selling or giving out liquor in his premises in contravention of his certificate, which provided that he "do not open his house for the sale of any liquors, or permit or suffer any drinking therein, or on the premises thereto belonging, or sell or give out the same . . . on Sunday." It was of no consequence that the accused was seen to enter the licensed premises to obtain the liquor. Everyone who hawked spirits must have some store from which they were taken.

But thirdly, the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that the specification of the alleged offence did not state to whom the liquor was alleged

* The Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), provides, sec. 16,—“Every person hawking spirits or other exciseable liquors shall thereby be guilty of an offence, . . . and on being convicted of such offence, shall forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding £10, and in default of immediate payment, shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding sixty days.”

<sup>1</sup> Hamilton v. Inglis, May 22, 1879, 4 Couper, 244, 6 R. (Just. Cases) 45.

No. 5.

Nov. 21, 1888.
Muir v.
Campbell.

to have been sold. The accused was entitled to that information in order to prepare his defence. If such information were withheld by the prosecutor, a man might be charged twice in respect of the same facts.<sup>1</sup> Even if the prosecutor did not know the person to whom the liquor was sold, he must at least state that it was sold to a man whose precise designation was unknown.

The Court intimated that they did not require any argument from the respondent on the two first points.

Argued for the respondent on the third point;—It was not indispensable that the prosecutor should state the particular person to whom the liquor was supplied.<sup>2</sup> The ends of justice could not be allowed to fail because he might be unable to do so. Here it was not known to the respondent who the man was until the proof, when it appeared that a witness named Mulholland, who was called by the accused in his defence, was the man. The accused could have received no information from a statement that the man was “to the prosecutor unknown,” and he had suffered no prejudice from the want of it. The prosecutor in the case of Lauder failed because no locus being given, the objection was to the jurisdiction, and was unanswerable.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Three objections are taken to this conviction. The first of these was as to the specification of the locus. It was said that it was vague and insufficient. I think Mr Salvesen did not very strongly press that objection, and I am not surprised, for I think “at” a place is a good description of the locus, and we are familiar with indictments in the High Court in which the charge is that a certain act was done “at or near” a particular place. If the word “at” did not mean something more than “near,” the words “or near” would mean nothing.

The next objection is that there is no specification of the person or persons to whom the liquor is said to have been supplied in contravention of the certificate. It appears that the fact is that the prosecutor did not know who that person was, and that that person appeared as a witness in exculpation, and that it was only in that way that he came to be known. If therefore the prosecutor had alluded in the indictment to the person to whom the liquor was sold, he could only have stated that the person was to the prosecutor unknown. Now, I think that the complaint should have said, when no person was named as the person to whom liquor was supplied, that it was supplied to a person “to the prosecutor unknown.” In such a case it is important that these words should be present—the prosecutor should be tied up to this, that if he attempt to prove something inconsistent with his ignorance of who the person was—if he endeavour to lead evidence that the liquor was supplied to some particular person whom he knows—the prosecution must fail. The prosecutor could not be allowed to prove a case inconsistent with his want of knowledge of the person to whom the liquor was sold. It is true that there appears to have been a practice of not inserting in such charges the name of the person with whom the transaction of selling in breach of certificate, or shebeening, or hawking, is to be proved to have taken place. I observe that in two cases quoted by Mr Salvesen—that of Hamilton (4 Couper, 244) and that of M'Dougall (24 S. L. R. 352)— the prosecutor did not give the names of these persons. I think that is a bad practice. The prosecutor, when he knows who the person is to whom the liquor was sold, ought to state that person's name in the complaint, and I should be sorry to encourage these officials to withhold information material to the question and which was in their possession. But here we must consider the fact that it is stated to us by the counsel for the prosecutor that he could not give the name. We have therefore to consider whether the failure to insert the words "to the prosecutor unknown" was so important as to make it our duty to quash this conviction because of their absence from the complaint. Now, I think that I cannot put the matter in that positive form. We cannot quash the conviction on that ground.

<sup>1</sup> Lauder v. M'Dougall, Feb. 19, 1887, 1 White, 327, 24 S. L. R. 352 (Lord Young).

<sup>2</sup> Fitzimmons v. Linton, July 18, 1861, 23 D. 1301; Greenhill v. Stirling, March 19, 1885, 5 Coup. 602, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 37.

No. 5.

Nov. 21, 1888.

Muir v.
Campbell.

There remains the merits and the objection that the case is one of hawking and not one of contravention of certificate. It seems that on a certain Sunday a person was seen by the police at the gable of this public-house, and that the publican came out and received something from him and carried it in, and then came out again, and at a little distance from the house (it is of no consequence whether the distance was little or great) handed something to the man. The man being followed by the police, threw away a clear object, which turned out to be a bottle containing whisky. The magistrates were justified in finding as they did, that the appellant received that bottle from the man to fill and to hand to him. I hold that to be a breach of certificate by selling or giving out the whisky at a time when the licence did not permit that to be done. It is said by Mr Salvesen that it was not a breach of certificate, and that the moment the appellant came out of the public-house with the whisky, his possession and his dealing with it were the acts of one hawking whisky, and that the prosecution should have been against him as such. I disagree with that altogether, and think it was the offence of giving out liquor, or no offence at all.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have felt the objection to relevancy to be important in so far as it is founded on the omission to give the name of the person to whom the appellant is said to have furnished the whisky. But it is plain that the appellant has not suffered prejudice from that omission. He knew who it was to whom he had furnished it, for he produced him as a witness at the proof. When that is so, I am reluctant to allow the appellant to escape from the consequences of an offence against his certificate. I take it that we may hold that the prosecutor did not know who the person was who obtained the whisky. That almost appears from the case itself, and it has been distinctly stated by the prosecutor's counsel. In these circumstances, I am not disposed to quash the conviction because the words "to a person to the prosecutor unknown" are not in the complaint. At the same time, I concur in thinking that in all cases in which the prosecutor is in a position to specify the name he ought to do so.

On the merits I have not felt much difficulty. We were invited to consider whether what the appellant did was a breach of certificate, or constituted the offence of hawking spirits, or was no offence at all. I have no hesitation in saying that it was a breach of certificate. It was not hawking. It would certainly be unfortunate if it were held no offence at all.

LORD LEE.—I agree. The only difficulty is as to the objection that no person was named as the person to whom whisky was said to have been given out, and

No. 5.

Nov. 21, 1888.
Muir v.
Campbell.

that it was not said that the prosecutor did not know who the person was. But I think that the only essential element in such a charge of breach of certificate is that it be sufficiently set forth that liquor was given out on Sunday in breach of certificate. I agree that when the prosecutor is in a position to do so he ought to give notice in the complaint of the person to whom he means to prove that the liquor was given out. But that notice is not essential to relevancy. It is a rule of procedure to give it, and if the prosecutor gives no such notice, and states that the person is not known, he is not entitled to prove that the giving out was to a certain individual known to him. I think that here the facts themselves shew, apart from what has been stated to us by counsel, that we have a peculiar case to deal with. It is not a case of a publican openly trafficking in breach of his certificate. It was that these two men, who, as it afterwards appeared, are named Mulholland, were seen to go up to the gable of the public-house, where they met the publican and handed him a bottle with which he disappeared into the licensed premises, and then after a short time came out and gave them the bottle back with whisky in it. They were seen from a considerable distance by the police. I am satisfied that the prosecutor was not in a position to give the name, and a statement that the name was unknown would have given no additional information to the accused.

THE COURT answered the questions in the affirmative, and refused the appeal.

STURROCK & GRAHAM, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 6.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Kidger v.
M'Phee.

JOHN KIDGER, Suspender.—Rhind.

DONALD M'PHEE (Procurator-Fiscal of Glasgow Police Court), Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Ure.

Police—Affixing bills to building without authority—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 149, 131, 132—Exclusion of review except by Circuit Court.—The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, by sec. 149 imposes a penalty on "every person who is guilty of any of the following disorderly acts or omissions . . . in any street—namely," inter alia (subsection 28), "who affixes without the consent of the proprietor and occupier to any building any bill or notice." The occupier of a building was charged under this section with affixing "without the consent of the proprietors" certain bills to the wall of the building occupied by him, and was convicted. In a suspension the Court held that the section did not apply to the case of the occupier or owner of the building placing bills upon it, but only to third parties, and therefore that the charge and whole proceedings thereon were outwith the statute and illegal, and quashed the conviction.

Objection to the competency of the suspension founded on sections 131 and 132 of the statute, which exclude review except by the next Circuit Court, repelled, on the ground that the complaint and conviction were ex facie illegal.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clerk.
Lord Lee.
Justiciary
Clerk.

JOHN KIDGER, designing himself as a "fancy letter writer," was charged before the Police Court, Glasgow, with a contravention of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, section 149, subsection 28,* in so far as he did on the

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 149, enacts that "every person who is guilty of any of the following disorderly acts or omissions on any turnpike road, or in any public or private street or court, or on the outside of any building adjoining the same, or in any common stair, shall in respect thereof be liable to any penalty not exceeding the respective amounts, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding the respective periods hereinafter mentioned. . . ." (Subsection 28).—"Every person who writes

19th day of October 1888, "affix, or cause to be affixed, to the wall of a building, or part of a building, occupied by him, in West Nile Street, aforesaid, three or thereby bills or other notices, without the consent of M'Dougall & Hamilton, house-factors, No. 109 West George Street, Glasgow, proprietors of said building, or part of a building." No. 6.
Nov. 22, 1888.
Kidger v.
M'Phee.

Kidger stated as an objection to the relevancy of the complaint that the prohibition in the subsection libelled was not directed against either proprietor or occupier—the latter of which he was—but against third parties. The magistrate repelled the objection, and thereafter, on the evidence adduced, found "the charge of having caused to be affixed the bills as libelled proven," convicted Kidger "of the offence libelled," and find him 10s. 6d., with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment.

Kidger presented a bill of suspension, in which he stated;—" (4) The complaint on which the complainer was convicted as aforesaid was, and is, irrelevant. The subsection or clause founded on does not apply to an occupier, but to a person other than an occupier or proprietor of the subjects referred to, and no offence is disclosed. (5) The complainer is tenant and occupier of the subjects on the outer wall of which he, in connection with his business, caused to be placed certain samples of the work done by him in the premises, and it is upon this complaint of the alleged proprietors that the prosecution resulting in the complainer's conviction proceeded."

The respondent, the procurator-fiscal, objected to the competency of the suspension, on the ground that the remedy of the suspender, if aggrieved, was by appeal to the next Circuit Court at Glasgow.*

Argued for the respondent;—The objection, as stated by the suspender himself, was to relevancy. He said that the magistrate had misconstrued the statute in holding that the particular complaint made a relevant charge under it. It followed that there was no review in the High Court, and that the review, if any were competent at all, must be by the Court at the next Circuit. The case was not like those of which Marr v. M'Arthur<sup>1</sup> was the type, where the complaint was that the proceedings of an inferior Court were plainly outwith the statutory authority they upon, soils, defaces, or marks any wall, fence, hoarding, or building with chalk or paint, or in any other way, or who without authority affixes or causes to be affixed to any church, chapel, or schoolhouse, or without the consent of the proprietor and occupier, to any other building, or to any wall, fence, or hoarding, any bill or other notice, or who wilfully breaks, destroys, or damages any part of such wall, fence, hoarding, or building, or any tree, shrub, seat, or other thing," shall, in respect thereof, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s., or in default of payment, to imprisonment for fourteen days.

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 131, enacts that "No warrant granted by the magistrate, or citation made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, and no charge or complaint, and no proceeding or trial before the magistrate, and no order or sentence of the magistrate thereon, or the extract thereof, shall be quashed or vacated for any misnomer, or informality, or be subject to suspension, reduction, advocacy, or appeal, or to any other form of review or stay of execution, unless in manner and on some one or more of the grounds hereinafter mentioned."

Section 132 enacts,—“Any person who feels aggrieved by any order or sentence of the magistrate may, within fourteen days after its date, appeal to the Court of Justiciary at the next Circuit Court, to be held at Glasgow in the manner and under the rules, limitations, and conditions contained in the Act for abolishing Heritable Jurisdictions (20 Geo. ii. c. 43) on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the magistrate, wilful deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments, incompetency or defect of jurisdiction, but on no other ground.”

<sup>1</sup> Marr v. M'Arthur, March 28, 1878, 5 R. (Just. Cases) 38, 4 Couper, 53.

No. 6.
 Nov. 22, 1888.
 Kidger v.
 M'Phee.

professed to have, and disclosed no offence at all. In such cases the High Court exercised jurisdiction, because the proceedings were funditus null, and the High Court would then keep the inferior Courts from exceeding their province. But in cases of mere relevancy the High Court had always held that the excluding clauses applied.<sup>1</sup> Now, the subsection founded on made it a condition of leave to affix bills to a building that the proprietor's consent and the occupier's also must be obtained. The charge relevantly stated that the consent of one of these, the proprietor, had not been obtained. The Legislature had placed on the person doing what without authority would be a contravention the onus of shewing that he had the authority of both owner and occupier. If he himself were occupier he had none the less to get the owner's consent. If this were not the meaning of the statute the clause would have run "without the consent of the owner or occupier," instead of "without the consent of the owner and occupier." It was said that the statute only applied to third parties. There was no reason why it should not apply to the occupier. Besides an occupier might be to some extent exactly in the position of any third party. The letting to him of premises as a shop would not justify his using them as a place for sticking bills. The Legislature intended, inter alia, to prevent him from such use of it, and the magistrate would have to judge in any individual case whether the affixing of any bill or sign of which complaint was made was done with the express or implied authority of the proprietor. In many instances, it would be clear that the proprietor's implied authority was not exceeded. But in some, and this among the number, it might be equally clear that it was. Here the suspender, having taken an office on the first floor, the windows of which looked to the back, had used the front wall for the display of theatrical advertisements. He was not occupier for that purpose.

Argued for the suspender;—No offence was charged. Indeed the terms of the complaint excluded any offence,—for in charging as an offence a thing said to be committed without the authority of the proprietor and occupier it at the same time stated that the accused himself was the occupier. How then could he lack the authority of the proprietor and occupier? It was clear that the statutory prohibition extended only to third persons, i.e. to persons who neither owned nor occupied the building whereon the bills were affixed, for the introductory words of section 149, which must be applied to all the subsections, spoke of the acts specified as "disorderly acts." The words of the statute were amply satisfied by the construction that it was intended to prevent strangers from placing bills on a building without full authority. No doubt the statute spoke of "every person" who should do these acts, and these words prima facie applied to the occupier, but they must be reasonably construed secundum subjectam materiem.<sup>2</sup>

If the statute did not apply to occupiers at all, but was only intended to prevent a breach of good order by third parties, there was no offence libelled, and the proceedings were funditus null. It followed that the High Court would give redress, and was the proper Court to which to apply, and in practice such redress had always been given.<sup>3</sup> What a sus-

<sup>1</sup> Mackenzie v. Lang, Nov. 9, 1874, 3 Coup. 29, 2 R. (Just. Cases) 1; Walker v. Lang, Nov. 25, 1867, 40 Scot. Jur. 89, 5 Irv. 506; De Belmont v. Lang, June 28, 1871, 43 Scot. Jur. 572, 2 Coup. 95; O'Brien v. M'Phee, Oct. 30, 1880, 4 Coup. 375, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 8.

<sup>2</sup> Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 75.

<sup>3</sup> Marr v. M'Arthur, supra; Wemyss v. Black, March 19, 1881, 4 Coup. 419, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 25; Stirling v. Murray, June 13, 1883, 5 Coup. 265, 10 R.

pendent applied for in such a case was not review of a sentence, but the setting aside of an incompetent proceeding. No. 6.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Kidger v.
M'Phee.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Act of Parliament under which the prosecution before us is raised is an Act for the purpose of the “better regulation and government” of Glasgow in matters of police. Under that Act there fall a large number of police offences. Under sec. 149, we find it prescribed that “every person who is guilty of any of the following disorderly acts or omissions on any turnpike road, or in any public or private street or court, or on the outside of any building adjoining the same, or in any common stair,” shall be liable to the various penalties therein described, and then follow the subsections, including that founded on in this complaint.

Now, I think it would be contrary to every principle of construction to consider any of the offences under the different subsections out of relation to the opening clause. The things specified in the subsections are “disorderly” acts. A great many of the things described are therefore of a nature which concern the public. They are interferences with public rights, with amenity, or with public decency. The particular subsection we are here concerned with is the 28th, which provides that “every person who writes upon, soils, defaces, or marks any wall, fence, hoarding, or building with chalk, or paint, or in any other way,”—that is to say, the subsection points at disfigurement of the building, something of the nature of nuisance—“or who without authority affixes, or causes to be affixed, to any church, chapel, or schoolhouse, or without the consent of the proprietor and occupier, to any other building, or to any wall, fence, or hoarding, any bill or other notice, or who wilfully breaks, destroys, or damages any part of such wall, fence, hoarding, or building, or any tree, shrub, seat, or other thing,” shall be liable to a penalty. If that subsection, and particularly that part of it which applies to occupiers, can be read consistently with the view that it makes a provision as between the police authorities and the public, that no one is without the authority of the owners and occupiers to affix bills to any building, I think we have no right to place upon it a strained construction, so as to read it as applying, not only to such questions, but also so as to give the police magistrate jurisdiction to settle as between proprietors and tenants matters which are already amply provided for by the ordinary law of the land, and which are not matters of police regulation.

Now, the first question is why these words “proprietor and occupier” are in the statute at all. I think the reason is evidently this, that the subsection contemplates that a third party who interferes with any building by affixing to it notices or bills is doing something “disorderly,” unless he is doing it with the consent of both the proprietor and the occupier. It is something disorderly as to the proprietor, because he has a right to prevent his property from being disfigured, and it is disorderly towards the occupier, because it is out of the question, even if the proprietor allowed it, that anyone should paste up bills upon it without the occupier’s consent.

Now, taking that view, we have an intelligible meaning for those words, and do not need to adopt the strained construction to which I have alluded. That is my opinion on the merits of the case. The clause is not one under which (Just. Cases) 59; Bell v. M'Phee, July 18, 1883, 5 Coup. 312, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 78; Craig v. M'Phee, March 14, 1883, 5 Coup. 243, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 51; Collins v. Lang, Nov. 3, 1887, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 7, 1 White, 482.

---

No. 6. the occupier can be brought before the Police Court and fined and bound over to find caution for good behaviour, merely because of the placing of a notice on the building without the proprietor's consent.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Kidger v.
M'Phee.

That being so, the remaining question is whether this suspension is incompetent in respect of the provisions as to review which are contained in the Glasgow Police Act. That turns on the further question whether the complaint is in its essence a bad complaint in the sense of being a lawless proceeding. It is clear, that if all that is wrong with a complaint be that it is defective in some detail of relevancy or specification, the clause excluding review would apply, and the remedy of the accused must be sought at the next Circuit Court. But this Court has always held that it is entitled to interfere to prevent the carrying out of a judgment which has followed on proceedings in themselves lawless. Here we have it said to be an offence that the suspender "did, on the 19th day of October 1888, affix, or cause to be affixed, to the wall of a building, or part of a building, occupied by him, . . . three or thereby bills, or other notices, without the consent of M'Dougall & Hamilton, house-factors, proprietors of said building, or part of a building." Now, being of opinion that that is no offence at all, and therefore that the complaint set forth nothing which in law can justify a conviction, I think that we ought to interfere to quash this sentence. In coming to this conclusion, I go on the same grounds as were expressed by Lord Young in the case of Collins v. Lang (1 White, p. 489),—"Now, it has been frequently decided in this Court, without referring to Acts of Parliament or any provisions that may be referred to as to the method of review, that if the procedure and conviction upon a complaint are ex facie illegal, remedy may be given by way of suspension."

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 7. JAMES M'FARLANE (Procurator-Fiscal of Fifeshire), Appellant.—
J. A. Reid—Shaw.
Dec. 7, 1888.
M'Farlane v.
Birrell.

GEORGE BIRRELL, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Wallace.

Master and Servant—Contravention of Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 37), sec. 2, sec. 23—Miner—Contract that employer may retain wages for "rent" after employment has ceased.—The Truck Act, 1831, which applies to certain trades, including miners, in sec. 2 enacts "That if in any contract hereafter to be made between any artificer . . . and his employer any provision shall be made directly or indirectly regarding the place where, or the manner in which, or the person or persons with whom the whole or any part of the wages due or to become due to any such artificer shall be laid out or expended, such contract shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void." Sec. 23 enacts "That nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent any employer of any artificer, or agent of any such employer, . . . from demising to any artificer . . . the whole or any part of any tenement at any rent to be thereon reserved . . . nor from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for or in respect of any such rent. . . . Provided always that such stoppage or deduction . . . shall not be in any case made from the wages of such artificer unless the agreement or contract for such stoppage or deduction shall be in writing, and signed by such artificer." Sec. 9 imposed penalties on employers entering into contracts declared to be illegal by the Act.

No. 7.

The regulations of a coal company, under which workmen were engaged, contained this article,—“4. All houses . . . leased or granted to workmen are to be held as leased or granted only during the period of the workman's engagement. Immediately on the expiration of said engagement the workman must remove from the subjects let to him. . . . Failing removal he will thereby become bound to pay as rent, for the subjects occupied by him, the sum of one shilling for each day or part of a day he shall occupy the same after the expiration of his said engagement . . . . The said company shall be entitled to retain the wages due to the workman until the terms of this article are fulfilled, and shall also be entitled to deduct from said wages such sums as shall become payable by the said workman under this article.”

Dec. 7, 1888.
M'Farlane v.
Birrell.

The pay-tickets signed by the workmen were in the following terms:—
“Received payment of £ . . . . and I hereby authorise you to deduct from my wages in future, so long as I am in your employment, the amount of my house rent. . . .”

In a complaint against the manager of the coal company, on the ground that an agreement with a workman in terms of the regulations was a contravention of the Act, held that as the written agreement contained in the pay-ticket signed by a workman was limited to the period of his employment, and did not authorise deduction of one shilling per day for his subsequent occupation in terms of article 4, the stipulation in that article that the employer should be entitled to make that deduction was a contravention of the Act, and did not fall under sec. 23, in respect (1) that it was not covered by the written agreement; and (2) that the payment for occupation without a title was not rent in the sense of the Act; and (3) that these payments were not due by a person employed.

GEORGE BIRRELL, general manager for the Dunfermline Coal Company HIGH COURT. of the Muircockhall Colliery, was charged before the Sheriff Court at Lord Justice-Dunfermline under a summary complaint at the instance of the Pro- Clerk.
curator-fiscal with a breach of the Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 William Lord Ruther-IV. c. 37). The complaint set forth that the accused “did, contrary to furd Clerk.
the Act 1 and 2 William IV. chapter 37, section 2,* on or about the 23d Lord Lee.
Justiciary
Clerk.

* The Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 William IV. c. 37), which is entitled “An Act to prohibit the payment in certain trades of wages in goods or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm,” enacts by sec. 2 “That if in any contract hereafter to be made between any artificer in any of the trades hereinafter enumerated† and his employer any provision shall be made directly or indirectly respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the person or persons with whom the whole or any part of the wages due or to become due to any such artificer shall be laid out or expended, such contract shall be and the same is hereby declared illegal, null, and void.”

Section 23 provides “that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent any employer of any artificer, or agent of any such employer, from supplying or contracting to supply to any such artificer any medicine or medical attendance, or any fuel or any materials, tools, or implements to be by such artificer employed in his trade or occupation, if such employers be employed in mining . . . nor from demising to any artificer, workman, or labourer employed in any of the trades or occupations enumerated in this Act, the whole or any part of any tenement at any rent to be thereon reserved : . . . nor from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for or in respect of any such rent, or for or in respect of any such medicine or medical attendance, or for or in respect of such fuel, materials, tools, implements, . . . or for or in respect of any money advanced to such artificer for any such purposes as aforesaid, provided always that such stoppage or deduction shall not exceed the real and true value of such materials, tools, implements, . . . and shall not be in any case made from the wages of such artificer unless the agreement or contract for such stoppage or deduction shall be in writing, and signed by such artificer.”

† By sec. 19 workmen employed in coal-mines are among those to whom the Act applies.

No. 7.

Dec. 7, 1888.
M'Farlane v.
Birrell.

day of January 1888, at the colliery office at Muircockhall, parish afore-said, contract with James Lowe, miner, residing at Townhill of the burgh of Dunfermline, working at said colliery during the fortnight ending 8th February 1888, that the said Dunfermline Coal Company should be entitled to retain the wages due to the said James Lowe until his removal, on the expiration of his engagement with said company, from premises that had been leased or granted to him by said company for the period of his said engagement, and should also be entitled to deduct from said wages such sums as should become payable by the said James Lowe until such removal from said premises, and did thereafter, contrary to said section of said Act, enforce or seek to enforce said contract."

Objections were stated to the relevancy of the complaint, which were repelled by the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie). On the case going to trial the Sheriff-substitute found the accused not guilty. The procurator-fiscal obtained a case for appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The following was the statement of facts in the case:—"George Birrell was general manager for the Dunfermline Coal Company at their Muircockhall Colliery, and James Lowe was a miner in the employment of the said company, and lived in a house belonging to the company. The Dunfermline Coal Company, which recently took over the business of another coal company, called the West of Fife Coal Company, are members of the Fife and Clackmannan Coal Owners Association. That association adopted in 1874 certain regulations and conditions of employment, copies of which have since been regularly kept posted up by the Dunfermline Coal Company and their predecessors in conspicuous places at their collieries, and their employees have been requested to make themselves acquainted with their contents. Article 4 of the regulations is as follows:—"All houses, gardens, &c., leased or granted to workmen by the said company are to be held as leased or granted only during the period of the workman's engagement under article 1. Immediately on the expiration of said engagement the workman must remove from the subjects let to him, and leave the same in good order. Failing removal, he will thereby become bound to pay as rent, for the subjects occupied by him, the sum of one shilling for each day or part of a day he shall occupy the same after the expiration of his said engagement, without prejudice nevertheless to the said company ejecting the said workman from the said subjects. The said company shall be entitled to retain the wages due to the workman until the terms of this article are fulfilled, and shall also be entitled to deduct from said wages such sums as shall become payable by the said workman under this article."

"Throughout his employment at the colliery, Lowe signed pay-tickets in the following terms:—"Received payment of £ , being in full of all wages due to me; and I hereby authorise you to deduct from my wages in future, so long as I am in your employment, the amount of my house rent, water, and school rates, the usual charges for medical attendance, and for sharpening and keeping in order my working tools; also, the price of coals supplied, and any cash that may have been advanced to me."

"The engagement of the said James Lowe was by the fortnight, and on or about 25th January 1888 he contracted with the said George Birrell to continue in the employment of the said company for the fortnight ending 8th February as formerly, upon the conditions specified in said article 4 of the regulations.

"In January last the men employed at the Dunfermline Coal Company's Collieries gave in notices that their engagements would cease on Saturday, 11th February 1888, which was the pay-day for the fortnight ending 8th February. No. 7.

"On the morning of 11th February 1888, a notice to the following <sup>Dec. 7, 1888.</sup> effect was posted up by the instructions of the said George Birrell—viz., <sup>M'Farlane v. Birrell.</sup> that 12s. would be deducted from the wages of the workmen living in the colliery houses."

"The sum of 12s. was fixed by the advice of the law-agent of the Coal Owners Association, in order, on the one hand, to vindicate Rule 4, and, on the other hand, not to press too heavily on the men by the retention of a larger sum from their wages."

"Upon Lowe applying at the office for his wages, payment thereof was refused by the cashier, acting under the instructions of the said George Birrell, except under deduction of 12s. as above mentioned, which was to be retained for rent to become due until the house occupied by Lowe should be vacated in terms of said Rule 4. Lowe refused to accept of his wages under said deductions, but after some negotiations between the law-agents for the coal owners and for the miners Lowe's wages, less 12s., were, on 15th February (along with the wages of several other men, from whom similar deductions were made) handed by the coal owners' law-agent to the miners' law-agent, and afterwards received by Lowe. The 12s. kept back was ultimately paid to Lowe on his resuming work about three weeks after, he being charged only the ordinary rent for his house during the strike, as if he had been in the employment of the Dunfermline Coal Company throughout."

The case stated that the ground on which the Sheriff-substitute found the accused not guilty was "that article 4 of the general regulations, with the agreement contained in the fortnightly pay-tickets signed by Lowe, did not constitute a contravention of the statute referred to."

The questions of law stated in the case were:—"(1) Whether the complaint set forth any relevant case of contravention of the statute libelled? (2) Whether the said article 4 and its proposed enforcement by the said George Birrell were within the prohibition contained in the 2d section of the said statute? (3) Whether the said article 4 and its proposed enforcement by the said George Birrell were within the exceptions recognised by the 23d section of the said statute?"

Argued for the appellant;—There could be no doubt that the contract which the respondent had enforced was struck at by the Truck Act, unless (1) the sum of 1s. per day which he had retained was "rent" for a house let to the miner; and (2) there was a written contract, which, under section 23, would justify the contract to retain for rent. But the respondent could not discharge the burden of justifying himself by shewing that even one of these things was the case. In the first place, the deduction he had made was not for "rent," for the house was by the regulations of the respondent himself only let to the miner "during the period of the workman's engagement," and the deduction in question was the penal deduction of 1s. for each day the miner stayed in the house after he had ceased to be in the employment and was bound to leave the house. Again the respondent failed on the second point also. He appealed to the miner's signature of the pay-tickets as justifying the deduction. But by signing them the miner only consented to the deduction "so long as I am in your employment," which he ceased to be before the deduction was made.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The deduction was for "rent" in the ordinary meaning of that word, for it was for the agreed-on price of the occupation of a heritable subject. In legal language the term "rent" was applicable to a payment to be made under a lease for occupation after the

No. 7.
 Dec. 7, 1888.
M'Farlane v.
Birrell.

termination of the period for which the subject was originally let.<sup>1</sup> Now, article 4 of the regulations under which the miner served treated the sum of 1s. per day as "rent." (2) The deduction was justified by written contract signed by the miner, as section 23 of the Truck Act required, for the miner had, as the case stated, given his written consent to deduction for "rent."

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—James Lowe was employed as a collier by the Dunfermline Coal Company, and it appears that while he was in their employment he leased a house belonging to the company at a certain rent. His engagement was by the fortnight, and was made in terms of article 4 of the regulations adopted by the company in 1874. From that article it appears (first) that the house which he occupied was leased to him only during the period of his employment; (second) that he was bound to remove from it immediately on the expiration of his engagement; (third) that he was bound to pay a shilling a-day for each day that he should occupy it after the term of removal; and (fourth) that the "company shall be entitled to retain the wages due to the workman until the terms of this article are fulfilled, and shall also be entitled to deduct from said wages such sums as shall become payable by the said workman under this article." The effect of this last stipulation is that the wages earned at the termination of his engagement were not payable till he removed from his house, and thus there was left in the hands of the employers a fund from which they could deduct such moneys as were due by him if he did not remove at the appointed term.

Lowe gave notice that his engagement should cease on Saturday, 11th February 1888, but he did not then remove from his house. The stipulation which I have just quoted was enforced against him. His wages were retained until he removed, and ultimately a portion was deducted in part satisfaction of the debt which he had incurred by occupying the house after the term of removal. A complaint was brought for breach of the Truck Act. The Sheriff-substitute assoilized the accused. A case has been stated, and we are now asked to determine whether his judgment was right.

It is plain—and indeed it was admitted—that the agreement contained in the regulations is a breach of the 2d section of the Truck Act. For it is a contract between an artificer and his employer, by which provision is made for the expenditure of wages due to the artificer. But the respondent maintains that it is taken out of the operation of the 2d section, in respect that it is an agreement permitted by the 23d, as being an agreement for the deduction of rent from wages due to the artificer.

In order to make out this defence two things are requisite—(first) that the agreement shall be in writing, and (second) that the rent which is to be deducted from the wages shall be rent within the meaning of the statute.

The written agreement on which the respondent relies is set forth in the case. It authorises the employer "to deduct from my wages in future, so long as I am in your employment," house rent, taxes, &c. I am unable to hold that this is an agreement to deduct rent from wages after the employment has ceased. It is in operation only so long as the employment continues, and it ceases with the employment, for the words "so long as I am in your employment" qualify the verb "deduct," and in my opinion limit the agreement to the period of the employment. No. 7.

<sup>1</sup> Juridical Styles (Heritable Rights), i. 579.

This is perhaps sufficient for the decision of the case. But we may, I think, also consider the general question which was argued to us. Dec. 7, 1888.
Macfarlane v.
Birrell.

The 23d section enacts that nothing contained in the statute shall prevent an employer "from demising to any artificer a tenement at any rent to be thereon reserved, and from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for or in respect of any such rent." The question is, what is the meaning of the word "rent" as it is used in this section? Does it cover the sum stipulated for the occupation of the tenement after the period of removal, and when the right to occupy has ceased?

The words of the statute are, "demising a tenement at any rent to be reserved thereon." To demise is a technical phrase of English law. I take its Scottish equivalent to be, to let on lease, and the parties were agreed that this was its meaning. It therefore appears from the very words of the statute that the rent, and the only rent which may be deducted from wages, is the rent which is reserved on a demise or due under a lease. Money which is not due under a lease is not rent within the meaning of the statute. Rent is the money payment reserved on the demise or payable by the lease for the possession under the demise or lease. There can be no rent where there is no lease, and no rent can become due after the lease has come to an end.

The respondent maintained that the sum deducted from wages satisfied these conditions. It is called rent by the contracting parties. That is not material, for it does not become rent merely because it is so named. The true plea in defence is that it is due under a lease and for the occupation of the subject let, and therefore that it is rent within the meaning of the statute.

But when the agreement is examined it is plain that the money is not due under a lease. It did not begin to become due until the only lease which existed came to an end, and though it may be due in respect of the occupation of the subject which had been let, it is not due in respect of occupation under a lease. It is due because the lease had come to an end, and because the tenant continued in the illegal occupation of the subject. It is due no doubt by contract, but the contract under which it is due is wholly apart from the lease. For it did not come—and could not come—into operation until the lease with which it was associated had terminated. For these reasons I cannot hold the money which was thus payable to be rent in any ordinary or legal sense of that word, or to be rent within the meaning of the Act.

If we pursue the inquiry we can easily determine what it truly is. We are not told the amount of the rent payable by Lowe, but it is plain enough that a shilling a-day was greatly in excess of it. If it were not, the stipulation would not effect its purpose, viz., to enforce removal by making it too costly for the tenant to remain in possession. The stipulation is penal in substance though not in form, and the money due under it is in fact and in law nothing else than liquidate damages for a breach of the contract of lease.

I hold therefore that there had been a violation of the Act. The Legislature permitted the employer to deduct rent according to the ordinary meaning of that term, in order that he might recover from the artificer what was due in respect of his occupation of the tenement under his lease. I do not think that it was intended that the statute should be used as a means of enforcing removal or recovering damages.

No. 7.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Macfarlane v.
Birrell.

LORD LEE.—I concur, and would only add that there is a narrower ground on which I arrive at the same result.

By the 23d section of the statute it is enacted that nothing therein contained shall extend to prevent any employer making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any artificer, workman, or labourer employed in any of the enumerated occupations.

My opinion is, that in order to be within that section, and so saved from the operation of the statute, the rent referred to in the contract must be rent due by a person "employed."

The payment in respect of which the deduction referred to in this case was to be made was not rent due by a person employed, but a sum alleged to be due in name of rent by a person who had ceased to be employed as such artificer or workman, and in respect of his having thereby become bound to remove or pay that amount.

I think that such a contract is not saved by clause 23 from the operation of the statute.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark in its entirety. I think it is plain that the object of the form of regulations adopted at this colliery was if possible to bring this practical arrangement for a charge of a shilling per day within sec. 23 as being "rent." With that view article 4 of the regulations was framed. I think it is plain that the sum is not rent in the sense of sec. 23, but is a deduction intended to cover a sum for the retaining of his house by the miner, when he has no right to do so as a tenant, he having ceased to be in the employment, and therefore having no right to remain. But sec. 23 only refers to an arrangement under which, as part of the contract, the employer provides a house for the workman, and becomes entitled to deduct rent which has become due at the date of the deduction, and nothing more. It does not empower the employer to deduct for future occupation of a house, whether by agreement for lease or otherwise. The consent in the receipt given by the workman in this case, that the employer shall deduct from his wages his "house rent," is a perfectly competent contract under sec. 23. It is nothing more than an arrangement that the house rent which has become due shall be kept by the master at settling time. It means no more. If it did mean more—if it meant a consent to deduction as specified in article 4 of the regulations—it would not fall under sec. 23, and would be illegal under sec. 2. I therefore think that the first two questions should be answered in the affirmative, and the third in the negative.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first and second questions in the affirmative, and the third question in the negative; sustain the appeal; reverse the determination of the inferior judge, and decern."

JAMES AULDJO JAMIESON, W.S.—WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Wallace, A.-D.

JAMES SWAN.—M<sup>r</sup> Lennan—Ross Stewart.

Indictment—Relevancy—"Falsely and fraudulently"—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), secs. 5 and 8.—The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 5, enacts that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to specify by any nomen juris the crime which is charged, but it shall be sufficient that the indictment sets forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime." Section 8 enacts that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done or omitted to be done 'wilfully' or 'maliciously,' or 'wickedly and feloniously,' or 'falsely and fraudulently,' or 'knowingly,' or 'culpably and recklessly,' . . . or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged, but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which, according to the existing law and practice, its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant."

An indictment against J. S. bore,—“You did pretend to J. H. . . . that you were possessed of a sum of money amounting to £1900 . . . and that you were about to receive payment of the said money, and did thus induce him to give you credit to the amount of £46, 9s. 9d., which you failed to pay and had no intention of paying.”

Objection to the relevancy in respect that the facts set forth did not constitute a crime repelled (diss. Lord Young), on the ground that under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, the words “falsely and fraudulently” were to be read into the indictment as qualifying the word “pretend,” and that when this was done the indictment was relevant.

H. M. Advocate v. Dingwall, May 26, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 69, over-ruled.

Indictment—Specification—Relevancy.—In an indictment the charge against the accused was that he did make certain pretences to an innkeeper, “and did thus induce him to give you credit to the amount of £46, 9s. 9d., which you failed to pay and had no intention of paying.” Held that the indictment was irrelevant, in respect of failure to specify the money or goods constituting the sum of which the innkeeper was to be proved to have been defrauded.

JAMES SWAN was indicted before the High Court of Justiciary on 10th December 1888. The indictment against him bore,—“The charge against you is that, on 7th November 1887, and on various subsequent occasions between said date and October 1888, at the house in Harbour Street, Stranraer, occupied by John Hamilton, publican, you did pretend to the said John Hamilton that you were the son of a farmer in Aberdeenshire, and possessed of a sum of money amounting to £1900 in the Grand Trunk Railway, and that you were about to receive payment of the said money, and did thus induce him to give you credit to the amount of £46, 9s. 9d., which you failed to pay and had no intention of paying.”

At the first diet at Dumfries the indictment was objected to as irrelevant, in respect that the acts charged were not alleged to have been committed falsely and fraudulently, and did not constitute a crime. This objection was recorded, and reserved for the Court of the second diet.

Argued for the prisoner ;—I. The facts stated did not infer crime. There was no statement that the alleged pretences had been “false and fraudulent.” The fact of fraudulent intention was of the essence of the crime, and ought to have been set forth.<sup>1</sup> Though the old form of indictment had been abolished in favour of a system under which the public prosecutor had to state merely the acts done by the accused which were said to be criminal, it remained necessary, in terms of sec. 5, that the indictment should set forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime. Here it did not, because there was nothing in it which involved fraud. The word “pretend” did not involve that element. It merely signified to put forward a claim whether truly or falsely, e.g., in the expression to “pretend to knowledge” of a thing. The law never in dubio attached a sense to an ambiguous word which gave it a meaning implying crime,

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Mure.
Lord Adam.
Lord Lee.
Lord Kinnear.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Well-wood.
Justiciary Clerk.

<sup>1</sup> H. M. Advocate v. Dingwall, May 26, 1888, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 69.

No. 8.
—
Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

but the contrary.<sup>1</sup> It was said that qualifying words must be read into the charge in virtue of section 8* of the recent statute. But section 8 must be read in the light of section 5, which, while abolishing the use of nomina juris in indictments, provided that "it shall be sufficient that the indictment sets forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime," thereby leaving it to be implied that the necessity for setting forth facts which were necessary to constitute a crime still existed.

II. The indictment was not sufficiently specific. The result of the alleged fraudulent representations was not sufficiently stated. The prisoner was entitled to know what the case was which was to be proved, whether it was to be said that he obtained cash, or goods, or board and lodgings. A mere statement of the total money result of the alleged fraud was insufficient.

Argued for the Crown ;—The first question was one of the construction of the Act of 1887. It was said that it did not authorise the omission of words which were of the essence of a criminal charge. But this was an error, as appeared from several examples of charges given in the schedule. Thus, in the specimen charge of uttering a forged bill, the schedule stated, as "you did utter as genuine a bill on which the name of John Jones bore to be signed as acceptor, such signature being forged," words which did not negative the innocence of the accused, and left unexpressed the essential element that he knew of the forgery. So also was it in the specimen charge, "you did utter as genuine a letter bearing to be a certificate of character of you . . .," &c. There it was not stated that the accused knew that the writing did not bear a true signature. Indeed, the only exception to the rule that it was not necessary to use such words as "falsely and fraudulently" or "wickedly and feloniously" was where the use of qualifying expressions was necessary to distinguish between one crime and another, as in the specimen charge of fire-raising, where, because fire-raising might be either wilful or by culpable carelessness, and would be a different crime, according as it was done in the one way or the other, the schedule provided that the indictment should say "and this you did wilfully" or "culpably and recklessly," as the case might be.

As to the decision in the case of Dingwall,<sup>2</sup> the reasoning in it was inconsistent with that in the more recent case of Barrie,<sup>3</sup> and the Court was here asked to review the judgment in the case of Dingwall.

II. As to the second point, the Crown moved for leave to amend the libel.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I should not be prepared to find this indictment rele-

<sup>1</sup> H. M. Advocate v. Ker, Nov. 26, 1860, 3 Irv. 627 ; M'Kenzie v. Whyte, Nov. 14, 1864, 4 Irv. 570 ; H. M. Advocate v. Smith & Barry, April 9, 1868, 1 Couper, 29 ; Rae v. Linton, Dec. 11, 1874, 3 Couper, 67.

* The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), section 8, enacts that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done, or omitted to be done, 'wilfully' or 'maliciously,' or 'wickedly and feloniously,' or 'falsely and fraudulently,' or 'knowingly,' or 'culpably and recklessly,' or 'negligently,' or in 'breach of duty,' or to use such words as 'knowing the same to be forged,' or 'having good reason to know,' or 'well knowing the same to have been stolen,' or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged ; but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which, according to the existing law and practice, its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant."

<sup>2</sup> 15 R. (Just. Cases) 69.

<sup>3</sup> Supra, p. 5.

vant in its entirety, because I think that the statement which it makes as to the result of the pursuer's alleged fraudulent representations is not sufficiently specific. The prisoner is entitled to be informed by the Crown what things, whether money or clothing or food, he is charged with obtaining by fraudulent representations. This indictment only states that the person said to have been defrauded was induced "to give you credit to the amount of £46, 9s. 9d.," and that is quite insufficient.

But I understand that the indictment has been brought before us for the consideration of a different question, and one of general importance. But for that the case is not such a one as would have been brought to the High Court at all, as it is not a case of serious consequence in its own nature. Therefore I think it right to express my opinion upon the relevancy of the earlier part of the indictment, and upon the objection to it that it does not state that the pretences of the prisoner were made "falsely and fraudulently."

The Act of Parliament known as the Criminal Law Procedure Act, 1887, was obviously intended to put an end to the syllogistic form of indictment which contained major and minor propositions, the major setting forth that a certain thing or course of action was a crime, and the minor that the accused was guilty of it, in respect he had at a certain place and time committed certain acts, and had committed thereby the crime set forth in the major proposition. The statute was intended to reduce the charge to a statement of the acts which the prisoner is to be proved to have done, leaving it to the Judge to direct the jury whether these acts, or part of them, being proved, constituted a crime. It provides by its clauses, and especially by the schedule, certain illustrations of the statement which the public prosecutor may make as a good charge. It will be seen by the schedule that where the consequences of the acts the accused did must be of a certain nature in order to there being anything criminal in the acts, these consequences must also be set forth in the statement. That may be done for one of two reasons, either to shew the completion and effect of the crime, or to shew the distinction between one crime and another. Thus, in stating a crime of violence the prosecutor is to state whether the consequence was death or injury to the person assaulted. In the former case the crime is of a higher and different quality from what it is in the latter. Again, in certain cases it is not sufficient to detail the act done, but it is necessary also to detail the intent with which it was done. An example of this is the case of fire-raising. To charge a mere act of fire-raising is not sufficient to inform the accused of what is laid to his charge, and accordingly the prisoner is entitled to be told whether it is intended to be proved that his acts were wilful or merely culpable. The statute by its schedule, therefore, provides for that case, and I shall afterwards refer again to it. Subject to the exceptions I have now mentioned, there is, I think, no instance in which it is necessary to do more than to state the acts which the accused has done. This charge, I find, states the acts done by the accused, and the case is one to which the ordinary rules for the charging of the accused under the Act exactly apply. Section 2 of the Act provides that the public prosecutor (and it is he only, it is worthy of remark, that can indict in the manner specified by the Act) may frame his indictment in the form provided by the schedule. If, therefore, he use a form consistently with the schedule, and does not in so doing fail to observe anything provided by the Act itself, he frames a relevant indictment. Now, I think that in this case the public prosecutor has used a form in accordance with the

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

schedule. Not merely so, but he has taken advantage of the provisions of section 8 of the statute. The Legislature seems to have desired by section 8 to make it plain that the absence of the words "wickedly and feloniously," "falsely and fraudulently," and the like, in the schedule was intended, and therefore it is so stated in section 8, and not left to be gathered from the mere fact that the specimen charges in the schedule are given without such words. It is said to be intended by section 8 that these words, these "qualifying expressions," are only to be omitted when they are mere expletives or epithets as distinguished from words essential to a statement of the offence itself. I do not quite follow the meaning of the expression "expletive or epithet" as applied to words which the Act says would, according to the law and practice prior to its date, have been "necessary in order to make the indictment relevant." I do not understand why these words needed to be dispensed with by the Act if they were merely expletive words, and, indeed, in some crimes the whole question of relevancy depended, under the former law, on the presence or absence of these words, and falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition is an instance of a case in point. The words "falsely and fraudulently" (sometimes used only at the beginning of the narrative, sometimes repeated more than once in stating the charge) were essential to the charge. The presence of them made the statement of the acts done a relevant charge. They were not expletive but essential. Further, though some of the words in section 8 may be said to have been expletive words, it is clear that that was not the reason for which they are now to be excluded, because they are excluded along with others which are not mere adjectives at all, but words which, under the older law, were essential to relevancy. Such expressions as "knowing the same to be forged," or "knowing the same to be stolen," were in their nature expressions on which the relevancy depended. The schedule gives effect to these views. In no case but one (to which I have already alluded) are these qualifying expressions to be found, and that case is the one in which it is necessary to give them in order to state to the accused person what particular crime he is said to have committed. For that reason the charge of fire-raising is to state, "and this you did wilfully," or "culpably and recklessly," obviously because without such words the prisoner would not know whether he was charged with one of two crimes or with the other. That illustration is the exception which proves the rule. In other cases the words "shall be implied" where they would formerly have been essential to relevancy.

I therefore conclude that while this indictment is irrelevant on the special ground I indicated at the outset of my opinion, it is relevant in other respects.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur with the Lord Justice-Clerk in thinking that this indictment is irrelevant, and I suppose in accordance with what will be the opinion of all your Lordships we shall find it so, and that this finding will be accompanied with an expression of opinion upon another point which has been argued to us, and upon which, as we shall dismiss the indictment as irrelevant, I do not think we are entitled to give any opinion.

I assume that this indictment would be relevant if the words "falsely and fraudulently" were inserted before the word "pretend," and the question is whether they are to be held as inserted by the provisions of section 8 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. Upon this question I think there is a good deal of difficulty. When I became a Judge I think I was alone in the opinion that the syllogistic form of indictment, as it has been called, was inexpedient, and that it should be discontinued. No. 8.

 I remember indicating that opinion upon one occasion, and it drew from my Dec. 10, 1888.
 brethren the strongest condemnation. I thought the major and minor proposi- Her Majesty's tion and subsumption all out of place. I thought it was an evil that the Advocate v.
 prosecutor should be required to commit himself to the name of the crime which Swan.
 he charged, and that if before the trial he committed an error in naming the offence, calling it theft instead of embezzlement, or robbery instead of theft, the ends of justice should thereby be defeated. Accordingly, it is entirely in accordance with my opinion that the syllogistic form should be departed from, and that the Court should reserve to itself to put a name upon the offence if the facts amount to a crime at all. But I had thought that it was so obviously proper that the prisoner should be informed of the whole facts alleged against him, and that these, upon a plain and simple statement of them, should amount to a crime by the law of the country, that it was with a feeling at least akin to surprise that I saw a different view entertained by others, that it was not necessary to set forth what amounts to a crime in law in plain and simple language, but that it was enough to set forth what amounts to no crime at all, and imply words which would make it a crime if read in. The question is—and it was marvellous to have it seriously argued—whether the words “falsely and fraudulently,” admitted to be necessary to the charge, should be omitted or put in, or whether they should be put in the body of the indictment or upon the back of it. I asked in a former case if any reason could be suggested for habitually omitting them. The only suggestion that could be made, and the only suggestion that occurred to me, was, that it was to save printing—the expense of printing the words “falsely and fraudulently.” It is as expensive to print them on the back of the indictment as in the body of it, and if economy was the object —and economy was always exceedingly laudable—one could see many other things in which economy of that kind might be promoted. For instance, the words “The Right Honourable James Patrick Bannerman Robertson” might be omitted, which would save a good deal of printing, what we are really interested in being the words “Her Majesty’s Advocate.” Then it is required by that economical provision of the statute that the procurator-fiscal’s signature should be prefixed with the words “by authority of Her Majesty’s Advocate.” Why not imply that? That is printed, but it is a great object to save the cost of the words “falsely and fraudulently.” I am myself very much disposed to try, even by being ingenious, to read the statute so as to make it in this respect sensible and useful. It may not be fatal to the indictment that words are wrongly spelled, or that there is false grammar, but why persist in wrong spelling or false grammar because the statute says that no objection can be taken on that account? Even if there was no objection to the omission of these words, why appeal to the whole Court to save the expense of printing them in the body of the indictment rather than upon the back?
 By printing them there we would conform to the rule in England, and, so far as I know, in every civilised country, and in this prior to this Act of Parliament, that we must set forth in the plainest and simplest language possible what amounts to crime. The economy of printing is not to save any possibility of blunder. There is no doubt the words to be implied are printed in the statute.
 Put them in the indictment and there is no room for objection.

This is a case like that of Dingwall where a young man, who had been in a bank in Perth as a clerk, and had been promoted to be under-teller in a branch of the bank in Leith, represented to a piano-seller that he had been employed

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

as a teller in the bank at Perth, and had been promoted to a similar position in the bank in Leith, and thereby obtained a piano on the three years' system, and immediately raised money upon it by selling or pawning it. I held that he had there been guilty of a crime, although he made no false or fraudulent representation at all. He used the property in a dishonest, criminal, and punishable manner, and the case was represented as really one of theft. The prosecutor argued the case in the view, which I thought quite a right one, that if a man intending to raise money by selling or pawning a piano hires it on the three years' system, and at once turns it into money, he is guilty of a crime although he has made no false representation at all. It was represented as really a case of theft. I asked why it was not charged as theft, and so submitted to the jury! But it was charged as falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and the falsehood represented to the Court consisted in this, that whereas the accused was only a clerk in a bank in Perth, or assistant-teller, and had been promoted to an assistant-tellership in the bank at Leith, he had said that he was the real teller. I thought there that there was no proper charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition irrespective of the words "falsely and fraudulently." I do not think that you will find that the serious crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition is thought to consist in whether a man was the son of a crofter and said he was the son of a farmer, or a teller in a bank, while he was assistant-teller, or such trivial distinction. I am not in favour of lengthening the lash of the criminal law. Publicans and others may be left quite well to take care of themselves and to see that the customer or proposed customer does not deceive them in such a way. The law which punishes the obtaining of goods upon false pretences applies to a totally different case. That was my view in the case of Dingwall—a view which I still entertain. In this case I see the greatest difficulty in holding that the indictment is relevant without these words being expressed. I do not think that the schedule has been followed here in framing the indictment. The schedule referring to "Norah Omond" is not a schedule for the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. The schedule does not give forms for particular crimes, but forms without any reference to known crimes, and in this respect it is deficient. I am not for encouraging prosecutors to omit words which are necessary to the criminality of what they charge merely to save printing.

As to the latter part of the indictment, referring to the result of the false representations, I am clearly of opinion that the indictment is irrelevant, and I think the proper course to take is to find the libel irrelevant and to dismiss it.

LORD MURE.—I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk. In the first place, I think that the indictment is not sufficiently specific in the statement of the result of the prisoner's alleged representations.

On the larger question which has been argued, I am clearly of the same opinion as the Lord Justice-Clerk. The plea to be considered is that stated in the objection taken in the inferior Court, and is that the indictment is irrelevant in respect that the acts charged are not said to have been committed falsely and fraudulently. Now, it appears to me that the objection is met by section 8 of the statute. An indictment in such terms as we have before us would, under the old law, have been irrelevant in respect of the absence of the words "falsely and fraudulently." But section 8 seems to me to make it as clear as words can make it that the indictment is not now irrelevant in consequence of the absence of these words, because it provides "that it shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done, or omitted to be done, 'wilfully' or 'maliciously,' or 'wickedly and feloniously,' or 'falsely and fraudulently,' or 'knowingly,' or 'culpably and recklessly,' or 'negligently,' or in 'breach of duty,' or to use such words as 'knowing the same to be forged,' or 'having good reason to know,' or 'well knowing the same to have been stolen.'" It is not necessary to use such expressions in framing an indictment in which, according to the former law, they would have been necessary, because the statute goes on not in permissive but in imperative words, that "such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which, according to the existing law and practice, its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant."

On that single ground I hold the objection to be bad.

LORD ADAM.—I think that our only duty is to construe the statute, and accordingly I express no opinion on the question whether it might have been otherwise or better expressed. I proceed to consider whether the objections to this indictment are well founded. There are two objections. One of them raises a general question, the other refers to the manner in which the result of the alleged false representations in this particular case is libelled at the close of the indictment. Now, on the general objection which relates to the relevancy of the allegation as to the representations made by the prisoner, I could have understood its being enacted that while words which the Legislature held unnecessary to a criminal charge should no longer form part of indictments, still an indictment must contain a statement of all that was necessary to constitute the essential elements of a crime. But it is clear that this Act is not constructed upon that principle. I think it is clear beyond doubt, when we look at the part of the schedule which relates to the charge of uttering, that it is not. The Court is to imply the qualifying allegation "in every case in which, according to the existing law and practice, its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant." I think that means that we are to imply not merely superfluous or unnecessary words, but words that would have been essential prior to the passing of the Act. On that matter my opinion is clear. Let me put an illustration. Suppose we had the person who made pretences to Norah Omond placed at the bar charged in the very words of the schedule, every argument I have heard used in this case would have been equally applicable to an objection to that indictment. If so, how could we have so interpreted the Act, with the very words of the schedule before us, as to have held the indictment to be irrelevant? If not, how can we hold this general objection to be good? I can see, therefore, no doubt that "falsely and fraudulently" must here be implied.

But I am of opinion that there is room for doubt upon one point. While I am quite ready to imply a qualifying allegation when necessary, I think that difficulty may arise when more than one of the qualifying expressions could be implied, and the question of what crime is to be regarded as charged will depend upon which of them is to be implied. One example of such a case is that of fire-raising, which may be wilful or culpable and reckless, and will be a different crime according to whether it is the one of these or the other. That particular case is provided for by the statute itself, but I am not certain that it is the only one, and, in the event of others arising, I wish to reserve my opinion.

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

No. 8.

Dec. 10, 1888.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Swan.

In this case I agree in thinking it a fatal objection that the result of the alleged false representations is not relevantly libelled.

On these grounds I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD LEE.—I concur in thinking the indictment irrelevant for want of a specific statement of the result of the alleged fraudulent pretences. Apart from that objection, I think the indictment is otherwise relevant and sufficiently specific. I think section 5 must be read along with section 8, and when that is done, I think the indictment sets forth that the prisoner “did falsely and fraudulently pretend to John Hamilton that you were the son of a farmer in Aberdeenshire, and possessed of a sum of money in the Grand Trunk Railway, and that you were about to receive payment of the said money.” So reading in these words, I cannot doubt that the indictment is relevant. I therefore concur with the Lord Justice-Clerk. I reserve my opinion on the question mentioned by Lord Adam.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam both in the opinion he has expressed and in the reservation he made. I should have great difficulty in holding relevant an indictment which would set forth one offence or another according to the words which should be read into it from section 8. I am not satisfied that the instance of fire-raising is the only one to which such a difficulty may apply.

LORD TRAYNER.—On the question of the construction of the Act of 1887 I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk. There is no room for the objection to relevancy but for the supposed inconsistency between section 5 of the Act and section 8. If section 8 stood alone, there could be no question that the Court are not only entitled but bound to imply the words “falsely and fraudulently.” It is conceded that if these words were read into the indictment, the objection would not be good. But here, as in the case of Dingwall (a judgment which is practically being reviewed in this case), it has been stated that what is required is that there shall be set forth facts relevant to constitute a crime. I take that as meaning that the indictment must set forth in itself facts relevant and sufficient to constitute a crime without anything being added. Now, I think it is impossible to read section 5 as it was read by the majority in the case of Dingwall. If we did, we should be obliged to say that it is inconsistent with the schedule, an idea which cannot be readily entertained, for we should endeavour to read the various portions of a statute as agreeing with each other. Now, here, I think we can read section 5 and section 8 together with the schedule, and if we do we find that there may be a relevant indictment which does not set forth facts which, taken by themselves, would constitute a crime. Of this the best illustration is that put by myself during the argument, that of the uttering of a cheque altered in the sum it contains. It would be libelled that the accused did utter it as genuine. But an essential of the crime would of course be wanting—the element that he well knew it to be forged or altered—and there would be nothing said against him except what was quite consistent with his innocence. But if section 8 is read along with section 5, you then have what is otherwise lacking. The words will be read into the indictment which have been called, I think improperly, “expletive” words. The law implies that they are to be held as present as matter of statement.

Another view is derived from the object of the Act. It has been said that the object of it was to simplify procedure. I think it was also to enable the statement of the charge to be made in more popular and easy language. It is more easy for the panel that he be told what it is said that he did in language more intelligible to him than was the case under the former system. The qualifying expressions are not necessary to the panel or the jury. The Judge will take care that unless what the law considers a crime is laid before the jury, the panel will not be convicted.

While, therefore, I agree with all the Court that the statement of the result of the fraudulent pretences is irrelevant, I think that quoad ultra the indictment is relevant.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree on both points with the Lord Justice-Clerk, and have nothing to add.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—According to the constitution of the Court I have no voice in the judgment. But it is right that, in accordance with what I understand to be the practice of the Court, I should indicate that my opinion coincides with that of the majority of your Lordships.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Repel the objections to the relevancy of the libel stated at the previous diet, that the acts charged are not alleged to have been done 'falsely and fraudulently,' but in respect the libel does not sufficiently specify the advantage or benefit which the panel obtained by the use of false and fraudulent pretences, find the libel irrelevant, and dismiss the same."

"Whereupon, on the motion of the Advocate-depute,

"THE COURT deserted the diet against the panel pro loco et tempore."

CROWN AGENT—AGENT FOR THE POOR—Agents.

MRS JANE WRIGHT OR M'KENZIE AND MARGARET M'KENZIE, Appellants.
—J. C. Thomson—Macdonald.

DONALD M'PHEE (Procurator-Fiscal of Police Court, Glasgow), Respondent.—Ure.

No. 9.

Dec. 29, 1888.
M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee.

Jurisdiction of Circuit Court—Winter Sitting in Glasgow—Appeal—Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, sec. 1—The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 46.—Held that the Winter Sitting of the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow is, notwithstanding the provisions of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, held under the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, and that (following Davidson v. Gray, Jan. 6, 1844, 2 Broun's Just. Rep. 9) therefore it is not competent to hear or dispose of any appeals thereat.

JANE WRIGHT or M'KENZIE and her daughter Margaret were charged before the Police Magistrate at Glasgow at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Police Court with the crime of theft. The magistrate sentenced the mother to thirty days' imprisonment, and ordered her daughter to be detained for five years in an industrial school.

HIGH COURT
(GLASGOW).
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Justiciary
Clerk.

They appealed to the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow held during the Christmas recess of the Court of Session.

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that it was excluded by the provisions of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, sec. 1.*

* The Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, sec. 1, enacts,—“Whereas, from the great increase of criminal offences in Scotland, it is expedient that provision should be

No. 9.

Dec. 29, 1888.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phee.

Argued for the respondent;—By the provisions of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, sec. 1, under the authority of which the Winter Circuit Court at Glasgow was held, the Judges had power to sit “till the whole criminal business to be brought before the Court at that time is concluded, and no longer.” It had been decided under this clause that it was incompetent to appeal any case, even though criminal, to the Winter Glasgow Circuit Court.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the appellants;—The Act cited, and the decision in Davidson v. Gray, did not apply. This Court was not now sitting under authority of that Act, but under the authority of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.† It was sitting as the High Court of Justiciary, and was empowered to sit till the whole criminal and civil business was disposed of.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question of the competency of this appeal has been very properly raised, as it is desirable that the meaning of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, should be distinctly ascertained with reference to these appeals. Having given the point the best consideration in my power, I have come to be of opinion that the hearing of appeals at this Winter Circuit is not competent. The question does not now come up for the first time, for in the case of Davidson v. Gray, 2 Broun, 9, that question was decided, and the judgment has ever since been acquiesced in, and accordingly no appeals have since been heard at this Winter Court except in one case, which was heard and disposed of with the consent of both parties. I accept that decision as binding, and the real question before the Court now is, whether the Act of 1887 makes any alteration upon the ruling given in that case. I am of opinion that the Act of Parliament (9 Geo. IV. c. 29) under which that decision is given is still in force, and is the Act under which this Court is held. The Act expressly provides by section 1, that from and after the passing of this Act the Circuit Court to be held at Glasgow during the winter recess of the Court of Session “shall made for holding additional Circuit Courts of Justiciary, and that means should be taken for facilitating criminal trials in Scotland, be it therefore enacted . . . that it shall and may be lawful for the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, and the said Court is hereby authorised and required on or before the twentieth day of November in every year, to fix by Act of Adjournal a day for holding a Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow, for trying criminal causes, during the recess of the Court of Session in the end of December and beginning of January yearly, and to name two of the Judges of the said High Court to discharge the duty of the said Circuit Court; and such Circuit Court shall be held at Glasgow accordingly, and shall be continued from day to day until the whole criminal business to be brought before the Court at that time is concluded, and no longer.”

---

<sup>1</sup> Davidson v. Gray, Jan. 6, 1844, 2 Broun's Just. Rep. 9.

† The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 46, enacts,—“The Lords Commissioners of Justiciary shall hold such sittings for the trial of criminal causes as may be necessary, on the requisition of the Lord Advocate, subject to such orders as Her Majesty in Council may issue ordaining Courts to be held, and every sitting of the Lords Commissioners, whether under the existing law and practice, or under this Act, or under such Order in Council, shall be a sitting of the High Court of Justiciary and the ceremonies of fencing and closing Courts by proclamation of a macer shall be discontinued, and it shall not be necessary for the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary to remain in any town for a longer time than is required for the disposal of the criminal and civil business falling to be disposed of at such sitting.”

be continued from day to day until the whole criminal business to be brought before the Court at that time is concluded, and no longer." I do not find any clause in the Act of 1887 repealing this provision. The first part of clause 46, relied on by Mr Thomson, refers to a Court being held on the requisition of the Lord Advocate, which is just the old practice of fixing High Court sittings anywhere when business made them advisable, but which practice has of late years been only applied to Edinburgh and the district of the Lothians. All the other Courts have been held under the Acts appointing Circuit Courts, or under the Orders in Council and Act of Adjournal following on them of 1881, appointing additional circuits. I do not think, therefore, that the first part of clause 46 has any bearing on the question, for it distinctly recognises that Courts are still to be held under the existing law and practice after the passing of the Act, and makes this alteration only, that these Courts are to be called sittings of the High Court of Justiciary. The intention of the Act on this point I understand to be that a Circuit Court is no longer to be considered a thing of itself, but that the sittings of the High Court of Justiciary all over the country should fall into one arrangement, provided that the High Court does not neglect to appoint those Courts to be held which under the existing law and practice were in use to be held. But while this Court is a sitting of the High Court, it is held under the existing law and practice, and that existing law and practice, as set forth in the Act of 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, is that it is to sit "till the whole criminal business is disposed of, and no longer." It has been said that the Courts which used to be called Circuit Courts have been abolished by the Act of last year. I do not think so, and this is clearly shewn by clause 48,* and by the dispensing clauses authorising cases in certain circumstances to be remitted to the High Court or to a Court of a neighbouring circuit district. I am therefore of opinion that the Act of Geo. IV. is still in force, and that obeying its very plain terms this Court is held for the hearing of criminal cases only, and that the hearing of civil appeals is not part of the business to be transacted during its sitting.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties, the Lord Justice-Clerk finds that the Winter Sitting of the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow is held under the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, and that it is not competent to hear or dispose of any appeals thereat."

J. M. & J. H. ROBERTSON—PARTY—Agents.

---

* Sec. 48,—“It shall not be necessary for the High Court of Justiciary to proceed to any town for the purpose of holding any Court in use to be held in such town when there are no cases indicted for the sitting of the Court at such town, or when so many of the persons indicted thereto have pleaded guilty before the Sheriff at the first diet as to make the holding of a special Court inexpedient, and in that event such cases as remain for trial may be ordered to be brought up at another Court, in manner hereinafter provided . . . and any appeal which may have been taken to such Court shall be heard by the High Court of Justiciary in Edinburgh, or may when both parties consent be heard at any sitting of the High Court of Justiciary at any place.”

No. 10. JAMES KIRKLAND GALLOWAY (Procurator-Fiscal of Zetland), Appellant.—
R. K. Galloway.

Jan. 14, 1889.
 Galloway v.
 Weber.

JOHN WEBER, Respondent.—M' Lennan.

Public-house—Hotel certificate—Bona fide traveller—The Public-houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), Schedule A, No. 1.—A resident of the town of Lerwick who had been absent for some months arrived there by steamer early on a Sunday morning, and went home and slept there. At noon of the same day he went to a hotel where he was supplied with refreshments by the waiter, to whom he was unknown, on the mere statement that he had arrived by the steamer, and was a bona fide traveller.

Held (1) that he was not a bona fide traveller; (2) that the waiter had not made sufficient inquiry to justify his regarding him as such; (3) that the master of the hotel must be held, in respect of the actings of his servant, to have been guilty of a breach of his certificate.

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.
 Lord Adam.
 Lord Trayner.
 Justiciary
 Clerk.

JOHN WEBER, hotel-keeper, Grand Hotel, Lerwick, was charged before the Justices of Peace for the county of Zetland at the instance of James Kirkland Galloway, Procurator-fiscal of Zetland, with a contravention of the Public-houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, by selling, in contravention of the certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors, at the Grand Hotel foressaid, held by him, to Thomas Nisbet, residing in Union Street, Lerwick, who was neither a lodger in said hotel nor a traveller, one pint of beer or other exciseable liquor.

He pleaded not guilty, and the magistrates after hearing evidence acquitted him.

The Procurator-fiscal craved a case, which was accordingly stated for him by the magistrates as follows;—"The facts, as admitted or proved, are that the said Thomas Nisbet returned home to Lerwick on 9th September 1888, after an absence of seven months. That he was unknown by sight to the accused, or to the waiter Charles Dautschmann after mentioned. That the steamer arrived at Lerwick on the 9th September, at an hour variously stated as between 12.30 a.m. and 2 a.m. on Sunday morning. That Thomas Nisbet on the arrival of the steamer went to his home in Union Street, Lerwick, and went to bed. That by the steamer two commercial travellers came, who were met by the said John Weber's servants, and who lodged in the Grand Hotel that night. That after the arrival of the steamer, the whole occupants of the hotel went to bed. That between 11 a.m. and 12 noon on the said 9th September, Thomas Nisbet proceeded to the Grand Hotel, Lerwick, in company with Robert Tait, Albany Street, Lerwick, who went for the purpose of visiting his sister-in-law Barbara Jaromson, who is a domestic servant in the Grand Hotel, and twice asked Charles Dautschmann, waiter in the said Grand Hotel, to supply him with drink, and was refused. That he thereupon stated that he had come by the steamer, and was a bona fide traveller, but did not inform the waiter that he had been at home and slept. That he was thereupon supplied with a pint of beer. Between the arrival of the steamer, the time of which was known to Mr Weber, and the time when the beer was supplied, all the parties had had a night's sleep, and about twelve hours had elapsed. That Robert Tait, who accompanied him, did not ask for, and was not supplied with drink."

The questions of law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary were as follows,—“Was Thomas Nisbet a bona fide traveller, within the meaning of the Acts, when so supplied with liquor? Was the said John Weber or his servant justified in supplying the said Thomas Nisbet with refreshments, on the faith of the statement made by him? Was the said John Weber properly acquitted by the magistrates?”

The appellant argued ;—The questions fell to be answered in the negative. (1) Nisbet, after the arrival of the steamer at Lerwick, went to his own home, where he slept all night. He could in no sense be said to be in itinere. He was therefore not a bona fide traveller in the sense of the statute. (2) Weber knew that the steamer had arrived early on Sunday morning, and even though the waiter was ignorant of this, he had not made such inquiry into the circumstances of the case as justified him in regarding Nisbet as a bona fide traveller entitled to refreshments. (3) It followed that the acquittal was improper.

No. 10.

Jan. 14, 1889.
Galloway v.
Weber.

The respondent argued ;—On the first question, the onus of proving that Nisbet was not a bona fide traveller lay undoubtedly on the appellant,<sup>1</sup> and he had failed to satisfy the magistrates on the point.

They had taken the view that Nisbet's journey must be held to have been uncompleted, and they had good grounds for it. Neither Weber nor the waiter knew Nisbet by sight, and Weber was aware the steamer had just arrived in Lerwick. They could not possibly know that Nisbet resided in Lerwick, and had been to his own home. But even the fact that he had gone home did not prevent his being regarded as a bona fide traveller. A person had been held a bona fide traveller where he merely went from his house for a walk,<sup>2</sup> where he had walked to drink water at a spa only  $2\frac{1}{4}$  miles from his own home,<sup>3</sup> and where he had merely gone a journey by train.<sup>4</sup> The second question stated involved the further question whether the waiter had been sufficiently careful in his inquiry as to the circumstances of the case. Now, Nisbet affirmed that he was a bona fide traveller, and at the same time stated how he was so. No further information could possibly have been elicited by inquiry. The waiter was then justified in accepting the statement, and in supplying the refreshment. But even if he was to be held as having failed to exercise sufficient care, he was merely guilty of an error of judgment,<sup>5</sup> or of wilful disobedience to his master's orders,<sup>6</sup> in neither of which cases could a conviction stand against the master. The acquittal was then proper, and must be given effect to.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am clearly of opinion that we must answer the first question in the negative. Nothing can be plainer to me than that Nisbet was not a bona fide traveller at the time when he was supplied with refreshment.

The second question resolves itself into one as to whether the waiter, acting for his master, discharged the duty which undoubtedly lay upon him of making reasonable inquiry before he supplied the refreshment on a Sunday to a person admittedly unknown to him, with a view to satisfy himself as to whether that person was or was not a bona fide traveller. Here again, I am of opinion that we must answer the question in the negative. All that the waiter was told by Nisbet was that he had come by the steamer, and was a bona fide traveller. This latter statement may be left out of view, because it is not a statement of fact, but a mere inference from a fact. The only fact, therefore, which the waiter elicited was that Nisbet had come by the steamer on Sunday morning. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that if the waiter had continued his inquiry, <sup>1</sup> Johnston v. Laing, March 25, 1876, 3 Couper, 250 ; Copley v. Burton, June 28, 1870, L. R., 5 C. P. 489.

<sup>2</sup> Dickson v. Linton, Nov. 19, 1886, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 13.

<sup>3</sup> Peplow v. Richardson, Feb. 5, 1869, L. R., 4 C. P. 168.

<sup>4</sup> Copley v. Burton, supra.

<sup>5</sup> Copley v. Burton, supra ; Mullins v. Collins, Jan. 24, 1874, L. R., 9 Q. B. 292 ; Roberts v. Humphreys, May 28, 1873, L. R., 8 Q. B. 483.

<sup>6</sup> Greenhill v. Stirling, March 19, 1885, 5 Couper, 602, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 37.

No. 10.

Jan. 14, 1889.
Galloway v.
Weber.

as he ought to have done, he would have ascertained that Nisbet's home was in Lerwick, and that he had gone there and slept there, and had thus completed his journey. Whatever then we may think about the bona fides of the waiter—and I do not think that we need assume that he was guilty of wilful breach of the statute—I cannot hold that the inquiry made by him, and the information he received, were a justification for his considering Nisbet a bona fide traveller.

Another question has been raised by Mr M'Lennan which goes rather to the third question raised in the case, namely, whether the master of the hotel is liable in a question of this kind for the laches of his servant. One or two cases have been quoted in support of the proposition that although the waiter was wrong here he must be held to have acted in breach of his master's instructions, and therefore to have himself committed a fault for which his master is not liable. I cannot assent to such a doctrine. If the master gives his servant express instructions not to do a certain thing, and the servant knowingly and in breach of these instructions does that thing, the master may possibly not be liable, because the servant is not doing it in the employment of his master. But if, as is alleged here, the servant is bona fide considering for and in the interests of his master whether a certain person should be supplied or not with liquor, then the mistake of the servant is that of his master.

Having answered the first two questions in the negative, I have no difficulty in answering the third in the negative also.

LORD ADAM.—As regards the first question in the case, it appears from the facts stated that Nisbet arrived at Lerwick, where he resided, by steamer, that he went home to bed, and remained in his own house about twelve hours. In these circumstances, I think it is nothing short of ridiculous to say that his journey had not ceased.

As regards the second question, I am of opinion with your Lordship that no innkeeper, or servant of one, is justified in supplying liquor unless he makes due and proper inquiry. The statement made by Nisbet was that he was a bona fide traveller, having come to Lerwick by the steamer. But that means nothing—if every man who has landed from a steamer twelve hours before is to be presumed to be still in itinere that might be sufficient. Such an idea, however, is ridiculous. It was the clear duty of the servant to ask some more questions. There was no proper or reasonable inquiry. That being so, I must come to the same conclusion as your Lordship. It follows that I necessarily come to the same conclusion upon the third question.

I had rather not express any opinion as to what is reasonable inquiry, because that is a question of circumstances in every case.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT answered the questions of law in the negative.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—JOHN M. RUSK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 11.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Maxwell v.
Marsland.

JAMES MAXWELL, Appellant.—Rhind.
ROBERT MARSLAND, Respondent.—Goudy.

Game—Day Trespass Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68)—Son of tenant with permission to shoot rabbits on farm.—Held that a person who had verbal permission from his father, the tenant of a farm, to shoot rabbits, and who shot while upon the farm two grouse, was guilty of a trespass under the Day Trespass Act No. 11.

Observations on the case of Laurie v. M'Arthur (8 R. (Just. Cases) p. 2, Jan. 28, 1889. Maxwell v. Maraland.

Day Trespass Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68)—Conviction.—Held that the enumeration of "deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies," contained in the first section of the Day Trespass Act, was not inserted for the purpose of stating a number of alternative ways in which a contravention of the statute could be committed, but as shewing to what animals the protection of the Act extended, and that therefore a general conviction following upon such a charge was good, even though the person convicted had a right to kill "conies."

JAMES MAXWELL, residing at Hunthills, Dumfriesshire, was charged, on the 8th December 1888, before the Sheriff-substitute of Dumfries and Galloway, at the instance of Robert Marsland, Esq., tenant of the shootings of Glenae, with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 William IV. cap. 68, "in so far as on the 21st November 1888, he did commit a trespass by entering or being in the day-time . . . upon the lands of Hunthills, belonging to Robert Stuart Dalzell, Esq. of Glenae, without leave . . . in search or pursuit of game, or of deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies."

After hearing evidence, the Sheriff-substitute (Hope) found the charge proven, and convicted the accused of the contravention charged.

Maxwell appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

The material facts as stated in the case were these: The accused, who resided with his father, the tenant of the farm of Hunthills, had a verbal permission from his father to kill rabbits. On the day libelled, the gamekeeper, Adam Lauder, saw him shoot two grouse in a field adjoining the farm-steading.

The question of law for the decision of the High Court was,—“Whether the accused, being a member of his father's household, and having verbal leave from him to kill rabbits upon his farm, and being lawfully upon the lands, is liable to be prosecuted under the Day Trespass Act?”

Argued for the appellant;—He had leave from his father, who was entitled to give it, to kill rabbits on the farm. He had, then, a perfectly lawful title to be on the farm with a gun in his hand.<sup>1</sup> The case of James v. Earl of Fife<sup>2</sup> had been overruled by the case of Laurie, &c., v. M'Arthur,<sup>3</sup> in which a farm-servant, with the same permission which the appellant had here, was held not to have entered the lands for an unlawful purpose when he set a dog to retrieve a wounded hare. But further, the charge here was alternative, and the conviction a general one of the contravention charged. For all that appeared he might have been convicted of shooting "conies," which, it was admitted, he had a right to do.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Upon the first question, we are to take it to be the fact that the accused had a verbal permission to shoot rabbits. I give no opinion upon the question whether a verbal permission to shoot rabbits is sufficient to take a person out of the operation of the Day Trespass Act as regards the shooting of rabbits. I shall assume that the accused had a sufficient right to shoot rabbits. The case which the Sheriff held to be proved was that having

<sup>1</sup> Stuart v. Murray, Nov. 13, 1884, 5 Couper, 526; Jack v. Nairne, Feb. 18, 1887, 1 White, 350, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 20.

<sup>2</sup> Jan. 28, 1880, 7 R. (Just. Cases) 9, 4 Couper, 321.

<sup>3</sup> Oct. 29, 1880, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 2, per Lord Young, p. 4, 4 Couper, 346.

No. 11.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Maxwell v.
Maraland.

such a right he shot two grouse. I have no doubt that a person who goes out perfectly innocently with a gun for the purpose of shooting crows, or, if he has a right to do so, for the purpose of shooting rabbits, comes within the operation of the Day Trespass Act whenever he shoots at game or any of the enumerated animals which follow the word "game" in the statute, excepting the words "or conies" in the case of a person who has a right to shoot rabbits. It is not necessary that he should when he first goes out have such an intention. The moment he forms such an intention, he is on the land for an unlawful purpose, and is a trespasser in the sense of the Act. The tenant himself, if he kill game upon his lands, is unlawfully there as a trespasser for that purpose.

The only question of difficulty is whether the conviction being a general one is a good conviction. It is maintained that, in so far as the conviction is concerned, the Sheriff might have intended to convict the accused of shooting rabbits. I do not think that is the way in which the statute has been understood. The enumeration of "deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies," was not inserted for the purpose of stating a number of alternatives, but solely as illustrative of what was to be held included in the sanction of the statute. Accordingly before the Ground Game Act of 1880 a general conviction was perfectly competent and quite usual. The Ground Game Act makes this difference: that if the animals of which the person was in pursuit were rabbits, and he had leave to shoot them, he is entitled to an acquittal. But it is by proving this that he is to escape. Therefore I hold that a general conviction is still perfectly competent. Of course in stating the case the Sheriff would be bound to state whether he convicted on the ground that the person accused shot rabbits or not, and the accused would be entitled to appeal on the ground that he had proved that he had permission to shoot rabbits. That this conviction, however, is perfectly justified upon the facts stated in the case I have no doubt. I am accordingly of opinion that the question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM.—The question is, "Whether the accused, being a member of his father's household, and having verbal leave from him to kill rabbits upon his farm, and being lawfully upon the lands, is liable to be prosecuted under the Day Trespass Act?" The facts which have been found to raise this question are that this person was a farmer's son with leave to shoot rabbits, that he was on the lands with a gun, and when so on the lands shot two grouse. The question is whether the fact that he was entitled to be on the lands to shoot rabbits prevents a conviction for being unlawfully on the lands in respect that he shot grouse? I am clearly of opinion it does not. I think that is decided by the case of James v. Earl of Fife. It is said, however, that the authority of that case has been taken away by the case of Laurie. I do not think so. I do not think the passages quoted from Lord Young's opinion in that case mean that. It appears to me that Lord Young recognised the previous decision, and distinguished the case from it upon a question of fact. He said,—"I am of opinion, upon the facts stated, that there was no evidence laid before the Sheriff that the respondent either entered or was upon the land for the purpose of going in pursuit of game, and that he was not a trespasser in the sense of the statute." His opinion seems to turn upon this, that he did not think the setting of a dog at a wounded hare was in point of fact being there in pursuit of game. That being so, I am entirely of opinion with your Lordship, and in conformity with the case of James, that a person may have a right to be on lands, and yet if, after entering upon them, he proceeds to commit illegal acts, he may be convicted of being on the lands for an illegal purpose. I have no doubt that the appellant was upon the lands for an illegal purpose when he formed the resolution, which he carried out, of shooting these grouse, and am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative. No. 11.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Maxwell v.
Marland.

There was another question referred to which is not stated in the case. It is said there is an alternative libel with a general conviction. I do not think so. I concur with your Lordship in the construction of the Act. The charge under the Act is trespassing in pursuit of game. It is not limited to game proper. There is an enumeration of the animals included in the term. But the charge is one charge. These are illustrations of the different ways in which the offence may be committed. It is quite true that since the passing of the Ground Game Act the word "conies," in the case of a person entitled to shoot rabbits, becomes immaterial in the charge; and if it had been proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff that this person was truly in pursuit of conies, he could not have convicted him of trespass in pursuit of game.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and sustained the conviction.

J. & W. F. CRAIG—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN ADAMS, Appellant.—Low.
GEORGE CADENHEAD (Procurator-Fiscal of Aberdeen).—
Lord-Adv. Robertson—Kennedy.

No. 12.
Jan. 28, 1889.
Adams v.
Cadenhead.

Fisheries Acts—Place for exportation—Inland railway station—Act 31 and 32 Vict. (Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868), c. 123, sec. 22.—A person who had delivered certain boxes of salmon to a railway company in Aberdeen, addressed to a firm in Paris, for transmission by inland railway to Newhaven in England and by shipment thence to France, was convicted of a contravention of the 22d section of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868.*

The Court quashed the conviction, holding that an inland railway station was not a "wharf, quay, or other place for exportation" within the meaning of the section.

---

* Act 31 and 32 Vict. c. 123 (Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868), sec. 22, enacts,—“Any salmon shipped or exported, or brought to any wharf, quay, or other place for exportation between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time for any district in Scotland contrary to this section shall be forfeited, unless proof be given to the satisfaction of the commissioners of customs of the salmon having been legally captured, and the person so illegally shipping or exporting, or bringing the same for exportation, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding two pounds for every salmon so shipped or exported or brought for exportation, and no salmon caught by rod and line during the annual close time for net fishing shall be shipped, exported, or brought for exportation under the like penalties; and any officer of customs may, during the aforesaid period, open any parcel entered or intended for exportation, or brought to any quay, wharf, or other place for that purpose, and suspected by him to contain salmon, and may detain any salmon found in such parcel until proof is given to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Customs of the salmon being such as may be legally exported; and if the salmon, before such proof is given, become unfit for human food, the officer of customs may destroy the same.”

No. 12.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Adams v.
Cadenhead.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

JOHN ADAMS was charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal upon a complaint which set forth "that he did at Aberdeen, between 14th September 1888 and 4th February 1889, being the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time for salmon for any district in Scotland, (1) on 20th September 1888, bring to the Joint Railway Passenger Station, Guild Street, Aberdeen, and did there deliver to the Caledonian Railway Company, for exportation to France, three boxes containing forty-two salmon; (2) on 21st September 1888 bring to said railway station, and did there deliver to the Caledonian Railway Company, for exportation to France, two boxes containing nineteen salmon, contrary to the Act 31 and 32 Victoria, chapter 123, section 22, and that he had thereby rendered himself liable to a penalty not exceeding £2 for every salmon so brought for exportation."

An objection was taken to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground that the railway station, Guild Street, Aberdeen, was not a port or place of exportation in the sense of the 22d section of the statute. The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) repelled the objection, and upon evidence led convicted Adams of the contravention charged. Adams craved a case.

The Sheriff-substitute stated that he held that the railway station fell under the description contained under the section of a "wharf, quay, or other place" to which salmon might be brought for exportation.

He further stated that he held it proved that the salmon in question had been brought by the accused to the Guild Street Station at Aberdeen in three boxes, addressed to Bigot & Company, Fishmarket, Paris, for exportation to France, by inland railway carriage to Newhaven in England, and by shipment thence to France.

The following question of law was stated:—"2. Whether it was a contravention of the Act to bring to the Joint Railway Passenger Station, Guild Street, Aberdeen, and there deliver the salmon in question to the Caledonian Railway Company for exportation to France by inland railway carriage to Newhaven in England, and by shipment thence to France?"

Argued for the appellant;—The railway station at Aberdeen could not possibly be said to be a "wharf, quay, or other place for exportation" within the meaning of the section. The expression "other place" referred to another place of the same kind as a "wharf or quay."

Argued for the respondent;—The section was contravened by the accused putting the salmon at the Aberdeen station in a course of transit over which he had no further control, and which in the ordinary course would take the salmon out of the country.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I read the section of the Act of Parliament under which this charge is brought, the place at which the offence must be committed must be a wharf, quay, or other place for exportation, the offence being committed in one or other of two ways, either by shipping or exporting the salmon, or by bringing them to any wharf, quay, or other place for exportation during the close time. I have no hesitation in holding that the words "or other place" mean a place similar to a wharf or quay, and that the purpose must be manifested to be for exportation by the salmon being brought to such a place. I do not think that the station of Aberdeen is such a place. The offence charged here would be committed by the bringing of the fish to the port of Newhaven in circumstances which upon a proof would be held to establish that they were brought there for exportation, but I do not think that we can hold it to be a relevant complaint under this section that at the station of Aberdeen certain boxes were delivered to a railway company in order to be taken to a wharf, quay, or other place for exportation. The place at which the offence must be committed must be a place from which immediate exportation may follow. I therefore think we ought to answer the question in the negative. No. 12.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Adams v.
Cadenhead.

LORD ADAM.—It appears that the appellant here was convicted of two offences of different dates, the offences being alleged to be contraventions of the 22d section of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868. Now, I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship that this section is not intended to apply to inland railway stations, but to shipping ports. That is obvious from the words of the statute. This charge is brought under the second clause of the section which enacts—(His Lordship here quoted the clause). It is said that the Aberdeen railway station is a place for exportation within the meaning of these words. I am very clear that it is not. I think that according to the general rule of construction the words mean wharf, quay, or other places ejusdem generis. A railway station is not a place for exportation of the same kind as a wharf or quay. That this is the proper reading of these words is seen from the rest of the section which requires proof to the Commissioners of Customs that the salmon have not been killed during close time. Is it to be expected that this proof is to be given at an inland railway station? I think this provision clearly shews that the statute is intended to apply to shipping ports. I have no hesitation in concurring in the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered this case, and heard counsel for the parties, answer the second question in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern."

MENZIES, COVENTRY, & BLACK, W.S.—A. R. PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

JANE WRIGHT OR M'KENZIE, MARGARET M'KENZIE, AND HENRY M'KENZIE, No. 13.
Complainers.—J. C. Thomson—W. Campbell—Macdonald.

DONALD M'PHEE (Procurator-Fiscal of the Police Court at Glasgow), Jan. 28, 1889.
AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Ure. M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee.

Jurisdiction—High Court—Circuit Court—Suspension—Competency—Fundamental nullity—Act 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii. (Glasgow Police Act, 1866), secs. 131 and 132.—A child, who was accompanied by her mother, was found in a clothes market in possession of certain missing articles. The mother and child were both taken to the police-office. No charge was made against them, but they were requested to appear at the police-office next morning, and were allowed to go home. Two police-officers called at the woman's house that evening, and again told her to be with her daughter at the police-office next morning. On obeying the order next morning she was placed at the bar, and for the first time charged, under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, with the crime of theft of the missing property, and was asked to plead. No information was given to her by the magistrate of her right to an adjournment of the diet in order to prepare for her defence, and no intimation was given to her husband that she was to be charged with theft. She pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led, was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. A bill of suspension having been presented, the procurator-fiscal objected to its competency on the ground that the jurisdiction of the High Court was excluded by sections 131 and 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.*

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii.), enacts, by section 131, " . . . No proceeding or trial before the magistrate, and no order or

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee

Held (diss. Lord Adam) that the proceedings on which the conviction followed, were contrary to the recognised forms of criminal procedure, and were funditus null, and that the High Court had accordingly jurisdiction to entertain the suspension, and conviction quashed.

Jurisdiction—High Court—Circuit Court—Suspension—Competency—Order pronounced under Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 118), sec. 15—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii.), secs. 131 and 132.—A girl, ten years of age, was taken with her mother to a police court and charged with theft under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. The magistrate sent the child to an industrial school for five years, "in pursuance of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866."* He pronounced this order without intimation to and in the absence of the child's father, and in the face of her mother's remonstrances.

The Court repelled an objection to the competency of a bill of suspension founded on the restrictive clauses (sections 131 and 132) of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, holding that though the proceedings originated under that Act, the order was pronounced under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, which contained no exclusion of review by the High Court, and quashed the order as, in the circumstances, improper.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ON 21st November 1888, Jane Wright or M'Kenzie, wife of Henry M'Kenzie, a brassfinisher in Glasgow, and Margaret M'Kenzie, his daughter, were charged before John Gemmell, Esquire, police-magistrate, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the Police Court, under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, with having stolen from a stand in the City Clothes Market, Greendyke Street, Glasgow, certain articles enumerated in the complaint.

Mrs M'Kenzie was convicted, and sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment, the conviction bearing that after the charge had been read over to her she pleaded not guilty, and that after evidence led she was convicted.

Margaret M'Kenzie was sent to the Lochburn Industrial School for five years, the order bearing to be executed "in pursuance of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866."

On 24th November 1888, Mrs M'Kenzie and her husband and daughter brought this bill of suspension in the High Court of Justiciary against the Procurator-fiscal "and J. Kilpatrick, who acted as fiscal on the occasion libelled." They made, inter alia, the following averments:—On the 20th November Mrs M'Kenzie, accompanied by Margaret, who was about ten years old, and two other younger children, went to sentence of the magistrate thereon or the extract thereof, shall be . . . subject to suspension . . . or to any other form of review or stay of execution unless in manner and on some one or more of the grounds hereinafter mentioned." Section 132 enacts—"Any person who feels aggrieved by any order or sentence of the magistrate may, within fourteen days after its date, appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary at the next Circuit Court to be held at Glasgow, in the manner and under the rules, limitations, and conditions contained in an Act passed in the twentieth year of His Majesty King George II., chapter 43, 'for taking away and abolishing heritable securities in Scotland,' on the ground of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the magistrate, wilful deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments, incompetency or defect of jurisdiction, but on no other ground."

* The Act 29 and 30 Vict. c. 118 (The Industrial Schools Act, 1866), sec. 15, enacts—"Where a child, apparently under the age of twelve years, is charged before two justices or a magistrate with an offence punishable by imprisonment or a less punishment, but has not been in England convicted of felony, or in Scotland of theft, and the child ought in the opinion of the justices or magistrate (regard being had to his age and to the circumstances of the case) to be dealt with under this Act, the justices or magistrate may order him to be sent to a certified industrial school."

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.

M'Kenzie v.
M'Phoe.

buy a mat in the Clothes Market at Glasgow. While there, Margaret picked up four articles of clothing, and while she was leaving, she was stopped by a policeman, but explained to him that she had found the articles lying on the ground, and had picked them up thinking they were useless. Mrs M'Kenzie also explained that she had not seen her daughter with the articles in her possession. The policeman took mother and child to the police-office, where they repeated the same statements. "They were then told that they might go home, but that they were to return to the police-office at nine on the following morning. No charge was made against either of the said complainers, nor were they told that any charge was to be preferred against them on the following day. Nor were they asked to give bail or leave a deposit by way of security for their reappearance, which would have been the appropriate course under section 100 of the Glasgow Police Act (29 and 30 Vict. chap. 273) for the officer on duty to have taken in the case of persons against whom a charge had been or was to be made. Shortly after Mrs M'Kenzie and her children reached home two police-officers called at the house and looked round. On leaving they told Mrs M'Kenzie to be sure and be at the police-office next morning with the girl Margaret. They did not, however, make any charge against the complainers or either of them, nor did they intimate that any charge was to be made on the following day. Nor did they give the complainers any written citation to appear as provided by section 88 of the said Police Act with reference to persons accused of having committed police offences. Mrs M'Kenzie asked whether the officers would not like to see her husband, who would be back shortly from his work; and on their answering in the negative, she asked whether he should come along with them to the police-office next morning. They answered that there was no occasion for his doing so. (5) On her husband's return Mrs M'Kenzie told him what had passed at the market and at the police-office, and also of the visit of the officers and what they had said. . . . (7) Mrs M'Kenzie, with her daughter Margaret, went to the police-office at 9 A.M. on said 21st November as requested, and were put into a large room, where they were kept waiting for some time. They were then conducted to the Police Court. Shortly afterwards, when they were sitting in Court, an officer asked Mrs M'Kenzie for her maiden name, which she gave. Shortly thereafter she and her daughter were called to the bar of the Court. The respondent J. Kilpatrick, acting as procurator-fiscal, then read out from a paper in his hand that the female complainer and her daughter were charged with theft. This was the first intimation given to Mrs M'Kenzie or her daughter that any charge was to be made against either of them. They were then at once asked by the magistrate whether they were guilty, to which they answered that they were not. The complainers believe and aver that the charge, particularly that against the mother, was an afterthought on the part of the respondents. It appears from the police charge-book, and from the act-book of Court, that the mother's name was interlined as an addition to a charge originally framed against the daughter only. (8) No written complaint was then or at any other time delivered to the accused. Nor were they informed by the magistrate that they were entitled to an adjournment in order to prepare for their defence, and to call witnesses in exculpation. Nor did he inquire whether the husband and father of the accused was present, or had been informed that a charge was preferred against the parties. The respondents at once proceeded to lead evidence." Article 9 set forth the evidence which was led. "(10) The further proceedings in the case are accurately reported in the following

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phee.

extract from the Glasgow Evening Citizen of November 21st 1888:—
 'Stipendiary Gemmel said there could be no doubt about the child's guilt, but he could not divest from his mind the idea that the child was taken there by her mother for the purpose of stealing. The mother,—
 "Oh no, sir, I never required to do such a thing. I went to buy a mat, and looked at some, as these women have said." The Stipendiary,—
 "It was impossible that the child could be going from stand to stand with these articles in her possession without you seeing them." The mother,—
 "I had three children with me—this one in my arms, and the other at my feet. Margaret was walking behind me, and I could not see what she was doing." The Stipendiary,—
 "I am not going to convict the child, I am going to send her to an industrial school." The mother,—
 "Oh no, sir, her father is a most respectable man, and he will go wrong in his mind if you do." The Stipendiary,—
 "I will send her to an industrial school for five years; and you, I find you guilty of art and part in the theft, and sentence you to thirty days' imprisonment."'

In article 12, the complainers set forth that they were innocent of the crime charged.

"(13) The whole of the proceedings above detailed were most irregular, illegal, and oppressive, and most prejudicial to the complainers. They were also conducted in direct violation of the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act and of the other statutes regulating summary trials, and in particular the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. (14) It was the duty of the respondents, if they intended to make a charge of theft against Mrs M'Kenzie and her daughter, to bring the accused into Court by a warrant of citation with reasonable inducia in ordinary form, and to give them a copy of the complaint, so as to certiorate them of the charge to be brought against them, and enable them to prepare for their defence. No warrant of citation was ever applied for by the respondents, nor did they ever give the complainers a copy of the complaint. It was grossly irregular and oppressive on the part of the respondents to take advantage of the voluntary presence in the police-office of Mrs M'Kenzie and her daughter in order to bring a charge against them of which they had had no notice. The respondents were also well aware of the fact that the parties accused were the wife and pupil child of a working-man residing in Glasgow; and they also knew that no steps had been taken to acquaint the husband and father of the proceedings in which he was vitally interested. (15) Upon the respondents stating the charge against the complainers it was the duty of the magistrate to inquire whether the accused had been served with a copy of the charge and duly cited to appear; and if it appeared that this had not been done it was his duty to explain to the accused that they were entitled to an adjournment for the purpose of preparing their defence and calling witnesses in exculpation. The magistrate culpably failed to perform this duty. The complainer Mrs M'Kenzie had never in her life been in a Police Court, even as a witness, and being wholly ignorant of her rights, and thoroughly frightened and taken by surprise, she stated no objection to the proceedings. She was entirely without assistance, professional or otherwise. . . . In regard to Margaret, even if she had been guilty of the offence charged, the order for her detention in an industrial school for five years would have been most unnecessary and prejudicial, and most cruel and oppressive to all the complainers. It was pronounced in absence of the girl's father, and without any intimation to him that such an order was to be pronounced. The complainer Henry M'Kenzie is quite able to take charge of the child at home. He would have explained this to the magistrate, and have strenuously resisted the order if he had had an opportunity of doing so. In these circumstances the complainers respectfully crave interim liberation for both the said complainers." No. 13.

The complainers pleaded;—1. The sentence complained of should be suspended, and liberation should be granted, with expenses, as craved, in respect,—(1) The trial of the complainers was proceeded with with undue haste, without fair notice of the charge, and in the absence of the husband and father of the accused. Separatim, The magistrate culpably failed to inform the accused that they were entitled to an adjournment. (2) There was no legal evidence of the guilt of the complainers, or at least the evidence was altogether insufficient to warrant their conviction. (3) It was illegal and oppressive to sentence the girl to a prolonged term of detention in an industrial school without first communicating with her father. (4) The whole proceedings were irregular, illegal, and oppressive, and the said sentences were excessive, and contrary to natural justice. 2. In the circumstances, the complainers Mrs M'Kenzie and Margaret M'Kenzie are entitled to interim liberation as craved.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee.

Interim liberation was granted.

The respondents lodged, inter alia, the following answers:—" (4) Admitted that Mrs M'Kenzie and her daughter were taken to the Central Police Office, Detective Department; that after the charge was taken they were permitted to return home; that they were not asked to give bail or leave a deposit; that two officers called at Mrs M'Kenzie's house in the afternoon, and that Mrs M'Kenzie was told to appear with her daughter at the police-office the following morning. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the charge was entered in the Police Book in the usual way. . . . (5) Not known, and not admitted. (7) The procedure that took place in the Police Court is stated with substantial accuracy. Quoad ultra denied. . . . (8) Admitted that no written complaint was delivered to the accused. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the magistrate asked Mrs M'Kenzie whether her husband was present in Court, and she replied in the negative; further, he asked her whether she desired to call any witnesses in exculpation, and she again replied in the negative. No adjournment was asked by either of the accused."

They in answer 17 further admitted that the order for the detention of the girl Margaret was pronounced in absence of her father, and without any intimation to him that such order was to be pronounced.

The respondents pleaded;—1. In respect of sections 131 and 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the present suspension is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. 2. The complainers' statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the prayer of the bill. 3. The whole proceedings having been regular and legal, the suspension ought to be refused. 4. The complainers having been justly convicted on legal evidence of the crime charged against them, are not entitled to suspension.

The respondents objected to the competency of the suspension on the ground that review by the High Court of Justiciary was excluded by sections 131 and 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

Argued for the respondents;—These sections undoubtedly gave the complainers a remedy by appeal to the next Circuit Court sitting at Glasgow upon certain grounds. Had they then a second remedy by bill of suspension to the High Court of Justiciary? That depended upon whether the case sought to be brought under review disclosed that in the proceedings in the inferior Court there was a fundamental nullity, or whether the alleged miscarriage of justice amounted merely to an aggravated case of oppression. In the former class of cases,<sup>1</sup> the jurisdiction of

<sup>1</sup> Collins v. Lang, Nov. 3, 1887, 15 R. (Just. Cases) 7, 1 White, 482; Marr v. M'Arthur, May 28, 1878, 5 R. (Just. Cases) 38, 4 Couper, 53; Kidger v. M'Phee,

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee.

the High Court had been sustained, while in the latter the statute had provided a remedy by appeal to the Circuit Court, which excluded the jurisdiction of the High Court.<sup>1</sup> In the present case, there was a good charge with a good instance brought regularly before a competent Court. There was no fundamental nullity. The alleged grounds of suspension disclosed a case of oppression, which was one of the grounds on which the Circuit Court might review the conviction. The case of Graham v. Linton<sup>2</sup> was no authority for the Court dispensing with a finality clause. There was no objection to competency in it, and indeed there could have been none, for under the Act then in force there was no such exclusion of review for oppressive sentences. The argument applied equally to the cases of both complainers, for the sections of the Act applied to orders under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, as well as to convictions, and what was complained of in the child's case was such an order. Further, by the 43d section of that Act the Secretary of State was given power to liberate children from industrial schools. No doubt in Wilson v. Stirling,<sup>3</sup> the High Court had interfered to quash an order under the Industrial Schools Act, but in that case there was no charge of crime. Here there was a charge preferred, and tried under the Glasgow Police Act, and it was upon his investigation into the circumstances of that charge that the magistrate proceeded.

Argued for the complainers;—There might be a large jurisdiction in the Circuit Court at Glasgow, but there was a point at which the jurisdiction of the High Court came into existence, and was to be exercised. Wherever there was, as here, a fundamental disregard of the rules of judicial procedure, the interference of the High Court was recognised.<sup>4</sup> The order complained of by the child was not pronounced under the Glasgow Police Act but under the Industrial Schools Act, and was subject to suspension by the High Court in respect there was no exclusion of such review in the latter Act.<sup>5</sup>

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is a bill of suspension and liberation brought at the instance of Jane Wright or M'Kenzie and Margaret M'Kenzie complaining of a conviction, dated 21st November 1888, obtained in the Police Court in Glasgow, by which the first suspender, Jane M'Kenzie, was convicted of the crime of theft, and committed to prison for thirty days, and of an order dated on the same day by which the second complainer, Margaret M'Kenzie, was ordained to be sent to the Industrial School at Maryhill, and there detained for a period of five years. It is pleaded to us that the suspension of this conviction and this order is

Nov. 22, 1888, 26 S. L. R., 65; Bell v. M'Phee, July 18, 1883, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 78, 5 Couper, 312; Gray v. M'Gill, Feb. 27, 1858, 3 Irvine, 29.

<sup>1</sup> Mackenzie v. Lang, Nov. 9, 1874, 2 R. (Just. Cases) 1, 3 Couper, 29; O'Brien v. M'Phee, Oct. 30, 1880, 8 R. (Just. Cases) 8, 4 Couper, 375; Duffy v. Lang, March 5, 1869, 1 Couper, 238; Walker v. Lang, Nov. 25, 1867, 5 Irvine, 506, 40 Scot. Jur. 89; De Belmont v. Lang, June 28, 1871, 2 Couper, 95, 43 Scot. Jur. 522.

<sup>2</sup> Graham v. Linton, Nov. 24, 1856, 2 Irvine, 558.

<sup>3</sup> Wilson v. Stirling, March 9, 1874, 2 Couper, 518.

<sup>4</sup> Gray v. Macgill, supra, per Lord Ivory, p. 41; Wright v. Dewar, March 9, 1874, 2 Couper, 504, per Lord Cowan, 513; Graham v. Linton, supra, per Lord Deas, p. 564; Devany v. Anderson, Dec. 16, 1854, 1 Irvine, 588; Gallacher v. Auld, May 28, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 56, 1 White, 130; Ritchie v. Pilmer, Dec. 20, 1848, John Shaw's Just. Rep. 142; Robertson v. Mackay, July 21, 1846, Arkley's Just. Rep. 114; MacKean v. Wilson, Dec. 9, 1848, John Shaw's Just. Rep. 132; Moncreiff on Review in Criminal Cases, 248.

incompetent on the ground that the proceedings complained of were proceedings under the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, and that an appeal to this Court of any kind is declared to be incompetent by the provisions of that Act. In my view it is quite necessary to consider separately in this question of competency the case of the mother and the case of the daughter.

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phoe.

Taking then the case of the mother first, the complaint bears to be brought under the Glasgow Police Act of 1866. It sets forth that Jane M'Kenzie, now in custody, stole from the City Clothes Market certain articles therein enumerated, and so on. That is followed by the conviction, which bears that after the charge had been read over to her she pleaded not guilty, and that after evidence had been led she was convicted and sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment, and it is that sentence which is brought under our review. The sections of the Act founded on which are said to preclude appeal are the 131st and 132d sections of the Glasgow Police Act. Now, it is not denied that we have in this case a good instance; it is not denied that the Judge had jurisdiction to try the case; neither is it denied that the complaint was a relevant complaint, and that the sentence was a competent sentence. Prima facie, therefore, it appears to me that under the provisions of these two sections of the Act, appeal to this Court, not being a Circuit Court, is incompetent. But it is said on the part of the complainer that her averments disclose a case which shews a fundamental nullity in the proceedings and the sentence; and no doubt if that be so there is plenty of authority for saying that the complainer is entitled to come here for redress. But the respondents say that the averments in the bill of suspension amount only to what is oppression in a legal sense of the term, and that as suspension on the ground of oppression on the part of the magistrate is one of the grounds of appeal to the Circuit Court at Glasgow, there is therefore a special Court appointed for the consideration of appeals upon that ground, and that there being a special remedy by appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary that excludes the jurisdiction of this Court. That I understand to be the argument upon the other side. Now, if the respondents' view of the averments in this case is well founded I think there is plenty authority for saying that the appeal here is incompetent. I think the cases of Duffy v. Lang, 1 Coup. 238, and Mackenzie v. Lang, 3 Coup. 29, are quite sufficient to sustain that contention. That therefore requires us to look at the averments on which this bill of suspension is founded. If we are to sustain the competency of the suspension it would be necessary, it appears to me, to proceed upon facts either admitted or proved. We cannot sustain the competency of the suspension upon mere averment. But as the view which I take of the case is that the appeal is not competent, in considering the case I must assume the truth of the averments as made in this bill of suspension; and so considering them, as I have said, in my view the suspension is incompetent. Looking to these averments, and taking what may be called the principal view of this case, it seems to be this:—The child Margaret seems to be about nine or ten years of age. It is said that on the 20th November, the day before the trial and conviction, Mrs M'Kenzie went with this child and two other younger children, one five years old and the other younger, to buy a mat in the Clothes Market at Glasgow; that while there the child Margaret picked up some four articles which are said to have been stolen, and on leaving the market she was stopped by a policeman; that the mother then came up, and the girl stated that she had found them lying on the ground and had picked them up; that they were taken to the police-office,

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee.

and the same explanation given, and the facts recorded in the police books as usual ; but nothing more was done then except that the mother was told to bring back her daughter next morning at nine o'clock. No charge of theft was made against either mother or daughter. It is said that during the afternoon of the same day two policemen came to the house, and again told them to be at the police-office next morning at nine o'clock ; and upon being asked if it would be necessary that Mrs M'Kenzie's husband should go, the answer was No. These seem to be the facts of the case—at all events the facts of the case as averred with reference to what took place prior to the proceedings on the trial. The material facts that are set forth as to what took place on the 21st November are in articles 7 and 8, and I may read them. Article 7 is,—“Mrs M'Kenzie, with her daughter Margaret, went to the police-office at 9 A.M. on said 21st November as requested, and were put into a large room, where they were kept waiting for some time. They were then conducted to the Police Court. Shortly afterwards, when they were sitting in Court, an officer asked Mrs M'Kenzie for her maiden name, which she gave. Shortly thereafter she and her daughter were called to the bar of the Court. The respondent J. Kilpatrick then read out from a paper in his hand that the female complainer and her daughter were charged with theft. This was the first intimation given to Mrs M'Kenzie or her daughter that any charge was to be made against either of them. They were then at once asked by the magistrate whether they were guilty, to which they answered that they were not. The complainers believe and aver that the charge, particularly that against the mother, was an afterthought on the part of the respondents. It appears from the police charge-book, and from the act-book of Court that the mother's name was interlined as an addition to a charge originally framed against the daughter only.” Then in article 8 it is said,—“No written complaint was then or at any other time delivered to the accused. Nor were they informed by the magistrate that they were entitled to an adjournment in order to prepare for their defence, and to call witnesses in exculpation. Nor did he inquire whether the husband and father of the accused was present, or had been informed that a charge was preferred against the parties. The respondents at once proceeded to lead evidence.” Then there is set forth in subsequent articles what took place at the trial, and the evidence led, and so on ; but I do not think that is material, because whether it was sufficient to support the charge or not it is the merits of the case of which the Court had to judge. In article 14 there are set forth the allegations upon which this suspension is rested. It is said there,—“It was the duty of the respondents, if they intended to make a charge of theft against Mrs M'Kenzie and her daughter, to bring the accused into Court by a warrant of citation with reasonable induciae in ordinary form, and to give them a copy of the complaint, so as to certiorate them of the charge to be brought against them and enable them to prepare for their defence. No warrant of citation was ever applied for by the respondents, nor did they ever give the complainers a copy of the complaint. It was grossly irregular and oppressive on the part of the respondents to take advantage of the voluntary presence in the Police Court of Mrs M'Kenzie and her daughter in order to bring a charge against them of which they had had no notice. The respondents were also well aware of the fact that the parties accused were the wife and pupil child of a working-man residing in Glasgow ; and they also knew that no steps had been taken to acquaint the husband and father of the proceedings, in which he was vitally interested.” Then the 15th article is this—“Upon the respondents stating the charge against the complainers, it was the duty of the magistrate to inquire whether the accused had been served with a copy of the charge and duly cited to appear; and if it appeared that this had not been done, it was his duty to explain to the accused that they were entitled to an adjournment for the purpose of preparing their defence and calling witnesses in exculpation. The magistrate culpably failed to perform this duty. The complainer Mrs M'Kenzie had never in her life been in a Police Court, even as a witness, and being wholly ignorant of her rights, and thoroughly frightened and taken by surprise, she stated no objection to the proceedings. She was entirely without assistance, professional or otherwise."

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.

M'Kenzie v.
M'Phos.

The ground upon which suspension is sought in this case is the alleged neglect of duty of the magistrate and illegality of the proceedings set forth in these articles. Now, the first of these appears to be that the accused was brought into Court without a warrant of citation being served upon her and a copy of the complaint so as to certiorate her of the charge to be brought against her, and to enable her to prepare for her defence. It humbly appears to me that it is not necessary in proceedings in a Police Court that a warrant of citation or a complaint should be served upon the prisoner before trial. I mean by saying necessary, that I think it is a question of circumstances whether that should be done, but I think there is no illegality in proceeding to try a prisoner without having a citation and a copy of the complaint served upon him beforehand. I think that is settled, and is in conformity with the practice in many cases, and it was the subject of discussion in the case of Graham v. Linton, 2 Ir. 558, which was a case where a married woman, who was a licensed broker in Edinburgh, was apprehended on a Monday morning on a warrant granted on the Saturday previous. She was tried summarily, and was convicted and sentenced to forty days' imprisonment. The conviction was set aside as being in the circumstances oppressive. I quite agree with Lord Deas in that case that there are many cases in which it would be highly improper to proceed to trial without a citation and without a complaint being served. But then, in my humble opinion, it is a question of circumstances whether in a particular case that course should be followed or not. There is another case of M'Kean v. Wilson, John Shaw, p. 132, where it was held that it was not necessary that a complaint should be served before trial. Now, looking to these authorities, I think that it is competent and not illegal for a magistrate to proceed to try a case without citation and without service of the complaint, and that it is a question of circumstances whether that should be done in each particular case. It does not appear to me that where that course is not followed by the magistrate it infers a nullity of the proceedings. It may be, and I agree if the facts here are true, which we must assume, that in this case it was a grossly irregular and oppressive proceeding on the part of this magistrate to take advantage of this woman going to the police-office. But in my opinion that does not involve nullity. It merely involves oppression in the legal sense of the word as being unfair and unjust towards a prisoner to put her upon her trial in such circumstances. That is my view of the nature of the averments in article 14.

Then in article 15 it is said it was the duty of the magistrate to inquire into these matters, and if it appeared that this had not been done, to explain to the accused that they were entitled to an adjournment. That the magistrate should in many cases give that intimation to a helpless prisoner at the bar I have no doubt whatever, and that, if he fails to do it, in many cases it is unfair and oppressive

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phee.

towards the prisoner, and he is entitled to relief; but I can find nothing to shew it is the duty of a magistrate to do that. I think there is no duty in this sense that it is illegal for him not to do it, and if it does not amount to illegality—if in these proceedings the magistrate is acting within the powers given to him by the Act—I do not see how it can infer nullity of the proceedings however oppressive it may be. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the averments in this case do not amount to any averment of nullity of the proceedings. Assuming the averments to be true, I think it was a case of oppression on the part of the Judge in a legal sense, and upon that ground the accused may be entitled to relief.

The first case to which we were referred upon the part of the suspenders was the case of Gray v. Macgill, 3 Irv. 29. That was a case under a previous Glasgow Police Statute, but having clauses as to review somewhat similar to those under consideration in this question. The proceedings in that case were of a somewhat similar nature to what took place here, and it would be probably impossible to get a harder case than that of the prisoner who was tried in that case. The suspender, Thomas Gray, a child of eight years of age, was in bed in his father's house in Glasgow. Two police-officers came to the house, and without any warrant took him in custody to the police-office. He was there summarily placed at the bar of the Police Court, and without any previous explanation to himself or to anyone interested in him, and without any complaint having been served upon him, he was charged with the crime of theft. He was too young to understand the complaint or procedure of the Court, and had not the assistance of his father, although he was accompanied to the office by his mother and sister. The charge was that he along with two other boys had been guilty of the theft of a small sum of money. These proceedings were certainly about as bad, to use the word, as the proceedings said to have been taken here—taking a child out of his father's house in the morning, placing him immediately at the bar, trying him without a complaint being served upon him, and convicting him. It is material to observe how the Court dealt with that case. The opinion is delivered by Lord Ivory. He commented severely upon the proceedings, but in the judgment of the Court he says—"As to the general character of these proceedings. The complainer is a child. His father was known—a householder in Glasgow. The boy is suddenly dragged into Court, tried and punished with reckless haste. I would also abstain, however, from resting my judgment on this ground. But on the whole, and especially (1) on the objection as to the 'evidence and partial admission' on which the conviction bears to proceed—(2) on the defects in the subscription of the sentence—(3) on what I think to be the want of basis for summary procedure—I hold that there are good grounds for vacating and quashing the sentence without touching upon any ground connected with what are properly the merits of the case." That sentence was quashed upon grounds which clearly inferred nullity. Lord Ivory held, and the Court followed him, that the conviction proceeded upon what was in fact no evidence at all. That was the first ground. The second ground was that the sentence was no sentence because it was signed out of Court a considerable time after the sentence had been carried into execution. But although what Lord Ivory called the general character of the proceedings very much resembled those in this case, he purposely abstained from putting his judgment upon that.

The next case to which we have been referred is the case Marr v. M'Arthur, 5 R. (Just. Cases) 38. That was a case in which a person was convicted of playing the air "Boyne Water." The Court, of which I was a member, came to the conclusion that the complaint set forth no crime at all. It necessarily followed that the whole proceedings were null. Another case was very similar, and went upon the same grounds. That was the case of Kidger, 26 S. L. R. 65, where a man was convicted of posting a bill on his own house. The next case was Collins v. Lang, 1 White, 482. That was a case of a different description. The accused was convicted upon a complaint upon which he had been charged at a previous diet when the diet was deserted pro loco et tempore. The Court held that the complaint was dead owing to the desertion of the diet, and accordingly that the accused had been convicted upon no complaint. That also was a case of fundamental nullity, and not a case of oppression. The last case to which we were referred was Bell v. M'Phee, 5 Coup. 312, and that again was a case of a different description. That was a case where the prisoner was charged on an alternative libel, the charge being followed by a general conviction so that nobody could tell of what offence the prisoner had been guilty. On the face of it the sentence in that case was clearly null.

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phee.

I think these are all the cases to which we were referred, and I think they bring out the distinction strongly between those objections which go to fundamental nullity and those which go to oppression on the part of the Judge. That being my opinion in this case, I am of opinion that this suspension is incompetent, because the Police Act has provided a special Court, viz., the Circuit Court at Glasgow, to which cases of this description shall be committed. While that is my opinion, I should in this case be quite prepared to sustain the suspension to the effect of continuing the interim liberation. I think that rests on a different ground. It does not touch the merits of the sentence. If we were to continue the interim liberation until the Circuit it would leave it open to the Judges to whom the statute has committed the review of such cases as this to consider the case on the merits. I think this would be a competent and a right proceeding. That is all I have to say about the mother's case.

As I have said, the girl's case is quite different. No doubt it originated in a proceeding under the Glasgow Police Act, but the order complained of is an order pronounced under the Industrial Schools Act. I find no exclusion of appeal to this Court under that Act, and therefore I think it is quite competent to bring up what is alleged to be an oppressive order on the part of the magistrate to have it considered in this Court. I do not know whether the respondents' counsel would wish to say anything upon the merits of this case, but he can do so after we have disposed of the question of competency. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that this bill of suspension as regards the mother is incompetent, and as regards the child that it is competent.

LORD TRAYNER.—The objection stated by the respondents to the competency of this suspension is based upon the 131st and 132d sections of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, which excludes review of sentences or orders pronounced by a Glasgow Police Magistrate, except by way of appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow, and upon certain grounds.

I think these clauses have no application to any order, sentence, or proceeding except such as may be pronounced or taken under the Glasgow Police Act. Accordingly, they have no application, in my opinion, to the order pronounced for the detention of the complainer Margaret M'Kenzie in an industrial school, which did not proceed under or in virtue of any power conferred by the Police Act (for that Act confers no power on the magistrate to issue such an order),

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phee.

but, as the order itself bears, "in pursuance of the Industrial Schools Act." The jurisdiction of this Court to review orders pronounced under the Industrial Schools Act is nowhere excluded, and therefore the objection stated to the competency of this part of the present suspension falls to be repelled.

The objection to competency, in so far as it relates to Jane Wright or M'Kenzie, stands in a different position. Ex facie of the proceedings she was charged, convicted, and sentenced under and in terms of the Police Act, and the review clauses referred to will apply unless it appear that the proceedings complained of are of a character not covered or provided for by these clauses.

Now, the case presented by the complainer is, that she was never formally cited to the Police Court to answer any charge; that she was requested to attend at the police-office with her daughter without being told for what purpose; that being voluntarily present she was placed in the dock, and then for the first time charged with theft, without any previous intimation that such a charge, or any charge, was to be preferred against her; that she was not informed of her right to ask and obtain a continuation of the diet in order to obtain assistance in her defence, or to procure exculpatory evidence; and that these proceedings were adopted in the case of a person whose honesty had never before been impugned, and who was the wife of a respectable law-abiding citizen, whose address was well known to the police. The respondents maintain that, assuming the complainer's averments to be true, they amount to oppression on the part of the magistrate, but that oppression only gives right to an appeal to the Circuit Court. I think the respondent may very safely admit that, assuming the complainer's averments, the magistrate was guilty of oppression—I should say gross oppression. But it does not follow that the jurisdiction of this Court is excluded in every case where the conduct of the magistrate can be described as oppressive. What is undoubtedly oppressive may be something more. In every case where a magistrate pronounces a sentence on a plainly irrelevant charge (as in Collins' case), or on an erroneous view of the law (as in Kidger's case), he acts in a sense oppressively, because illegally. In such cases, however, the jurisdiction of this Court is not excluded by the review clauses of the Police Act. These clauses are open to construction, and I construe the words "oppression on the part of the magistrate" as meaning only any failure in duty on his part, or any straining or abusing of his powers which in the particular circumstances bears with undue or unreasonable weight against the accused. But what the complainer now complains of is something very different from this. She not merely complains of the magistrate's sentence, but of what took place before the case reached the magistrate. Her case is not a case of oppression merely, but is that the whole proceedings which culminated in the magistrate's sentence were illegal and funditus null.

Taking the case as averred, I am of opinion that the objection to the competency should be repelled. I think the proceedings complained of as set forth by the complainer were not merely oppressive, but lawless—that is, they were not in accordance with, but were opposed to, the principles and practice of criminal law known and recognised in the law of Scotland.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with both your Lordships that there is no ground for the contention that the jurisdiction of this Court is limited to its sittings in Glasgow as regards the case of the complainer Margaret M'Kenzie. She was not dealt with under the Glasgow Police Act at all. On the contrary, the magistrate declined to deal with her case under the Glasgow Police Act, and proceeded under the Industrial Schools Act. There is no provision in that Act restricting the powers of this Court to give redress against irregular or oppressive proceedings, and there can therefore be no objection to the competency of suspension in that case. No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzie v.
M'Phee.

The case of Jane M'Kenzie is different. She was tried and convicted under the Glasgow Police Act undoubtedly. The difference of opinion which your Lordships' judgments on her case disclose places upon me a considerable responsibility. I recognise to the full the restricting quality of the clause in the Glasgow Police Act by which review, otherwise than by appeal to this Court sitting in Glasgow, is excluded. I hold it to be quite clear that if the authorities of police in Glasgow do, in the course of proceedings formally permissible by law, act oppressively, the remedy, and the only remedy—except through the State—is an appeal to this Court at its next sitting in Glasgow, and that the Court sitting here is bound to regard the restriction of the locus of review contained in the Police Act, however anomalous such restriction may be. In my view the question whether this Court, sitting here, can entertain this suspension, must be considered upon the footing that it is only when proceedings are not merely oppressively conducted within the law, but are without the law, that the Court sitting in Edinburgh can take up and consider the complaint of the person alleged to have been wronged. A mere oppressive use of legal powers will not make a suspension competent before this Court sitting here. All that I accept as having been conclusively settled by the cases which were quoted by the respondents.

The real question in this case is, whether the proceedings do not disclose something more than mere oppression in the use of permissible procedure. In considering that question it is important to keep clearly in view what the facts are which are averred and not disputed. They are these:—The complainer's child, when with the complainer in the City Clothes Market in Glasgow, was found to be carrying some articles which were missed from stalls in the market. A policeman having been called, mother and child accompany him to the police-office. No charge is made or notified to them, but they are told they may go home. No bail is asked, but they are requested to be at the police-office on the following morning. That evening two officers call at their house. They do not state any charge, nor inform the complainer Mrs M'Kenzie that any charge is to be made against her, or give any indication that it is otherwise than as the mother of a child of tender years which might be charged with a crime that she is invited to come. She asks them whether they will see her husband, or whether he should accompany her and her child to the police-office, but is told that this is unnecessary. Next morning mother and child go to the police-office. The mother receives no communication of any kind as to what is going to happen till they are called into Court. Then for the first time a charge of theft is read out against her, and the case then proceeds in ordinary course, there being nothing informal or contrary to law in that procedure, after the case is entered upon by the magistrate.

These are the material facts, shortly stated. I have thought it necessary to state the facts which seem to be admitted as substantially correct, because it is very important that the assumed facts which form the basis for judgment on the competency of this suspension should be clearly and sharply defined. These, then, being the facts of the case as regards what was done, the question is, Is the High Court of Justiciary sitting in Edinburgh deprived by the Glasgow

No. 13. Police Act of its jurisdiction to deal with such a case promptly and at once under a suspension? It is said,—“There is a regular complaint, a regular trial, a regular conviction, and a regular sentence. It may be that though all the proceedings were regular in form there has been oppression under cover of the forms. But if so, jurisdiction to deal with the case is restricted to the High Court sitting on appeals at Glasgow.” I cannot assent to that view. If suspension is competent, as it admittedly is, where procedure goes outside statutory powers, I hold that suspension is competent where the proceedings of the police in prosecuting a law-abiding citizen on a serious charge are outside of the fundamental principles of the law of the land. I hold what is alleged to have been done in this case by the police, as public prosecutors, to amount to a travesty of legal procedure, “a mere farce,” to use the words of Lord Neaves in the case of Mackenzie v. Lang, under colour of administration of powers conferred by law. In Marr’s case the power of this Court was sustained notwithstanding the restricting clause, because, to use Lord Adam’s words, what was done was “outwith the statute.” Holding, as I do, that what was done in this case was “outwith all law,” that the police proceeded not merely oppressively but in an absolutely lawless manner, that they did what it could never be permissible to do unless some statute specially authorised it, and which it is impossible to believe that the Legislature of any constitutionally governed country would embody in a statute, I must sustain the competency of this suspension. I hold proceedings to be null in which I find that in their initiation there was an absolute disregard of the commonest principles of justice by springing suddenly, at the very moment of the trial, a charge of serious crime against a person who up to that time had not been given the slightest notice that she was to be under accusation as a criminal at all, but, on the contrary, was, as I think, directly led to understand that she was only brought there as a guardian of a child.

I hold that the police and the prosecutor of police thus acting, “the fundamental rules of all judicial procedure were transgressed,” to use the words of Lord Cowan in the case of Wright. I feel certain that had the experienced magistrate who tried the case known the circumstances in which Mrs M’Kenzie stood at the bar of the Court, he would not have allowed the prosecutor to proceed with the case then and there. He would, I feel sure, have held, to use Lord Ivory’s words in Gray v. M’Gill, that “in the straining after a more than ordinary measure of despatch or repression the principles of substantial justice ought never to be lost sight of.” In this case the blot in the proceedings arises not in the conduct of the magistrate, but of the officials of his Court who had charge of the proceedings. But that conduct is as much a part of the proceedings as what afterwards followed, and I think these words of Lord Ivory are in every respect applicable.

I know of no case the least like this one. I know of no case of a person being at once tried for a serious crime, who up to the moment of the commencement of the trial has never been informed that he is charged with a crime, or is accused of it even. The nearest case to it is that of Ritchie v. Pilmer, in which a man cited as a witness was informed that he would be charged with the crime, and was tried half an hour afterwards. The Court held such procedure to be so flagrantly unjust that “no sentence could be sustained which had followed thereon.” That is, in my judgment, to hold that there was a fundamental nullity in the proceedings as being contrary to every principle of just administration of the law. This case is much more flagrant. For Mrs M’Kenzie was not even allowed half an hour to think over the fact that she was charged with a serious crime, and to compose herself to conduct her own defence. She was allowed no time at all. At the same moment at which she knows for the first time that she is to be accused of serious crime her trial begins. No person even of the strongest nerve could be expected to be in a fit state to watch the case and conduct his own defence in such circumstances, still less a woman who came there as this mother did in charge of her child, and as a guardian only.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M’Kenzies v.
M’Phee.

On these grounds I concur with Lord Trayner in holding that it is competent to sustain this suspension, the facts averred and not disputed disclosing a case, in my opinion, ab initio vitiosum, and contrary to every principle of law and justice.

The Court having called upon counsel for the respondents to speak to the merits of the suspension in the case of the child Margaret M'Kenzie, it was argued for the respondents;—There was no irregularity of procedure. The charge was properly entered in the police books against her when she was taken to the police-office on the 20th November, and both her parents were sufficiently certiorated that she was to be dealt with in reference to this offence on the morning of the 21st.

Counsel for the complainers was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is certainly new to me that it is the practice, as we are told, for magistrates in Glasgow when a child of a law-abiding citizen is brought before them for the first time on a charge of theft to send that child to an industrial school for five years upon the result of inquiries by detectives, not communicated in open Court or upon oath as information for their guidance, and that without intimation to the father, or opportunity given to him to make explanations with regard to reports about him. If that is the practice it is high time that the Court should interfere to stop it. The object of such an Act as the Industrial Schools Act is to provide for the case of children who are not expected to be dealt with in their own homes. It was intended to provide for exceptional cases, and it cannot be said that a case is exceptional into which full and proper inquiry has not been made.

LORD ADAM.—We can only, as it appears to me, deal with this case upon facts admitted by the respondents. The facts which I hold to be substantially admitted are these—that the policemen, when they called on the afternoon of the 20th, warned the mother that a charge of theft might be made, but did not say that it was unnecessary that the father should be there. I am ready to dispose of the case on that footing, and upon the footing that the father knew of what had taken place that day in the police-office, knew that the mother and daughter were to go to the Police Court next morning, and had reason to believe that a charge of theft would be brought against the child. But it appears to me that there was not a suggestion until the proceedings in the Police Court were about to close that this child should be taken from its father's house and sent to an industrial school. The first mention of an industrial school appears in the report of the proceedings quoted from the newspapers in article 10 of the bill of suspension. "The further proceedings in the case are accurately reported in the following extract from the Glasgow Evening Citizen of November 21st, 1888—'Stipendiary Gemmell said there could be no doubt about the child's guilt, but he could not divest from his mind the idea that the child was taken there by her mother for the purpose of stealing.' The mother—'Oh no,

No. 13.

Jan. 23, 1889.

M'Kenzie v. M'Phee.

No. 13.

Jan. 28, 1889.
M'Kenzies v.
M'Phee.

sir, I never required to do such a thing. I went to buy a mat, and looked at some, as these women have said.' The Stipendiary—'It was impossible that the child could be going from stand to stand with these articles in her possession without you seeing them.' The mother—'I had three children with me—this one in my arms, and the other at my feet. Margaret was walking behind me, and I could not see what she was doing.' The Stipendiary—'I am not going to convict the child, I am going to send her to an industrial school.' The mother—'Oh no, sir, her father is a most respectable man, and he will go wrong in his mind if you do.' The Stipendiary—'I will send her to an industrial school for five years, and you, I find you guilty of art and part of the theft, and sentence you to thirty days' imprisonment.'" So far as appears, this was the first hint by anyone concerned in the proceedings that the child was to be sent to an industrial school. The Magistrate pronounced the order in the absence of the proper guardian of the child, and in the face of the remonstrance of the mother. It humbly appears to me that this was a proceeding of a most oppressive kind, and if such proceedings are common in the Police Court of Glasgow the sooner they are put a stop to the better.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree that this order cannot be sustained. The Industrial Schools Act is intended to provide for the case of children who have no guardians or whose guardians are neglecting them. But it is a new idea to me that children of law-abiding citizens, whatever their position in life, may be sent to an industrial school in this way. It is admitted that the order was pronounced in the absence of the girl's father, and without intimation to him that such an order was to be pronounced. We cannot sustain such an order.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Repel the objection stated to the competency of the bill: Pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence and the order complained of simpliciter, and decern."

J. & J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 14.

Jan. 28, 1889.*
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Bourdais.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Robertson, A.-D.—A. O. Mackenzie.
LOUIS LE BOURDAIS AND JOSEPH LE BOURDAIS.—J. C. Thomson—M'Clure.

Indictment—Destroying a ship with intent to defraud insurers—Relevancy—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), secs. 8 and 60.—The master and mate of a vessel were charged on an indictment which set forth that, certain insurances having been effected on the vessel, and these insurances being still in force, they did bore one or more holes in the vessel, and did attempt to force out her bow ports in order that she might sink, and did spread oil over her in order that she might be set on fire, and "did thus attempt to sink and destroy the said barque with intent to defraud the insurers liable under said insurances."

Objection was taken to the relevancy on the ground that the indictment failed to set forth knowledge on the part of the accused that the vessel had been insured, without which fraudulent intent could not be inferred.

Held (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the allegation of an attempt to destroy the vessel "with intent to defraud" the insurers implied knowledge of the insurances, and that the qualifying words "you well knowing that the ship had been so insured" were to be implied by virtue of section 8 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,* and that the indictment was relevant.

Opinion that in the event of the prosecutor failing to prove fraudulent intent, it would be competent for the jury to convict the accused of an attempt to sink the ship maliciously, the word "maliciously" being in that event read in to qualify the acts charged, and a conviction of a part of what was charged in an indictment, if in itself an indictable crime, being competent by section 60 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.†

No. 14.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Bourdais.

ON 27th December 1888 Louis le Bourdais and Joseph le Bourdais were charged before the High Court at Glasgow, on an indictment which bore, "and the charge against you is, that the insurances set out in the schedule appended hereto having been effected on the British barque 'Gylfe' of Quebec, freight thereof, and cargo for a voyage from Quebec to any port in the United Kingdom, so far as ship and freight were concerned, and to the Clyde as regards the cargo, which insurances were all in force on the dates after mentioned; and the said barque having left St John's, Newfoundland, on 16th August 1888, in course of said voyage from Quebec, to proceed to Port-Glasgow, being a port in the United Kingdom and on the Clyde, with a cargo of timber, you, Louis le Bourdais, being master in charge of said barque, and you, Joseph le Bourdais, being chief mate of said barque, did, on 18th, 19th, or 20th August 1888, on board the said barque on the high seas, while the said barque was on said voyage, bore one or more holes in said barque below water-mark, thereby causing her to leak, and did on several occasions on said dates, and on 21st August 1888, attempt to force out the bow ports of said barque, all in order that the said barque should sink, and you did on said last-mentioned date, in order that the said barque should be immediately thereafter set on fire, spread over the cabin floor, decks and other parts of said barque, paraffin or other inflammable oil, and you did thus attempt to sink and destroy the said barque with intent to defraud the insurers liable under said insurances respectively, or otherwise you did, times and place and in manner foresaid, by wilful breach of your duty, attempt to sink and destroy the said barque, contrary to the Act 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104, sec. 239."

HIGH COURT
(GLASGOW).
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Justiciary
Clerk.

Counsel for the panels took objection to the relevancy of the indictment.

Argued for the accused;—The charge was that the accused attempted to destroy the vessel with intent to defraud the insurers. That was a charge

* The Act 50 and 51 Vict. c. 35, sec. 8, enacts—"It shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done or omitted to be done 'wilfully' or 'maliciously,' or 'wickedly and feloniously,' or 'falsely and fraudulently,' or 'knowingly,' or 'culpably and recklessly,' or 'negligently,' or 'in breach of duty,' or to use such words as 'knowing the same to be forged,' or 'having good reason to know,' or 'well knowing the same to be stolen,' or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged, but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which, according to the existing law and practice, its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant.

† The Act 50 and 51 Vict. c. 35, sec. 60, enacts—"Where in an indictment two or more crimes or acts of crime are charged cumulatively, it shall be lawful to convict of any one or more of them, and any part of what is charged in an indictment, constituting in itself an indictable crime, shall be deemed separable to the effect of making it lawful to convict of such crime, and where any crime is charged as having been committed with a particular intent, or with particular circumstances of aggravation, it shall be lawful to convict of the crime without such intent or aggravation."

No. 14.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Bourdais.

of attempt to commit fraud. But the indictment failed to set forth any facts relevant to infer fraudulent intent. It failed to set forth that the insurances upon the vessel were known to the accused; and without such knowledge there could be no fraudulent intent. The only acts alleged against the accused were that they bored holes in the vessel below water-mark and attempted to force out the bow ports in order that she might sink, and spread oil upon the decks in order that she might be set on fire. There was nothing to infer fraud in all that. Nor would the indictment be in any way improved by words being supplied under section 8 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887. It would not be relevant to say that they did "falsely and fraudulently" bore holes. The word "maliciously" might be supplied, but that would not make a relevant charge of fraud. Such an act would be one of barratry, which is one of the perils insured against, and the owners would be entitled to recover in respect of it without the intervention of any fraud. The case of Brown<sup>1</sup> was distinguishable, because in that case the intention and interest on the part of the prisoner to benefit the owner and to do so by fraudulent representation was set forth. The indictment might be relevant as one of malicious mischief, and it was not disputed that by the operation of sec. 60 of the Criminal Procedure Act it might be used as an indictment to that effect, instead of being rejected because it did not relevantly set forth facts to infer the more serious crime charged, viz., the attempt to defraud. But the words "with intent to defraud" ought to be struck out of the indictment as not supported by any relevant averment of facts, and the case sent to trial upon the charge of attempting to destroy the ship and upon that charge only.

Counsel for the Crown were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It does not seem to me that it is necessary to call for a reply here. On the other hand, it was quite right that the objection should be brought forward, as it is very desirable that parties should know how they stand under the new Procedure Act.

The aim of the clauses of the Criminal Procedure Act of last year which relate to libelling is to simplify indictment. The Legislature thought it wise to get rid of the complicated forms in use, and to limit the indictment to a statement of the facts alleged to have been done, in the view that the privilege of proceeding by indictment is given to the public prosecutor only, he acting for the public interest; and that in bringing a prisoner to the bar, the public prosecutor does so on his official responsibility, and undertakes to prove the acts alleged to have been done to have also been done contrary to the common law of the country, where the indictment is at common law, or contrary to the special statute libelled on where the offence charged is a statutory one. In the case of a statutory charge, it is also the duty of the public prosecutor to state specifically the statute and sections under which the prosecution is instituted.

In the present case the prisoners are charged alternatively at common law and under a particular statute, and an objection is stated as regards the common law charge, that the prosecutor should have set forth the facts in such a manner as to qualify the acts alleged to have been done as having been criminally done.

Now, section 8 of the Act of last year (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35) seems to give very striking illustrations of the kind of allegations which are to be implied and therefore may be omitted. For example, in the case of uttering a forged document, it is of the essence of the crime that the person who utters it should do so "knowing the same to be forged." A person may utter a forged writing knowing nothing about the forgery, and that is no crime. Suppose a clerk to cash a forged cheque at the request of his employer, he cannot be held guilty of forgery unless it be proved that he was privy to the forgery by previous knowledge. The new statute authorises the public prosecutor in indictments for forgery to omit the words "knowing the same to be forged," and leaves these words to be implied. The public prosecutor is bound, however, to prove such knowledge on the part of the accused, and it is the duty of the Court, with the assistance of counsel, to see that no prisoner is convicted of uttering forged documents without proof of such knowledge.

<sup>1</sup> Brown, Nov. 8, 1886, 1 White, 243.

No. 14.
Jan. 28, 1889.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Bourdain.

Now, the phrase in the clause applicable to forgery is given as a specimen of the kind of qualifying allegation which may be omitted. The clause does not give the words applicable to every case where it applies, but a sufficient number are given to shew how it is to be applied, and then the following words are added, "or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged, but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case," &c.

In this case it is not disputed that the words omitted would have been sufficient under the old law to make the charge relevant. These words are, "you well knowing that the ship had been so insured," and without that fact being proved it is clear that there could be no conviction of the first crime charged. But what the prosecutor alleges in this indictment is an attempt to sink and destroy the ship with intent to defraud the insurers, and it appears to me that these words sufficiently set forth the intent, and that the allegation of knowledge of insurances having been effected must be implied under the directions of section 8. It would be impossible for anyone to have an intent to defraud insurers without knowing that there were insurances. Here there is a distinct allegation of the intention to defraud insurers, and I hold that the words "you well knowing that the ship had been so insured" were properly omitted in accordance with that section.

I wish to add a word as regards what has been pleaded to the effect that there can be no conviction under the first charge unless knowledge of the insurance is proved. I think that under section 60 of the Criminal Procedure Act, even assuming that the prosecutor fails to prove insurances or knowledge of them, it will be still competent to convict the prisoners of an attempt to sink the ship maliciously should the attempt to sink be proved by evidence. That section provides that "where in an indictment two or more crimes or acts of crime are charged cumulatively, it shall be lawful to convict of any one or more of them, and any part of what is charged in an indictment, constituting in itself an indictable crime, shall be deemed separable to the effect of making it lawful to convict of such crime, and where any crime is charged as having been committed with a particular intent, or with particular circumstances of aggravation, it shall be lawful to convict of the crime without such intent or aggravation." There is no doubt that to bore a hole in a ship in order to sink or destroy it is an offence at common law if the word "maliciously" is implied, as section 8 declares it may be. The great advantage of the recent Act is that after evidence led, which of course is limited to the facts charged, the question whether the acts proved were done criminally can be left to the jury on direction by the Judge as to what they must find to have been the quality of those acts before they

No. 14. can convict under the indictment. I have no difficulty in repelling the objection and holding the libel relevant.

Jan. 28, 1889.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Bourdais.

THE following was the interlocutor:—"The Lord Justice-Clerk, having heard parties, repels the objection and finds the charge relevant under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887."

Evidence having been led, the jury by a majority found the panels severally guilty of the first charge of the indictment as libelled.

SENTENCE of ten years' penal servitude was pronounced upon each of the panels.

R. & J. NEILL, Writers—PROCURATOR-FISCAL OF RENFREWSHIRE—Agents.

No. 15.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Skene v.
Falconer.

THOMAS SKENE, Appellant.—J. C. Thomson—Law.
JAMES GENTLE FALCONER, Respondent.—C. J. Guthrie.

Vaccination—Vaccination Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 108), secs. 8, 18, 26—Failure to transmit certificate of vaccination—Continuing offence—Competency of second complaint.—The Vaccination Act, 1863, enacts by section 8 that the father of every child shall within six months after its birth cause it to be vaccinated, and shall transmit to and lodge with the registrar of births, &c., a medical certificate of successful vaccination.

Section 18 enacts that "the registrar of each district shall once in every six months transmit to the inspector of poor . . . a list of . . . such persons as have failed to transmit or lodge a certificate of vaccination in terms of this Act, and on the receipt of such list the inspector of poor shall lay the same before the parochial board . . . and thereupon the parochial board shall issue an order to the vaccinator appointed by them to vaccinate the persons named in such list, and notice in writing of such order shall be given to such persons, or if children, to their father or mother or the persons having care of them, and in pursuance of such order the vaccinator shall vaccinate the persons named therein" within a certain period, "and if any such person . . . shall refuse to allow such operation to be performed he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty. . . ."

Held that the name of a person who has failed to transmit a certificate of vaccination of his child must be placed on the registrar's list during each successive period of six months for which such failure may subsist, and that the offence is committed on each occasion on which the order to have the child vaccinated, following on such list being laid before the parochial board, is disobeyed.

A person charged with a contravention of section 18 of the Vaccination Act, 1863, by refusing to allow his child to be vaccinated by the vaccinator appointed by the parochial board after an order made by the board under that section, objected to the competency of the complaint on the ground that he had a year previously been convicted under the same section of refusing to allow the same child to be vaccinated. Held that the objection to the competency was bad.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.
Sheriff of Aberdeen-
shire.

JAMES GENTLE FALCONER, residing in the parish of Old Machar, was charged before the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen with an offence within the meaning of the Vaccination Act, 1863.* The complaint set forth that

* The Vaccination Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 108), section 8, enacts that "the father of every child born in Scotland after 1st January 1864 . . . shall within six months after the birth of such child cause such child to be vaccinated by a medical practitioner, and upon and immediately after the successful vaccination of such child, the medical practitioner

Falconer was guilty of a contravention of the Act "in so far as the said James Gentle Falconer having failed to transmit to the registrar of births, deaths, and marriages of the Aberdeen district of the said parish of Old Machar, in terms of the said Act, a certificate of vaccination of Margaret Sim Falconer, a child aged twenty-one months or thereby, born in the said Aberdeen district of the said parish of Old Machar, and of which child the said James Gentle Falconer is the father, the said parochial board did issue an order to John Gregory, bachelor of medicine and master of surgery, a vaccinator appointed by them for the said district, to vaccinate the said Margaret Sim Falconer, and gave notice in writing of the said order to the said James Gentle Falconer, said order and notice having been both dated and made on 19th October 1888, the said James Gentle Falconer did, on 2d November 1888, refuse to allow the operation of vaccination to be performed on the said Margaret Sim Falconer, who was then residing with the said James Gentle Falconer, at No. 11 Erskine Street, Aberdeen, although the said John Gregory then attended to perform the same in terms of the said order, whereby the said James Gentle Falconer is liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding ten days."

No. 15.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Skene v.
Falconer.

who shall have performed the operation shall deliver to the father . . . of such child . . . a certificate under his hand according to the form of schedule A hereto annexed, that such child has been successfully vaccinated, and such certificate shall within three days after the date thereof be transmitted to and lodged with the registrar for the district by the father, . . . and such certificate, if registered, shall without further proof be admissible as evidence of the successful vaccination of such child in any information or complaint which shall be brought against the father for non-conformity with the provisions of this Act."

Sec. 17 enacts,—“In every case where there is not transmitted to the registrar a certificate of the vaccination of any child born within his district . . . within the period and in the manner . . . herein prescribed, the registrar of the district shall intimate such failure to the father or mother, or person having care of such child . . . by a notice transmitted through the post-office; and if a certificate as hereinbefore provided is not exhibited by such father . . . to the registrar within ten days from the despatch of such notice, the father . . . so failing shall forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty shillings . . . and the further sum of one shilling to be paid to the registrar in respect of such notice . . . and failing payment of either of such sums, such father . . . shall be liable to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding ten days.”

Section 18 enacts,—“The registrar of each district shall once in every six months transmit to the inspector of the poor of the parish or combination in which such district is situate, a list of the names and addresses of such persons as have failed to transmit or lodge a certificate of vaccination in terms of this Act, and on the receipt of such list the inspector of the poor shall lay the same before the parochial board of such parish or combination, and thereupon the parochial board shall issue an order to the vaccinator appointed by them to vaccinate the persons named in such list, and notice in writing of such order shall be given to such persons, or if children, to their father or mother or the persons having care of them, and in pursuance of such order the vaccinator shall vaccinate the persons named therein, or any of them, at any time not less than ten nor more than twenty days after the date of such notice, unless such persons shall previously have been vaccinated, and a certificate of their vaccination or insusceptibility shall have been transmitted to the registrar; and if any such person, or the parent or person having the care of any such child, shall refuse to allow such operation to be performed, he shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding ten days.”

No. 15.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Skene v.
Falconer.

Falconer objected to the competency of the complaint on the ground, as stated in the case for appeal, that he was convicted on 28th December 1887 of an offence under the same section of the statute, in respect of the same child.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) sustained the objection, and dismissed the complaint.

The inspector of poor took a case for appeal, the question of law therein stated being "whether the objection to the competency was rightly sustained."

Argued for the appellant ;—The respondent was in the position of being upon the list kept by the registrar of persons who had failed to transmit a certificate of vaccination. That list was to be transmitted to the inspector of poor every six months, and on each such occasion a person who had not got his name removed from that list was liable to prosecution. Such a person could not (as the respondent practically contended), by suffering punishment once, in respect of being upon the list, be thereafter free from the obligation. He was bound to get his name removed from the list by performing the obligation which the statute laid upon him, or for "every such offence" he was liable to punishment. The 26th section of the statute clearly shewed that the inspector of poor was bound to take proceedings against anyone who persistently took no step to have his name removed from the list of persons in default.*

The case of Pilcher<sup>1</sup> referred to on the other side was not in point, because it was decided on the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 100, which was in force in England at the date of that case, and which was different in its terms from the Scottish Act of 1863. The later case of Allen<sup>2</sup> decided on the subsequent English Act, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 84 (sec. 31), was, however in point by way of analogy. It was held under that Act that a parent might be proceeded against from time to time as long as his child remained unvaccinated.

Argued for the respondent ;—The offence could not be committed unless there were clearly a violation of a statutory provision. That could not be made out on a strict construction of section 18. Indeed that section could not bear a strict construction, for it provided that on a list being sent to the inspector of poor of persons who had failed to transmit vaccination certificates, the parochial board should direct their vaccinator to vaccinate "the persons named in such list." There was no provision in the statute for declaring a continuing offence. But where in a statute a continuing offence was intended to be declared, that was expressed in unmistakable language. Of that the Education Act of 1872 was an example. The language of the statute, then, not making it clear that a continuing offence was intended to be created, failure to transmit the certificate could only be held to occur once in one particular period of six months. If a person's name was once entered in one particular period of six months the statute was satisfied, and the name ought not to be entered on the list made up in the next six months. The reading proposed on the other side would not work in practice, for if the meaning of the Act was that the name should occur again and again, that would only happen when the person in question remained in the particular parish. There was no provision for communicating to the inspector of a parish to which a defaulter might remove, the information that no certificate had been transmitted.

* Section 26 of the Act enacts,—“It shall be competent to raise such proceedings for enforcing any penalties incurred in contravention of this Act at any time during which the person against whom such proceedings are taken is in default ; and the Sheriff by whom such penalty shall be found due by virtue of this Act shall award such penalty to the funds for the support of the poor of the parish . . . in which the offence shall have been committed, and shall order the same to be paid over to the inspector of poor, or other officer of the parochial board for that purpose.”

<sup>1</sup> Pilcher v. Stafford, 1864, 33 L. J. Mag. Ca. 113.

<sup>2</sup> Allen v. Worthy, 1870, L. R. 5 Q. B. 163.

No. 15.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Skene v.
Falconer.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case does not to my mind present any real difficulty. Section 18 of the Vaccination Act for Scotland is rather loosely expressed but its meaning is, I think, quite plain. The statute, in the first place, enacts that any person who fails to have his child vaccinated, or to produce a certificate of unfitness for vaccination, is liable to prosecution. Then by section 18 it is provided that the registrar of each district is once in every six months to transmit to the inspector of poor the names and addresses of such persons as have failed to transmit a certificate in terms of the Act. Of course children cannot so transmit the certificate, and the plain meaning of the Act is that those whose duty it is to look after the children are to send the certificates. The registrar is to make out a list of those in default. That is to be laid before the parochial board by the inspector of the poor. Then an order is to be issued by the board appointing a vaccinator to vaccinate such persons. Notice of such order is to be given to such persons, or if children, to their father or mother or persons having care of them, and in pursuance of the order the vaccinator is to perform the operation, and if any person refuses to allow him to do so, such person is liable to a penalty. I see nothing in this section to justify the registrar in excluding from his list any person still resident in his district whose name appears in the register who is not entered as having been vaccinated. It is said that persons may leave the district, and that no provision is made for such cases. That merely shews that the machinery provided by the Act of Parliament is not absolutely certain in its action. It could scarcely be so. Every conceivable case could not be provided for. But in so far as it is certain there is nothing in this section to indicate that it is not to be carried out to the uttermost. That being so, I think that it is the duty of the registrar in making out his list every six months to include the name of every person not certified as vaccinated, or unfit, without regard to the question whether such person was included in former lists, and that if any person's name so appears in the registrar's list the parochial board are bound to issue the order to vaccinate, and if they do so and the person, or parent or guardian, refuses to allow the operation to be performed, then the penalty is incurred.

I must therefore move your Lordships to answer the question in this case in the negative, and to remit the cause back to the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ADAM.—This complaint is brought under the 18th section of the Vaccination Act of 1863. The only objection stated to it is an objection outwith the complaint altogether, namely—that the accused had been convicted for the same offence in respect of the same child on the 28th December 1887. The validity of this objection depends upon the construction of the 18th section of the statute, and I concur with your Lordship that upon the construction of that section it very clearly appears that the accused here was not convicted of the same offence upon the 28th December 1887. The section is to my mind quite intelligible though not very well expressed. It lays a duty

No. 15.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Skene v.
Falconer.

upon the registrar of each district once in every six months to transmit to the inspector of the poor a list of the names and addresses of "such persons as have failed to transmit or lodge a certificate of vaccination in terms of this Act." I do not understand that it is contended on the other side that the complainer here was not in that position. I have not heard it said that he was not one of those persons who had failed to transmit or lodge a certificate of vaccination in terms of the Act. Therefore, in my view, the registrar had no alternative but to put him in that list. That list is to be sent to the inspector of poor. He is to lay it before the parochial board and the board is to issue an order to their vaccinator to vaccinate the persons "named in such list," the clear meaning being the unvaccinated persons named in such list. All this having happened by force of the statute, the vaccinator is to proceed to vaccinate such persons. Then these words follow—"And if any such person, or the parent or person having the care of any such child, shall refuse to allow such operation to be performed, he shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and failing payment, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding ten days." It is to me clear that that order may be pronounced every six months, and the offence committed every six months. In my humble opinion the offence is committed every time the order is disobeyed. It is, in my judgment, a misreading of the statute to regard the two offences as the same offence. I therefore think the Sheriff-substitute wrong in sustaining as a bar to all further proceedings the conviction for refusal to obey a previous order. But further we have the words used in the section "every such offence." I think these words imply the possibility of more than one such offence. If it had been otherwise the words used would have been "for such offence."

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the question raised by this case is a difficult question, but I have come to be of opinion with your Lordships that the Sheriff-substitute is in error in sustaining as he has done the objection to the competency of the complaint.

Section 18 of the Act of 1863 has not been very carefully revised, and it contains, on a literal reading of it, a provision of a very startling kind. It appears upon the face of the clause that the registrar is to transmit a list of the names and addresses of the persons who have failed to lodge certificates of vaccination to the inspector of poor, and that the parochial board, on the same being laid before them by the inspector, is to issue an order to vaccinate "the persons named in such list." This may be read, undoubtedly, as meaning the persons who have failed to transmit to the registrar the certificate of vaccination; not the child or children to whom the desiderated certificate would apply. But the real meaning of the section is discoverable when it is considered what the certificate when sent to the registrar would bear. The certificate required by the Act would, if duly transmitted, bear the name of the child who had not been vaccinated, or whose vaccination had been postponed. That name—the name of the child—will therefore appear in the list made up by the registrar. The list will contain not merely the name of the defaulting parent or guardian, but the name of the child in regard to whom there has been default. On such a list being transmitted by the registrar, the parochial board is to order the vaccination of the "persons named in said list"—that is, is to order the vaccination of the persons named in that list who are there reported as not having been vaccinated, or rather, of whose vaccination no certificate has been lodged with the registrar. I think the section bears the meaning I have thus put upon it. No. 15.

Any other meaning would render the clause ineffectual in the attainment of the end sought thereby to be attained, and if that be so, we are bound to put such a meaning on the clause (if the words of the clause will bear it) as will make the clause effectual, rather than a meaning which will make the clause nugatory.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Skene v.
Falconer.

The registrar is directed by the Act to transmit his list to the parochial board every six months, and the parochial board is thereupon to order the vaccination of the child. Every such order must be obeyed, until the child's name, as well as its defaulting guardian's name, is removed from the list, and the disobedience of every such order incurs the statutory penalty. I think this is a more reasonable view of the statute than that which the Sheriff-substitute has taken. In coming to this conclusion I do not attach much weight, if any, to the use of the words "every such offence," which I regard rather as words of style than as an express direction as to the accumulation of offences and penalties.

Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn's remarks in Pilcher's case (33 L. J. Mag. Cas. 113) would have had more force and weight in the present question if the Act he was interpreting when he decided that case had been the same as that now under consideration, but that Act contained no clause equivalent to that under which this complaint is brought.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, and remitted the cause to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed in terms of law.

HAGART & BURN MURDOCH, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM CHALMERS (Salmon-Fishery District Board of the River Tay), No. 16.
Appellant.—Ure.

CHARLES BAIN, Respondent.—Craigie.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Chalmers v.
Bain.

Poaching—Possession of salmon in close time—Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 21—Fishing.—The Salmon-Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 21, provides,—“Any person who shall . . . have in his possession any salmon taken within the limits of this Act between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time which is in force at the time for any district, shall be liable to a penalty . . .”

Held that “annual close time” in the Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868, means the period during which net-fishing for salmon is prohibited, and not the period during which fishing by rod and line is also prohibited.

Held, therefore, that a complaint which charged a contravention of sec. 21 of the Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868, in respect that the accused had, on 29th November 1888, “in their possession salmon . . . taken within the limits of the said Act between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time for any district in Scotland,” was relevant, although on the day libelled it was lawful to fish for salmon in the Tweed district by rod and line.

CHARLES BAIN and Edward Irvine were, on 26th December 1888, charged before the Justice of Peace Court of Perthshire at the instance of William Chalmers, solicitor, the person authorised to prosecute on behalf of the Salmon-Fishery District Board for the River Tay, with an offence against section 21 of the Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868.*

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.
J.P. Court of Perthshire.

* The Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 21, enacts,—“Any person who shall buy, sell, or expose for sale, or have in his possession any salmon taken within the limits of the Act between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time which is in force at the time for any district, shall be liable to a penalty . . . and the bur-

No. 16.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Chalmers v.
Bain.

The complaint set forth that the accused had contravened that section, "in so far as upon Thursday, the 29th day of November 1888, or about that time, the said Charles Bain or Bayne and Edward Erwin or Irvine had in their possession salmon, or fish of the salmon kind, taken within the limits of the said Act, between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time then in force for any district in Scotland, and that in East High Street, Crieff, and had in their possession on such occasion a bag containing two salmon, or fish of the salmon kind, which were seized in terms of said Act."

Irvine did not appear, but Bain appeared and pleaded not guilty. The record of the proceedings bore, that "after hearing a statement by Mr McCosh on behalf of the accused, to the effect that no valid offence was alleged, in respect that the alleged contravention took place when the district of the River Tweed was open for rod and line fishing, the Justices sustained the objection, and dismissed the complaint."

Chalmers took a case. This question of law was stated, viz.:—"Whether the words annual close time in section 21 of the Salmon-Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, include the extension of time for rod-fishing?"

Argued for the appellant;—Annual close time in the section libelled meant annual close time for net-fishing. In the Tweed district that period lasted from 14th September to 15th February, and therefore covered 29th November, the day libelled. Close time meant the time when the nets were off, and the Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1862, used language which implied that, for it implied that rod and line fishing might be carried on in close time.* The annual close time would not amount to 168 but only to 62 days if the contention of the respondent were to prevail.† The den of proving that any such salmon was caught beyond the limits of the Act shall lie on the person selling or exposing the same for sale or having the same in his possession."

* The Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 97), sec. 6, enacts that "the Commissioners shall have the powers and perform the duties hereinafter specified,—that is to say (subsec. 5), to determine, subject to the provisions of this Act, at what dates the annual close time for every district shall commence and terminate, and at what periods subsequent to the commencement and prior to the termination of the annual close time it shall be lawful to fish for and take salmon with the rod and line; provided that the number of days during which such annual close time shall continue shall be the same as regards every district."

† The Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1862, enacts (sec. 7),—The annual close time for every district shall continue for 168 days, and the weekly close time, except for rod and line fishing, shall continue "from six o'clock on Saturday night to six o'clock on Monday morning"; and (sec. 8) the annual close time shall be applicable to every mode of fishing for or taking salmon in any river, lake, or estuary, or in the sea, except by means of the rod and line, for the periods in each district to be fixed by the Commissioners subsequent to the commencement and prior to the termination of the annual close time, during which it shall be lawful to fish for and take salmon by means of the rod and line.

The Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), enacts (sec. 9),—"Any district board . . . may resolve to petition the Secretary of State . . ." (subsec. 1) "to vary the annual close time in such district, provided that such annual close time shall always be 168 days." And sec. 15 enacts that "every person who" (subsec. 1) "fishes for, takes, or attempts to take, or aids, or assists in fishing for, taking, or attempting to take salmon during the annual close time by any means other than rod and line," shall be liable to a penalty.

By schedule C there is given a form of bye-law of close time by the Commissioners, determining that the annual close time shall commence and terminate on certain dates, both days inclusive; and that "it shall be lawful to fish for Justices had been misled by their reading of the cases of Wilsone v. Harvey No. 16. and Chalmers v. McGlashan.<sup>1</sup> In these cases there were, no doubt, dicta by Lord Young favourable to the respondent's contention, but these were unnecessary to the judgments. Mar. 4, 1889.

Chalmers v. Bain.

Argued for the respondent;—The section founded on was so expressed that a conviction could not be obtained on such a charge. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) in Chalmers' case said,—“I agree in thinking that the clause is unworkable, for it involves the assertion of an absurdity,” and went on to point out that it did not carry out what was, presumably, its intention. But apart from that, the whole question here raised had been discussed in that case and in that of Wilsone, and it had been decided that no conviction could be obtained under section 21 so long as the fish might have been lawfully taken in any district. Now, the Tweed was open for rod and line fishing on 29th November. It would be a good defence if it were proved that the salmon were taken by rod and line. The complaint therefore was irrelevant.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The sole question in this appeal is whether the prosecutor in this complaint has stated a relevant case under the Salmon-Fisheries Act. The complaint is that on 29th November 1888 the accused “had in their possession salmon, or fish of the salmon kind, taken within the limits of the said Act, between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time then in force for any district in Scotland, and that in East High Street, Crieff, and had in their possession on such occasion a bag containing two salmon, or fish of the salmon kind, which were seized in terms of the said Act.” Now, the question whether that is a relevant charge turns upon the answer to this other question, what is “annual close time”? For it is conceded that if the expression “annual close time” does not cover 29th November 1888 then the complaint would not be relevant. It is not suggested by the respondent that there is any other ground on which the complaint must be held to be irrelevant except that, according to his contention, the 29th November is not “close time.” What, then, does annual close time mean? I am satisfied, after considering the provisions of the Act of 1862, that annual close time means the period beginning in autumn and terminating in spring when no fishing for salmon is permitted otherwise than by rod and line only. I think that the terms of the Act itself make that clear. Thus in section 6 we find that the Commissioners under the Act “shall have the powers and perform the duties hereinafter specified; that is to say (subsec. 5), to determine, subject to the provisions of this Act, at what dates the annual close time for every district shall commence and terminate, and at what periods subsequent to the commencement of the annual close time it shall be lawful to fish for and take salmon with the rod and line; provided that the number of days during which such annual close time shall continue shall be the same as regards every district.” Again section 7 declares that the annual close time shall continue for 168 days, which would be impossible if the extra time allowed for rod and line fishing were excluded from the close time. Lastly, section 8 shews that annual close time applies to every mode of fishing except rod and line, for it provides that “the and to take salmon with the rod and line” from a date within to another date also within such close time.

<sup>1</sup> Wilsone v. Harvey, Nov. 13, 1884, 5 Couper, 518, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 12; Chalmers v. McGlashan, Feb. 2, 1886, 1 White, 1, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 17; cf. Blair v. Shepherd, April 12, 1871, 2 Couper, 28.

No. 16.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Chalmers v.
Bain.

annual close time shall be applicable to every mode of fishing for or taking salmon in any river, lake, or estuary, or in the sea, except by means of the rod and line, for the periods in each district to be fixed by the Commissioners subsequent to the commencement and prior to the termination of the annual close time, during which it shall be lawful to fish for and take salmon by means of the rod and line."

Now, whatever may have been said obiter in other cases, I have no hesitation in holding that the words of the statute indicating what is the annual close time are not affected either as to the commencement or as to the termination of it by considerations as to whether or not rod and line fishing is legal. Permission for rod and line fishing is indeed an exceptional favour granted to the angler, entitling him to fish within, it may be, the annual close time, but by that method only. Such exceptional permission is only necessary because of the establishment of the close time, and it allows rod-fishing during the close time. I think that that is sufficient for the decision of the question. But there was a question raised by the respondent in argument which is indeed not, properly speaking, one of relevancy, but requires to be noticed. The respondent raised the question whether or not it would be a good defence if the accused proved that the fish were caught by rod and line. It is not necessary to give any opinion on that point now. It will be for the Judge who tries the case, when he hears it, to give his decision. But I need not conceal my own view, which is that it would be a good defence if a person accused under such a complaint were to prove that the salmon were taken by rod and line.

This appeal is, on the grounds I have stated, well founded, and we must sustain it, and remit the cause to the Justices to proceed.

LORD ADAM.—The accused were charged with a contravention of section 21 of the Salmon-Fisheries Act, 1868, in so far as they had in their possession on 29th November 1888 salmon taken within the limits of the Act, "between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time then in force for any district in Scotland." On the face of it that appears a relevant complaint. But it appears from the case that "after hearing a statement by Mr M'Cosh on behalf of the accused to the effect that no valid offence was alleged, in respect that the alleged contravention took place when the district of the River Tweed was open for rod and line fishing," the Justices dismissed the complaint. Now, it is obvious that the material date is 29th November 1888. It is admitted that on that date the Tweed district was open for rod-fishing, and that being so, it is said that the complaint is irrelevant, and indeed it would be so if that were the proper interpretation of the phrase the "annual close time." If annual close time means simply the time during which all net-fishing is prohibited, then the complaint is relevant, but if it means the time during which rod-fishing also is prohibited, then the complaint is irrelevant. Now, I do not propose to go over a second time the various sections to which your Lordship has alluded in order to answer the question, what is annual close time in the sense of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, libelled on? I shall only say that I think it clear, beyond doubt, that the expression means that period when net-fishing is prohibited.

If we come to that conclusion, it follows from it that the complaint is relevant. If so, the question whether it is an answer to such a complaint as is before us, that the salmon was taken by rod and line, is a question which may arise on the defence. It may arise in this case or it may not. It is not necessary to anticipate what may be a good defence; I reserve my opinion upon it. I have no hesitation in concurring with your Lordships in holding that the "annual close time" is the time during which net-fishing is prohibited.

No. 16.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Chalmers v.
Bain.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the view which your Lordships have taken of the expression "annual close time," and therefore I concur in thinking that the complaint is relevant.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative, and remitted the cause to the Justices.

THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—J. B. M'COSH, Perth—Agents.

JOHN CAIRNS, Appellant.—J. Wilson.

THOMAS LINTON (Procurator-Fiscal of Edinburgh Police Court),

Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Boyd.

No. 17.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Cairns v.
Linton.

*Jurisdiction—Sheriff of Edinburgh—Citation out of Jurisdiction—Endorsement of warrant of Judge of Police Court—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. cxxxii.), secs. 333 and 5.—Held that under sections 333 and 5 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879,* the warrant of the Judge of Police in Edinburgh is sufficient for citing or apprehending any person resident in another county who is charged with an offence which may be tried by him, if such warrant be endorsed by the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh or Midlothian, or any one of his Substitutes.*

Unsound meat—"Possession as or for human food"—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. cxxxii.), sec. 261.—A farmer in Perthshire despatched from Crieff Junction in the ordinary course of business the carcass of a bull addressed to the Dead Meat Company, Fountainbridge, Edinburgh. The carcass arrived at the Dead Meat Market, and in consequence of its appearance was examined by the manager of the market and condemned as unfit for human food. The farmer was charged with and convicted of a contravention of the 261st section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act,† in respect he had unsound beef in Edinburgh, "in his possession as or for human food."

On appeal, the Court (dub. Lord Trayner) quashed the conviction, holding that facts had not been proved sufficient to infer that the accused had the carcass in Edinburgh in his possession either actually or constructively as or for human food.

* The Act 42 and 43 Vict. c. cxxxii., enacts, sec. 333,—“When any person charged with having committed any crime or offence which may be tried by the Judge of Police is beyond the burgh, the Judge of Police shall grant warrant for apprehending or citing the offender . . . and any such warrant shall be sufficient within Scotland . . . if such warrant be endorsed by the Sheriff or by the Sheriff of the county where the same shall be executed . . .”

Sec. 5 enacts,—“The word ‘Sheriff’ shall mean the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh or Midlothian, or any one of his Substitutes, excepting where specially provided to the contrary.”

† The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 261, enacts,—“Every person who shall sell, or expose to sale, or have in his possession, as or for human food, the carcass or any part of the carcass of any animal which shall appear to have died of or been killed in consequence of disease, or any butcher meat, fish, poultry, or other article of provision of an unsound or unwholesome description, or in a state unfit or unsuitable for human food, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, and the articles shall be forfeited and disposed of as the Judge of Police shall direct.”

No. 17.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Cairns v.
Linton.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ON 5th April 1888 John Cairns, residing at Gleneagles, Perthshire, was charged before the Judge of the Police Court at Edinburgh at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal upon a complaint which set forth that, "contrary to the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, section 261, upon the 30th of March 1888, he had in his possession, as or for human food, in Fountainbridge Street, Edinburgh, 596 pounds weight of butcher meat, videlicet, beef of an unsound and unwholesome description, and in a state unfit and unsuitable for human food: And the said accused being beyond the burgh of Edinburgh, it is therefore craved that warrant be granted for summoning the said accused to answer to this complaint; and for citing witnesses for both parties." Of the same date, the Judge granted warrant to officers of police for summoning the accused to answer to the complaint, and for citing witnesses for both parties; and the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles (Rutherford) granted his concurrence to the execution of the warrant by indorsation.

On 6th April the accused was summoned at Gleneagles to appear before the Judge of Police at Edinburgh to answer to the complaint.

The accused objected to the jurisdiction of the Court, but the objection was repelled by the Judge of Police, who, after evidence led, found the complaint proved, convicted the accused, and fined him £7 sterling, with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment.

Cairns took a case, in which the facts held to be proved were set forth as follows:—"That the appellant was a farmer, residing at Gleneagles, in the parish of Blackford and county of Perth. That on the 23d March 1888 he had a bull which was suffering from illness; that he called in the veterinary surgeon at Auchterarder, who is also inspector under the Local Authority for that district of the county of Perth; that the veterinary surgeon saw this bull on the 23d and 25th days of March 1888, and expressed an opinion that it was suffering from 'fardle bound' (an affection of the stomach), and treated it accordingly; that he advised that the animal be at once slaughtered in case it should die from the disease. That the said veterinary surgeon did not see the carcase after the animal had been slaughtered. That the bull was slaughtered by a butcher from Auchterarder, who dressed the carcase and removed part of the membrane from the interior of the animal. It was also proved that the parts so removed were those which would have shewn the symptoms of pleurisy most distinctly, that being a disease from which the animal was proved to have been suffering when slaughtered. That the carcase was dressed in presence of the appellant and the butcher in the usual manner as or for human food, and thereafter despatched by the appellant for sale in the ordinary course of business, from Crieff Junction, on the 29th of March aforesaid, addressed to 'The Dead Meat Company, Fountainbridge, Edinburgh.' That it arrived at the said market on the day following, and upon being taken out of its wrappings was, in consequence of its appearance, sent by the manager of the said market to the slaughter-houses, where, having been examined, it was at once condemned as unsound and unfit for human food—traces of disease being still quite apparent on the carcase when examined."

The questions of law were,—(1) Had the Police Court of Edinburgh jurisdiction in this case? (2) Do the facts proved warrant the conviction complained of?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The Judge of the Police Court had no jurisdiction here, in respect the appellant was cited upon an invalid warrant. He was "beyond the burgh," and the warrant was not endorsed by the Sheriff of the county of Perth, in terms of the 333d section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879. It was true that the warrant was endorsed by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles in terms of the 5th section, but if such endorsement were given effect to it would be favouring the anomaly that the Sheriff of Edinburgh had jurisdiction over the length and breadth of Scotland. (2) On the merits, there was no "possession" proved on the part of the accused in Edinburgh of unsound meat "as or for human food." He parted with possession of the carcase after he had despatched it from Crieff Junction. There was no room in a criminal case for the "constructive" possession recognised in civil cases. A different result might have been reached if he had been charged under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, which by section 26 made the "custody" of unsound meat an offence.

No. 17.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Cairns v.
Linton.

Argued for the respondent;—The citation was valid. Sections 333 and 5 of the Act read together made the warrant of the Judge of Police valid if it was endorsed either "by the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh or Midlothian, or any of his Substitutes, or by the Sheriff of the county where the same was executed." If effect were given to the appellant's objections the first part of this clause would be rendered nugatory. Though at first sight the statute might seem ambiguous, it was plain that the object of the clause in question was to render the proceedings as summary as possible. (2) On the merits. The question was as to whether the carcase, which was undoubtedly dressed in the appellant's presence for human food, was in his "possession" on the day libelled. It was not necessary for him to have actual tangible possession as long as he had the power of dealing with it as he pleased. It was in the consignee's hands in Edinburgh on his behalf, although he had sent it away from his premises in Perthshire. The consignee was really acting as his agent or servant.

LORD ADAM.—This is a case stated by the Judge of the Police Court of Edinburgh. The complaint against Cairns is that, contrary to the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, section 261, upon the 30th of March 1888 he had in his possession as or for human food in Fountainbridge Street, Edinburgh, and at some other place or places within the limits of the Edinburgh City Police to the prosecutor unknown, five hundred and ninety-six pounds weight of butcher meat, videlicet, beef of an unsound and unwholesome description, and in a state unfit and unsuitable for human food. The section of the Act referred to, omitting the words which do not apply to this case, enacts that "every person who shall sell or expose for sale, or have in his possession, as or for human food . . . any butcher meat, fish, or poultry, or other article of provision of an unsound or unwholesome description, or in a state unfit or unsuitable for human food, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20."

After stating the facts the case set forth that the Judge found the complaint proved, convicted the appellant, and fined him £7 sterling, with the alternative of ten days' imprisonment. Two questions are stated for our consideration—(1) Had the Police Court of Edinburgh jurisdiction in this case? and (2) Do the facts proved warrant the conviction complained of?

Now, with reference to the first question the answer depends upon whether the appellant was duly and sufficiently cited to the Court. If he was duly cited, then there is no ground for questioning the jurisdiction. The proceedings bearing upon this question are set forth in an appendix and made part of the case. They are the complaint, the citation of the defender, and the minutes of procedure. The complaint sets forth that the accused is beyond the burgh of Edinburgh, and craves that warrant be granted for summoning the accused and for citing witnesses. On 5th April 1888 warrant was granted to summon the

No. 17.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Cairns v.
Linton.

accused and cite witnesses. Of the same date the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles granted his concurrence to the execution of this warrant by indorsation. Then we have the citation, which bears that the accused John Cairns, Gleneagles, Blackford, county of Perth, was regularly summoned by an officer of police on 6th April 1888 to answer the complaint. It is obvious upon the face of these proceedings where the objection, if it is a sound one, lies. The citation of the accused, who is resident in the county of Perth, is done under the authority and warrant of the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles. I think there can be no doubt that that is not in conformity with the usual law and practice in Scotland with reference to citations, because it implies that the warrant of the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles is of authority in the county of Perth. So far as I know, this is altogether unknown in our practice. The jurisdiction of a Sheriff is limited solely in the ordinary case to his own county. The question here accordingly is whether or not this proceeding, which is contrary to the usual practice, is justified by the provisions of the 333d section of the Edinburgh Police Act, and the answer in my view depends entirely upon the construction of that section. Omitting superfluous words, that section bears, "when any person charged with having committed any crime or offence which may be tried by the Judge of Police, is beyond the burgh, . . . the Judge of Police shall grant warrant for apprehending or citing the offender . . . and any such warrant shall be sufficient within Scotland . . . if such warrant be endorsed by the Sheriff or by the Sheriff of the county where the same shall be executed, and such warrant may be executed by a sheriff-officer, messenger-at-arms, or constable." Now, we have the warrant here by the Judge of the Police Court, and there is no question about its regularity. The question is whether it be sufficient under this Act that it be endorsed by the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles. The words of the Act are "if such warrant be endorsed by the Sheriff or by the Sheriff of the county where the same shall be executed." In section 5 the Sheriff is said to mean the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh or Midlothian or any of his substitutes. So that the 333d section will read thus,—“Such warrant shall be sufficient . . . if such warrant be endorsed by the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh or Midlothian or any of his Substitutes, or by the Sheriff of the county where the same shall be executed.” I think no one can doubt that that is the literal meaning of the clause, and that the warrant shall be sufficient if endorsed either by the Sheriff of Edinburgh or by the Sheriff of the county. Taking the clause in its literal sense it would appear to be sufficient to justify these proceedings. But it is said, and in my opinion with a great deal of force, that the clause must be read with reference to the existing law and practice, with regard to the power and authority of the Sheriff within and beyond his own district. And, as I have said, in the ordinary case no Sheriff has jurisdiction out of his own territory, or power to cite out of his own territory, and, if we sustain the literal meaning of the statute, it comes to this, that we are sustaining the authority of the warrants of the Sheriff of Edinburgh over the length and breadth of Scotland. I certainly cannot come easily to such a reading. But on the other side it is said with equal force that in construing a statute you must give effect, so far as is possible, to all the words of it, and if that be so, it is clear to my mind that if we do not sustain this citation we are giving no effect to the words “endorsed by the Sheriff of Edinburgh.” The words “the Sheriff of the county where the same shall be executed” would necessarily include the Sheriff of Edinburgh, when the execution is within his jurisdiction. No. 17.

 Therefore if we take the view of the statute urged by the appellant we render Mar. 4, 1889.
 the first part of this clause altogether without meaning. I quite feel the force of Cairns v. Linton.
 the appellant's argument, but on the whole matter, though with a great deal of doubt, I think we ought to read this clause in its literal meaning, and to hold that the warrant is valid if endorsed either by the Sheriff of Edinburgh or by the Sheriff of the county where the same is executed. I have therefore come to be of opinion that the Judge of the Police Court in Edinburgh had jurisdiction in this case, and that the first question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

The question remains upon the facts. The facts as set forth seem to be shortly these. On 23d March 1888 the appellant had a bull suffering from illness. He sent for the inspector and had the bull examined. The inspector pronounced it to be suffering from a disease called "fardle bound" and advised that it should be slaughtered. What followed is thus set forth:—"That the said veterinary surgeon did not see the carcass after the animal had been slaughtered.
 That the bull was slaughtered by a butcher from Auchterarder, who dressed the carcass and removed part of the membrane from the interior of the animal. It was also proved that the parts so removed were those which would have shewn the symptoms of pleurisy most distinctly, that being the disease from which the animal was proved to have been suffering when slaughtered. That the carcass was dressed in presence of the appellant and the butcher in the usual manner as for human food, and thereafter despatched by the appellant for sale in the ordinary course of business from Crieff Junction on the 29th of March aforesaid, addressed to the Dead Meat Company, Fountainbridge, Edinburgh."
 If it had been necessary in this case that the guilty knowledge of the appellant must be held to be proved, it might or might not be that the facts stated would have been sufficient to infer knowledge that the meat was unfit for human food.
 But it seems to me that that is not the only fact that must be proved here. I think it must also be proved that the meat was in the possession of the appellant at Fountainbridge, Edinburgh. If that is not so, it appears to me that no conviction can follow. The facts upon that part of the case immediately follow.
 It is stated that the carcass "arrived at the said market on the day following, and upon being taken out of its wrappings was, in consequence of its appearance, sent by the manager of the said market to the slaughter-houses, where, having been examined, it was at once condemned as unsound and unfit for human food —traces of disease being still apparent on the carcass when examined." It appears to me in the first place very clear that the meat was not in the actual possession of the appellant in Fountainbridge, Edinburgh. The last time it appears to have been in the actual possession of the appellant was when for-forwarded by him from Crieff Junction, in the county of Perth. The only person in whose possession it was in Edinburgh, so far as appears from the facts stated, was the manager of the Dead Meat Company. I am far from saying that it may not be possible that although not in the actual possession of the appellant it may notwithstanding have been constructively in his possession, sufficiently to warrant a conviction under this statute. It might be in the hands of a shopman of his or a mere servant. But it humbly appears to me that, if that was to be the case made against the appellant, facts should have been proved to the Judge going to shew that this meat, although not in the actual possession of the appellant, was yet constructively so, so as to warrant a conviction. I find no facts stated which would lead to this inference. It rather

No. 17.

Mar. 4, 1889.
Cairns v.
Linton.

appears that the facts lead to a contrary inference, because it would appear that the manager of the Dead Meat Company assumed that he had the full control of the meat after it came into his possession. He did what was proper and right. He sent the meat to be examined, and it was condemned. That indicates that this manager had the entire control. It may be that the appellant may have thought that those in Edinburgh would be better able to judge of the soundness of the meat than himself, and may have sent it with no intention that it should be exposed for human food without examination. That is the state of the facts as stated, and I am unable to concur in this conviction. I therefore think we should answer the second question in the negative.

LORD TRAYNER.—On the first question I agree with Lord Adam. It seems to me impossible to hold that the accused was not duly summoned if we give effect to the words of the 333d section of the Edinburgh Police Act. I concur in thinking it an unusual clause, and I doubt whether the Legislature intended to confer upon the Sheriff of Edinburgh the power to cite in every part of Scotland. But we have no concern with that. I think we are bound to give effect to the plain words of the statute.

Upon the second question I also agree with Lord Adam, but not without hesitation. I have great doubt whether the possession on the part of the manager of the Dead Meat Company was not constructively such possession on the part of the accused as would make him responsible, but my doubt is by no means so strong as to induce me to take a different view, and I therefore concur in thinking that the second question should be answered in the negative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with your Lordships upon both points. I think that in dealing with a statute we are bound to take the literal meaning of the words, and the literal meaning of the section in question is that the warrant of the Judge of the Police Court in Edinburgh is to be sufficient beyond the burgh, if endorsed by the Sheriff of Edinburgh or any of his Substitutes, or by the Sheriff of the county in which it is executed. And, whether the Legislature intended it or not, one can see that there is great convenience in the Sheriff of the jurisdiction where the burgh is situated having authority to assist the Police Magistrate in making citations throughout the country. Such a provision does, no doubt, to a certain extent, give jurisdiction to the Sheriff beyond the limits of his county, but it is conceivable that reasons of public convenience might render that expedient, and a Sheriff being looked upon as an official of a superior grade might very well have such a jurisdiction conferred upon him, a jurisdiction which applies only to the bringing up of the accused for trial.

As regards the question on the merits, I think the view which Lord Adam has stated is a perfectly sound one. If the manager of the Dead Meat Company had authority to do what the facts set forth shew that he did do, I think it is plain that the meat was in his possession and not in the possession of anyone else, because he seems to have had full control over it and power to deal with it as he pleased.

The phrase used in the statute with regard to possession is, as applicable to this case, a peculiar one. The phrase is "shall sell, or expose for sale, or have in his possession as or for human food." The meat was never sold or exposed for sale. Was it, then, in the possession of anyone "as or for human food"?

These words rather seem to indicate that to constitute a contravention of the statute something must be done which commits the person doing it to having overtly dealt with the meat as being presented to the public as being for human food. For example, if a contractor was caught in the act of delivering diseased carcasses at a butcher's door, it might very reasonably be held that he had them in his possession "as or for human food." But the case here is different. There was no overt act. There can be no doubt that, had the carcass been found on the premises of the appellant, there could have been no ground for saying that he had it in his possession "as or for human food." The carcass was quite innocently in his possession, he having killed the animal by advice of the veterinary surgeon. Nor did the sending of it to Edinburgh imply, in my opinion, that his possession was of this character. I think there is great force in what Lord Adam has pointed out, namely, that the appellant sent it to parties in Edinburgh who were judges of such matters, and whose duty and interest it was to inspect the carcass on arrival, and to withhold it from the market if it were in bad condition. It is also to be noted that the appellant did not have this animal slaughtered by his own servants, but by a butcher from Auchterarder, which indicates that he acted in bona fide and did not think the animal had any other disease than that from which the inspector had pronounced it to be suffering, which was not a complaint tending to make it unfit for human food.

Upon the whole matter I think we should sustain the appeal upon the ground that the case does not set forth facts sufficient to infer that the accused had the meat in question "in his possession as or for human food."

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern."

THOMAS M'NAUGHT, S.S.C.—W. WHITE MILLAR, S.S.C.—Agents.

RICHARD GRANT, Complainer.—Rhind.

ALEXANDER GRIGOR ALLAN (Procurator-Fiscal of Elginshire at Elgin), Respondent.—D. Robertson, A.-D.

No. 18.

June 3, 1889.
Grant v.
Allan.

Sentence—Sentence proceeding upon an illegal previous conviction.—A boy, nine years of age, was charged with theft aggravated by two previous convictions. He pleaded guilty, and was sentenced. One of these previous convictions had been obtained against him when he was five years of age.

The Court quashed the sentence, holding that the previous conviction in question was null, and ought not to have been under the consideration of the Judge in giving sentence.

RICHARD GRANT, nine years of age, son of James Grant, carter, Bishopmill, Elgin, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Elginshire at Elgin, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal upon a complaint which set forth that he "did, on 9th April 1889, from Lesmurdie House, St Andrew's, Lhanbryd parish, Elginshire, occupied by Charles James Johnston, manufacturer, steal a football, and the said Richard Grant has been previously convicted of the crime of theft before the Police Court of Elgin on 12th September 1885 and 20th January 1887 respectively."

He pleaded guilty, and was convicted and sentenced to ten days' imprisonment, and to detention for five years thereafter in a reformatory.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinnear.
Justiciary
Clerk.

No. 18.

June 8, 1889.
Grant v.
Allan.

With the consent and concurrence of his father, he brought a suspension of the conviction and sentence.

He produced a certificate of birth, from which it appeared that at the date of his conviction on 12th September 1885 he was only five years of age.

Argued for complainer;—The previous conviction was null, as a child of five years of age could not be guilty of theft. It followed that the present conviction and sentence, which proceeded partly upon it, must be set aside.

Argued for the respondent;—Even if the previous conviction in question were left out of account, the sentence was quite justified by the circumstances of the case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—To all appearance the best thing that could happen to this boy is that he should be sent to a reformatory. But before we arrive at that result we must take a very strong course, which I am not prepared to take, and that is to hold that a conviction of a boy five years of age who has pled guilty to a charge of theft is a conviction which can be considered by the Judge who tries the case in determining what sentence is to be pronounced.

This boy when he was five, or at the utmost six years old, seems to have been convicted of theft. In my opinion that was an utterly illegal conviction, and if it had been brought before us at the time by suspension it would have been quashed. But in considering what sentence was to be pronounced in this case, the Sheriff, we must assume, took into consideration the fact that there were two previous convictions for theft standing against the boy. Apparently his attention was not drawn to the fact that one of these was obtained when the boy was only five, and I think we must assume that he took that conviction into consideration. I am of opinion that no sentence which followed upon such consideration can be allowed to stand. It may be quite true that if you put that conviction out of view there is still nothing improper in the sentence pronounced, but to put it out of view now, and to consider whether the sentence pronounced is otherwise a proper sentence, would be to make us the judges of what ought to be done in a case where we have neither the power nor the materials necessary. It is absolutely impossible for us to say what the Sheriff would have done had he left this conviction out of account. I am therefore of opinion, though I regret the result, that this conviction must be quashed.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the judgment proposed. We are familiar with cases in which convictions proceeding upon evidence have been set aside in consequence of essential irregularities in procedure. One illustration which occurs to my mind is afforded by a case where a conviction was quashed because the Magistrate had admitted evidence not given upon oath. The admission of such evidence is fatal to a conviction, because it is impossible to say how far the mind of the Judge may have been affected by it. In the present case the prisoner pleaded guilty, and there was accordingly no account of the crime or of the previous history of the prisoner, except what is contained in the complaint and the two extract convictions which accompanied it. These were the materials which the Sheriff had upon which to form his opinion as to what would be a proper measure of punishment. It is here that the difficulty arises, for he had before him, and thought he was bound to take into account, two convictions, when in reality there was only one which he could consider. I look upon the case as precisely similar to one in which the complaint sets out two convictions, and there is produced an extract of one only. In that case if the prisoner pleads to the whole, and the Judge in his sentence deals with the case as one of a person twice previously convicted, there being no evidence of more than one conviction, it is plain that an error is committed. We must assume that the Judge took all the materials before him into account. No. 18.

June 3, 1889.
Grant v. Allan.

It appears to me that in the present case the sentence is affected by an error in essentialibus, the Judge having treated this as the case of an habitual offender, while it was really the case of a boy against whom only one previous conviction was established, and as we cannot review the sentence it follows that the conviction must be quashed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. We can know nothing of the considerations upon which the Sheriff proceeded in giving this sentence except what appears upon the face of the complaint and the two convictions which were before him. We know that one of these at least ought not to have been obtained, and ought not to have been taken into consideration. We cannot estimate to what extent it was taken into consideration. The result is that the sentence cannot be sustained.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Pass the bill; suspend the conviction and sentence and order for detention in the reformatory complained of simpliciter: Ordain the complainer Richard Grant to be instantly set at liberty, and decern."

W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

ROBERT WILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Lanarkshire at Hamilton), Appellant.—D. Robertson, A.-D.

JOHN M'GUIRE AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Law.

No. 19.

June 20, 1889.
Wilson v.
M'Guire.

Rape—Bail—Bail (Scotland) Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. 36).—Observed, per Lord Justice-Clerk, that in a charge of rape bail should only be allowed in very exceptional cases, and not at all where the Lord Advocate objects and states on his responsibility that his investigation of the case does not disclose any facts tending to shew that it should be dealt with as exceptional.

THIS was an appeal by Robert Wilson, Procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Hamilton against a deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Hamilton (Birnie), admitting John M'Guire and Francis O'Brien, who had been charged with the crime of rape, to bail, and fixing the amount thereof at £50. HIGH COURT (GLASGOW).
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Justiciary
Clerk.

Argued for the Procurator-fiscal;—This was a case in which no bail at all should have been granted. The precognitions shewed that the rape was of a most brutal character, the woman upon whom it was alleged to have been committed being a deformed imbecile between thirty and forty years of age, who was only able to utter inarticulate sounds which those alone who knew her well could understand. The amount fixed by the Sheriff-substitute was quite insufficient to secure the attendance of the accused at their trial. It was obvious that if the precognitions disclosed what should turn out to be the facts of the case, and a conviction was obtained, a very severe sentence must follow. The accused, in a case of this class, with the aid of their friends, would do their utmost to raise the amount fixed by the Sheriff-substitute, and then leave the country. The amount of bail then, if granted at all, should be increased.

Argued for the panels;—The question whether bail should be allowed or not had been properly decided by the Sheriff-substitute in granting

No. 19. bail. The procurator-fiscal had no right to assume that the precognitions disclosed the facts which would be proved against the accused. As to the amount of bail, the sum was ample in every respect to secure the attendance of the accused at their trial. In point of fact it was too large, as the prisoners were quite unable to raise the amount and obtain any benefit or assistance in the preparation of their defence.

June 20, 1889.
Wilson v.
M'Guire.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that bail should not be allowed in any case where the public prosecutor charges the prisoner with the crime of rape, unless there be very exceptional circumstances, and certainly not where the Lord Advocate objects to its being granted, and states on his responsibility that his investigation of the case does not disclose any facts tending to shew that it should be dealt with as exceptional. If in any such case there were exceptional circumstances, the Lord Advocate could himself take these into consideration and consent to bail, but I should regret its being established as a precedent in principle that bail is to be allowed in ordinary cases of rape. In this case I am of opinion that the sum of bail fixed by the Sheriff-substitute was quite inadequate. The public prosecutor has, by this appeal from the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute, raised the question not only of the amount of the bail fixed, but whether bail should have been granted in the circumstances at all. He says it should not have been granted, and represents that the case is a very serious one. As there do not seem to me to be any circumstances to justify the Sheriff-substitute in granting bail, I shall reverse his deliverance and refuse bail.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lord Justice-Clerk having considered this appeal, and heard counsel for the parties, recalls the interlocutor appealed against, and refuses bail in this case."

CROWN AGENT—WILLIAM CHALMERS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 20. ALLAN WYLIE, Complainer.—A. J. Young.
JOHN THOM (Procurator-Fiscal for Burgh Court of Linlithgow),
Respondent.—Goudy.

July 4, 1889.
Wylie v.
Thom.

Complaint—Deviation from statutory form—Trafficking without certificate—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 17.—A B was charged under the 17th section of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862,* with trafficking in liquor in L. "without having a certificate, empowering him the said A B to keep premises in L. for the sale of exciseable liquors therein." He was convicted, and in a suspension he averred (and it was admitted) that while he held no certificate for the premises, he was managing them for a person in whose name there was a current certificate, and who had prior to the date of the conviction granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors.

The Court suspended the conviction, holding that as the charge, which was in effect one of trafficking without having obtained a personal certificate, had not been framed in the form prescribed by the 17th section of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, under which it was brought, and which made it an offence to traffic without having obtained a certificate "in that behalf," the complainer had been debarred from pleading his employer's certificate, and had thus been prejudiced.

---

* The Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, provides, by section 17,—“Every person trafficking in any spirits or other exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Act, shall be guilty of an offence.”

No. 20.

July 4, 1889.
Wylie v.

Thom.

HIGH COURT.

Lord Justice-

Clerk.

Lord M'Laren

Lord Kinne

Justiciary

Clerk.

This was a suspension brought by Allan Wylie, Linlithgow, of a conviction obtained against him before the Magistrates of the burgh of Linlithgow for a contravention of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the opinion of Lord M'Laren.
At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This case comes before us under a bill of suspension of a conviction obtained before the Magistrates of the burgh of Linlithgow for a contravention of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.

Under the provisions of the statute the conviction is not subject to review on the merits, but is liable to be set aside in respect of such deviation from the statutory forms as may have prevented substantial justice from being done.

We have no record of the evidence, but we must consider what are the admitted facts of the case for the purpose of seeing whether the complaint is framed in conformity with the statutory enactments so as to raise a question of criminality upon those facts.

In the present case the complaint sets forth that Allan Wylie, hotelkeeper, Linlithgow (the complainer in this Court), did on a certain day, within the premises occupied by him, traffic in spirits and other exciseable liquors (I pass over the statement of the particulars of the sale) "without having a certificate authorising and empowering him, the said Allan Wylie, to keep premises in Linlithgow for the sale of exciseable liquors therein, contrary to the provisions of the seventeenth section" of the said Act.

It is the fact that there was a current certificate applicable to the Palace Hotel at Linlithgow in which the offence is said to have been committed.

The certificate was in the name of William Tod, the landlord of the Palace Hotel, and it was current at the date of the alleged offence. It is not suggested that Tod had done anything to forfeit the benefit of his certificate.

The suspender states that in September 1888 he was entrusted by Tod with the management of the hotel, Tod being then in a delicate state of health, and unable to continue in the personal management of his business.

Whatever may have been the reason for devolving the management of the hotel on Wylie, such devolution could in no way impair the force of the certificate granted to Tod, or render Wylie liable to a prosecution for selling spirits without a licence, because it is not open to question that a licensed victualler who has obtained a certificate in his own name may lawfully carry on his business through a manager.

Thereafter Mr Tod fell into embarrassed circumstances, and after consulting with his creditors granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr James Craig, C.A., with a view to the payment of his debts out of the proceeds of the trust-estate.

The theory of the prosecution is, that that proceeding divested Tod of his estate, and that his licence, and the certificate on which it was obtained, either became the property of Tod's creditors or lapsed altogether.

This is not the view on which Tod himself or his creditors acted. The

No. 20.

July 4, 1889.
Wylie v.
Thom.

creditors apparently were willing that the spirit business should be carried on as formerly under the management of Wylie, and the business was so carried on without objection until notice was given by the authorities of their intention to institute a prosecution unless Wylie should be able to obtain a transfer of the licence into his own name.

If it were necessary to consider whether the prosecutor was well-founded in his view of the effect of the trust-deed, I should most probably differ with him in his view of the law applicable to this point.

A trust-deed granted for the benefit of creditors is not a matter with which the public authorities are concerned. Such deeds do not usually displace the trader from the management of his business.

Indeed the chief reason of preference for a private trust over a sequestration is that it does not involve the sacrifice of a going business, and very often the deed provides for the business being carried on by the truster under supervision.

I am unable to see how the granting of such a deed can have the effect of depriving the licensee of the benefit of his certificate. In this respect the position of the trustee for creditors is not materially different from that of a manager, because he is accountable to the truster, and his powers come to an end when the purposes of the trust are fulfilled.

For reasons which I shall presently state, this point does not directly arise for decision, but it is to be kept in view in considering the form and language of the complaint.

The complaint is founded on the 17th section of the Act of 1862. Now, the offence as declared by that section is, the "trafficking in any spirits or other exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Act."

Comparing the statutory definition of the offence with the description of the offence in this complaint, it is evident that there is a material variation of phraseology, because in the complaint the accused is charged with trafficking in spirits "without having obtained a certificate authorising and empowering him, the said Allan Wylie, to keep premises in Linlithgow aforesaid for the sale of exciseable liquors."

It is not necessarily an objection to a complaint that it does not merely echo the words of the statutory enactment provided the meaning be identical with that of the enactment declaring the nature of the offence.

But in this case the variation is material. Under a complaint in the statutory form it would be open to the accused to put forward the certificate granted to his employer Tod as being "a certificate in that behalf" in terms of the statute. Under the actual complaint the accused could not found on his employer's certificate, because the charge against him is in effect that he trafficked in exciseable liquors without having obtained a personal certificate.

We do not know what were the precise grounds on which the Magistrates of Linlithgow convicted the complainer of an offence, but it is sufficient for the disposal of this case that the Magistrates may have convicted Wylie for the supposed offence of trafficking without having obtained a personal certificate.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the complaint does not set forth an offence in terms of the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1862, and that this is a deviation from the statutory forms which is prejudicial to the accused, and which has prevented substantial justice from being done.

If the Court is of this opinion it follows that the conviction should be No. 20.
quashed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

July 4, 1889.
Wylie v.
Thom.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Pass the bill; suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern."

PARTY—DOUGLAS & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

NEIL FERGUSON, Appellant.—A. S. D. Thomson.
JAMES STEWART CARNOCHAN (Procurator-Fiscal of Burgh Court at Stranraer), Respondent.—Ure.

No. 21.
July 8, 1889.
Ferguson v.
Carnochan.

Breach of the Peace—Cursing and swearing.—Under a complaint for a breach of the peace, it was proved that the accused, in his house, which was situated in a street in a burgh, had, early on Sunday morning, for a considerable period, used loud language, and oaths and imprecations, which had been heard by two constables at a distance of thirty yards from his house.

The Court sustained a conviction, holding that the acts proved amounted to a breach of the peace, as being acts calculated to cause reasonable apprehension to the lieges.

THIS was an appeal by Neil Ferguson, public-house keeper, Stranraer, upon a case stated against a conviction of the offence of breach of the peace obtained before the Burgh Court of Stranraer, upon a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of that Court.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clerk.
Justiciary
Clerk.

The following facts, inter alia, were set forth in the case as proved:—"That shortly before three o'clock on the morning of Sunday, 7th April 1889, a light was seen, and the appellant was heard making a noise and disturbance, and using loud language within his premises in Charlotte Street, Stranraer, same being a licensed public-house, by two constables on duty, who were going past said premises on their rounds on the morning in question.

"The noise continued for some time, but at first was not so great, and the constables, on returning about an hour afterwards, found the noise still continuing, and which they heard in Castle Street, at a part thereof about thirty yards off, and which consisted of cursing and swearing against Lord Stair, and sending him to hell, apparently in a dispute on Home Rule. The constables could not swear that it was the appellant who was cursing and swearing, but they had no doubt that it was his voice, as they knew his voice. There was no other disturbance in said street except at the premises above referred to. The premises are situated in the centre of Charlotte Street, with an hotel opposite, and private dwelling-houses and a shop next thereto.

"The question of law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary is—Whether the appellant, on the facts so proved, is guilty of the crime charged?"

Argued for the appellant;—There was no breach of the peace here. The alleged disturbance consisted simply of loud talking in a private house, and did not cause alarm to any person in the house or outside of it.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the respondent;—A breach of the peace might take place <sup>1</sup> Ritchie v. M'Phee, Oct. 25, 1882, 5 Couper, 147, 10 R. (Just. Cases) 9; Simon v. Reid, March 20, 1879, 4 Couper, 420; Armour v. Macrae, March 9, 1886, 1 White, 58; Buist v. Linton, Nov. 20, 1865, 5 Irvine, 210; Galbraith v. Muirhead, Nov. 17, 1856, 2 Irvine, 520; Banks v. M'Lennan, Nov. 16, 1876, 3 Couper, 359, 4 R. (Just. Cases) 8.

No. 21.

July 8, 1889.
Ferguson v.
Carnochan.

in a private house.<sup>1</sup> The noise was long-continued, and was such as was calculated to cause alarm to the lieges in a populous part of the town. Actual alarm did not require to be proved. In the cases cited by the appellant, the decision turned upon the charge being defective in one or other of these respects. They were not in point.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two points in this case. The first is, whether the offence charged having taken place in the accused's own premises can constitute a breach of the peace. That point is ruled by the case of Matthews and Rodden, which decides, and I think soundly, that a breach of the peace may be committed in a private house.

The second point is, whether the facts disclosed are such that a breach of the peace can be inferred from them. I am of opinion that they are. Breach of the peace consists in such acts as will reasonably produce alarm in the minds of the lieges, not necessarily alarm in the sense of personal fear, but alarm lest if what is going on is allowed to continue it will lead to the breaking up of the social peace. The words "to the alarm of the lieges" in a charge of breach of the peace mean that what is alleged was likely to alarm ordinary people, and if continued might cause serious disturbance to the community. In this case what is found proved is that the appellant was making a noise and disturbance and using loud language within his premises at an early hour upon a Sunday morning. He was heard by two constables. About an hour afterwards the constables being again near the premises heard it still continuing, and from a distance of thirty yards were able to hear specific shouts directed against a particular individual accompanied by imprecations. I am of opinion that if a person at three o'clock on a Sunday morning uses loud language and oaths and imprecations so as to be heard at a considerable distance in the street of a town, he commits a breach of the peace, and therefore that the Magistrates had before them facts sufficient to justify them in finding the accused guilty. The facts in this case are almost identical with those in the case of Matthews and Rodden, with the exception that in that case there was fighting. But as fighting inside of a house can affect persons outside only in so far as it causes noise in the street, I take it that the case of Matthews and Rodden would have been held equally relevant without the allegation of fighting.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question is, whether the facts found to be proved support the conviction, and that involves the consideration of what elements of fact are necessary to constitute the crime of breach of the peace. The clearest case of breach of the peace consists in engaging in hostilities either in the street or in a private ground, for I agree that it makes no difference whether the offence be committed in a public or private place, provided the lieges be alarmed. But breach of the peace is not confined to acts of this description. Breach of the peace means breach of public order and decorum, accompanied always by the qualification that it is to the alarm and annoyance of the public. Articulate noises and cries not calculated to be offensive to anyone have been held not to amount to breach of the peace. On the other hand, where the brawling is of such a kind as to be offensive and alarming, it is not necessary that those who hear it should be alarmed for themselves. It is enough that offensive language should be uttered in a noisy and clamorous manner so as to cause reasonable apprehension in the minds of those who hear it that some mischief may result to the public peace. No. 21.

---

<sup>1</sup> Matthews and Rodden v. Linton, Feb. 27, 1860, 3 Irvine, 570.

I am quite satisfied that the language used here, heard in the public street in Stranraer, with the aggravation that it was used at night, and accompanied by noisy conduct, was calculated to be particularly disturbing, and that facts have been proved sufficient to justify the Magistrates in convicting. July 8, 1889.
Ferguson v. Carnochan.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the determination of the inferior Judges, and decern."

R. BROATCH, L.A.—PETER PEARSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT HOGGAN, Appellant.—Rhind—Baxter.

GEORGE MURE WOOD (Procurator-Fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court at Edinburgh), Respondent.—Gloag—Gillespie.

No. 22.

July 18, 1889.
Hoggan v. Wood.

Public-house—Breach of certificate—Dominoes played for a stake—"Unlawful game"—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 25), Schedule A, No. 2.—The Form of Certificate for Public-houses in Schedule A, No. 2 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, bears that the person licensed shall "not suffer or permit any unlawful games within his premises."

A publican was convicted of the offence of having permitted a number of persons "to play at dominoes for a stake, an unlawful game," within his premises. The Court quashed the conviction, holding that the game of dominoes was not "unlawful" in itself, and did not become so by being played for a money stake.

ROBERT HOGGAN, publican, Jock's Lodge, Midlothian, was charged at the instance of George Mure Wood, Procurator-fiscal, before the Justice of Peace Court of the county of Edinburgh, with having been guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, "in so far as, upon the 8th day of May 1889, or about that time," he "did permit or suffer a number of persons unknown to the prosecutor to play at dominoes for a stake—an unlawful game—within his premises at Jock's Lodge aforesaid, contrary to the terms and conditions of his certificate." High Court.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Rutherford Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

The accused was convicted, and took a case, in which it was, inter alia, set forth that he had permitted certain persons on the date above mentioned to engage in a match or handicap at dominoes within his licensed premises for two bottles of whisky, which were purchased out of the entry-money of the competitors.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether the playing of the game of dominoes for stakes or prizes in the appellant's said licensed premises in the circumstances stated is an unlawful game, and contrary to the terms and conditions of his certificate?”

Argued for the appellant;—By the terms of his certificate, which was in the form of Schedule A, No. 2,* appended to 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35 (which superseded the earlier form of certificate provided by 16 and 17

* The Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), Schedule A, No. 2, "Form of certificate for public-houses," contains the following proviso,—“Provided that the said shall be licensed and empowered . . . on the terms and conditions following—that is to say, that the said do not suffer or permit any unlawful games therein” (i.e., within his licensed premises).

No. 22.
July 18, 1889.
Hoggan v.
Wood.

Vict. c. 67), the publican was prevented from permitting the playing of "an unlawful game." At common law no game was unlawful, and "an unlawful game" must therefore be one made so by statute. There was no statement of what was an unlawful game in the Public-House Acts Amendment Act, nor in the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, nor in any of the licensing statutes. Nor was there any definition of an "unlawful game" in any text-books or writers of authority on Scotch law. In the Act of 1621, c. 14,* however ("anent playing at cards or dice"), "carding and dicing, &c." was prohibited, and though that statute was not yet in desuetude, the game of dominoes was neither the one nor the other, and the facts stated here shewed that it was played merely as a game of skill, and that there was no wagering nor betting on the game. It was contended on the other side that a game played for money's worth was unlawful, and the law of England was invoked in support of this contention. The cases in England, however, did not apply to Scotland. No doubt gambling or keeping a house for that purpose, or permitting it in a licensed house, would be unlawful in Scotland, both at common law<sup>1</sup> and under the Betting Acts, 1874.<sup>2</sup> There was, however, nothing of that sort here. The parties each contributed a small sum, which went to make up the prize for the winner. Such competitions were common all over Scotland, and were perfectly innocent. A game could not become unlawful because of the element of gain to be derived from it in such circumstances as the present.

Argued for the respondent;—In Scotland there were no unlawful games, i.e., unlawful in themselves, for the statutes against golf and football were in desuetude, and the Statute 1621, c. 14, did not, if read aright, forbid any game, but forbade gambling by certain instruments, viz., cards and dice. But some meaning must be given to the phrase "unlawful games" used in the certificate. What was it that would render a game, lawful in itself, unlawful? Playing it for money, for gaming was by the common law of Scotland unlawful, and to keep a house for gaming was by the common law unlawful, the illegality depending upon the illegality of the practices, i.e., the gaming carried on there. The undernoted English cases shewed what it was that constituted gaming. They shewed that, although the game was a game of skill and the stake trifling, yet the offence was committed.<sup>3</sup>

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We heard a very excellent and elaborate argument

* The Act 1621, cap. 14, provides,—“That no man shall play at cards or dyce in any common house, town, hostellerie, or cookes houses, under the penalty of forty pounds money of this realm, to be exacted of the keeper of the said inns or common houses for the first fault, and losse of their liberties for the next. Moreover, that it shall not be lawful to play in any other private man's house but where the master of the family playeth himself. And if it shall happen any man to winne any sums of money at carding or dycing attour the sum of an hundred merks within the space of twenty-four houres . . . the super-plus shall be consigned within twenty-four houres thereafter in the hands of the thesaurer of the kirk . . . to be employed alwayas upon the poor of the paroche where such winning shall happen to fall out,” &c.

<sup>1</sup> Greenhuff and Others, Dec. 19, 1838, 2 Swinton, 236.

<sup>2</sup> 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 15.

<sup>3</sup> The Queen v. Ashton, Nov. 25, 1882, 1 Ellis and Blackburn, 286; Bew v. Harston, July 2, 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. Div. 454; Patten v. Rhymer, May 26, 1860, 29 Law Journal, Mag. Cases, 189; Jenks and Others v. Turpin and Another, June 24, 1884, L. R., 13 Q. B. Div. 535; Dyson v. Mason, Jan. 28, 1889, L. R., 22 Q. B. Div. 351.

upon this case, but in the view I take of it the point is a very simple and a very clear one. No. 22.

It appears that the Scotch Public-House Statutes do not, as the English statutes do, contain any prohibition of "gaming," but only a prohibition of "unlawful games," and accordingly no person can be prosecuted in Scotland under these statutes in respect of any game which he permits upon his premises unless it be a game which is "unlawful" either by statute or at common law. July 18, 1889.
Hoggan v. Wood.

The contention of the respondent, as I understood it, was that any game, if played for a stake, became thereby an unlawful game. I am unable to come to any such conclusion. To play a game for a bet or wager may be "gaming," but I am unable to see, without any statutory enactment to that effect, that a game which is in itself lawful becomes an "unlawful game" because it is played in connection with some wager or stake. We were referred to a number of cases decided under the English statutes, and particularly to a case in which it was held that the playing of the game of "puff and dart" for a stake constituted "gaming." But that case does not settle that the game of "puff and dart" is an unlawful game, it only settled that putting a stake on such a game was "gaming." And the Scottish statute is so expressed that unless it can be shewn that a game is unlawful it cannot be prohibited under that statute, although the playing of it may constitute "gaming."

I wish to add, however, that if a publican permits anything like regular gambling to be carried on within his premises, that is an offence which can be dealt with otherwise.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I am quite satisfied that the game of dominoes is not unlawful. I am not certain that by the law of Scotland there are any unlawful games. All that I will say is that the Public-Houses Act prohibits the playing within public-houses of unlawful games, if there be any.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and quashed the conviction.

MENZIES, BRUCE-LOW, & THOMSON, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

MARIA GRAY, Complainer.—W. G. Millar.

DAVID DEWAR (Procurator-Fiscal of Burgh of Dundee), Respondent.—Salvesen.

No. 23.

July 18, 1889.
Gray v. Dewar.

Application of Summary Jurisdiction Acts—Prosecution in forms prescribed by local Police Act—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), secs. 3 and 6, subsec. (b)—Dundee Police and Improvement Consolidation Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. clxxxv.)—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 17.—The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, sec. 3, enacts,—“The provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, hereinafter called the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, shall apply to all summary proceedings as enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and to all proceedings of the like nature which by any future Act are directed or authorised to be taken summarily, . . . provided that, where there is a general or local Police Act in force, it shall be optional in police prosecutions either to use the forms pre-

No. 23. scribed by such Act or the forms provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts." By sec. 6, subsec. (b), of the same Act it was provided that in proceedings under July 18, 1889. the Summary Jurisdiction Acts where the fine does not exceed £20 the alternative imprisonment shall not exceed two months. Gray v. Dewar.

On a complaint brought in Dundee, under the form prescribed by the Dundee Police and Improvement Consolidation Act, 1882, the accused was charged and convicted of a second offence of shebeening, and sentenced by the magistrate to pay a fine of £15 or to be imprisoned for three months, in terms of sec. 17 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.

The Court suspended the sentence, holding that the above provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 applied to the complaint, and that, therefore, the period of imprisonment adjudged was illegal, in respect that it should not have exceeded two months.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ON 26th June 1889 Maria Gray, Todburn Lane, Dundee, was charged at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Dundee with a complaint in the form of the Dundee Police and Improvement Consolidation Act, 1882, in so far as "she had trafficked in whisky, or other exciseable liquor, in her house without having obtained a certificate in that behalf, contrary to the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, particularly section 17 thereof."* She was convicted and, as it was a second offence, she was adjudged to forfeit and pay the sum of £15 of penalty, and in default of immediate payment thereof to be committed to prison for the period of three calendar months.

She brought this bill of suspension, and argued;—The 3d section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 made the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts applicable to this case, and its application was not restricted by the provision in the section, that in any general or local Police Act in force it should be optional in police prosecutions to use the forms contained in that Act.† That being so, the sentence here was con-

* The Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 17, enacts,—“Every person trafficking in any spirits or other exciseable liquors in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of this Act shall be guilty of an offence, and on being convicted thereof shall, for each offence, forfeit and pay the full penalties provided in the 30th section of the said first recited Act (the Act 9 George IV. cap. 58) . . . and in default of immediate payment thereof shall be imprisoned for the entire periods respectively prescribed by the said 30th section of the said first recited Act.”

The Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 30, enacts that “For the second offence the offender shall forfeit the sum of £15, with the expenses of conviction, to be ascertained on conviction; and in case such penalty and expenses shall not be paid within the space of four days next after such second conviction shall have taken place, then the offender shall suffer imprisonment, upon his own charge and expenses, for a period of three calendar months.”

† The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 3, enacts,—“The provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, hereinafter called the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, shall apply to all summary proceedings as enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and to all proceedings of the like nature which by any future Act are directed or authorised to be taken summarily or under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, . . . provided . . . that where there is a general or local Police Act in force it shall be optional in police prosecutions either to use the forms prescribed by such Act or the forms provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.”

The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 3, enacts,—“The provisions of this Act may be applied to . . . (2) All proceedings to be taken before any Sheriff, Justices, or Justice, or Magistrate in trary to the provisions of the 6th section of the Act, which provided that where the amount adjudged to be paid exceeded £5, and not £20, the period of imprisonment should only be two months.* The matter was foreclosed by authority.<sup>1</sup> It was impossible for the Court to reduce the sentence without entering upon the merits of the case, as the amount of sentence was discretionary in the Judge in the Court below within certain limits.

Argued for the respondent;—This prosecution was brought under the private Dundee Act of 1882, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts at all. The provision in section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 excluded the application of those Acts. The sentence was in conformity with the provisions of section 17 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and should be sustained. In any event, the sentence might be limited to two months in the discretion of the Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears from the preamble of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881, which sets forth that in England power has been given to magistrates to mitigate penalties, that one of the objects which the Act was passed to effect was to confer upon the Courts of summary jurisdiction the power to mitigate and modify punishments in summary proceedings.

The 3d section of the Act provides that “the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, hereinafter called the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, shall apply to all summary proceedings as enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and to all proceedings of the like nature which by any future Act are directed or authorised to be taken summarily.” The section then goes on to provide that certain specified classes of cases shall fall within its provisions, and contains the proviso that “where there is a general or local Police Act in force, it shall be optional in police prosecutions either to use the forms prescribed by such Act or the forms provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.” It is said that if a prosecutor adopts the forms of a general or local Police Act he thereby renders nugatory, and is entitled to render nugatory, the provisions in favour of accused persons to be found in the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. That is a result at which we could not arrive without the very clearest warrant in the words of the statute. I find no such warrant. I do not think that because the prosecutor is permitted to use the forms prescribed by other Acts, it is therefore to be implied that the use of these forms shall take away from persons brought before Courts of summary jurisdiction privileges given to them by the Act. It would be anomalous and extraordinary if it lay with the prosecutor, by his choice of one particular form of procedure as distinguished from another, to settle what power the magistrate shall have in the matter of punishment.

Scotland for the prosecution of any person who has committed, or is charged with having committed, any offence or act for which, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, he is liable, upon summary conviction before any Sheriff, Magistrate, Justices, or Justice, to be imprisoned or fined, or otherwise punished.”

* Section 6 of the Act 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33, enacts,—“In all proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts . . . (b) where a warrant of imprisonment is granted, whether in default of payment of a penalty, or . . . when the amount adjudged to be paid . . . exceeds £5 but does not exceed £20, the period of imprisonment shall not exceed two months.”

<sup>1</sup> Linton v. Wilson or Sherry, June 4, 1887, 1 White, 410, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 46; Nicol v. McNeill, July 13, 1887, 1 White, 416, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 47.

No. 23.

July 18, 1889.
Gray v. Dewar.

No. 23. If it be the case then that the proceedings, notwithstanding the form which is adopted, are under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, sec. 6 of the Act of 1881 applies, and that section, taken along with sec. 3, provides that both in the case of past and future Acts of Parliament which contain provisions for imprisonment in default of payment of a penalty, the period of imprisonment shall have a certain specified relation to the amount of the penalty.

July 18, 1889.
Gray v. Dewar.

But I do not think that this question is open. I think the case of Linton v. Sherry has decided it. In that case a similar prosecution to this was brought under the forms of a Police Act before a Sheriff-substitute, and the Sheriff-substitute, acting upon his interpretation of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, modified the penalty which the Police Act made imperative. The prosecutor appealed, and maintained that the prosecution having been brought under the forms of the Police Act, and not of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the Sheriff-substitute had no power to modify the penalty. The Court unanimously refused the appeal without calling on counsel for the respondent, and held that the Sheriff-substitute had power to modify the penalty. I think that decision is expressly in point. For the reasons already stated, my opinion coincides with the result at which the Court arrived in that case. I therefore move your Lordships to suspend the sentence.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is easy to see without going beyond the words of the statute itself that the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 was enacted as part of a general scheme of policy which the Legislature was then engaged in carrying out. The preamble refers to the provisions of the relative English statute, and throughout the clauses of the Act of 1881 two general purposes can be read, the establishing uniformity of procedure in the inferior Courts, and the establishing of a system of sentences in which the period of imprisonment should bear some definite relation to the amount of the unpaid penalty. But for the clause which refers in terms to police prosecutions, I apprehend there could be no doubt that this statute is of universal application to summary prosecutions. I think that so much was decided in terms in the case of Nicol, although there the speciality as to the meaning of the exception with regard to police prosecutions did not arise. That is the exception upon which the respondent founds. The question is, whether the clause gives an option to use what are colloquially called the "forms" of the local Acts—I mean those parts of the schedules of the local Acts which prescribe the formulae of complaints, interlocutors, and sentences—or whether the expression the "forms" of the local Acts includes all that relates to the declaration of the offence and its punishment, as well as matters incidental to the prosecution. This is a pure question of construction, and I think that whether we look at the meaning of the language or to the probabilities of the case, we must arrive at a conclusion favourable to the view maintained by the complainer. Looking to the language of the section, if it had been intended to except police prosecutions in general from those provisions of the Act which relate to sentences and the mode of their enforcement, it would have been very easy to do that by appropriate words; but then the proviso would not have been that it should be optional to use the "forms" of these Acts, but that it should be optional to use the "powers" of these Acts or to proceed "under" these Acts. I cannot hold that the use of the word "form" here is unintentional, and I see no reason for giving it a larger construction than the extent naturally suggests. Then as to the probabilities of the case, it seems to me that if it had been intended to treat police prosecutions exceptionally, not only as to forms, but also as to substance, it would have been necessary to deal in some way with the subject of those prosecutions in those provisions relating to punishment which are the chief feature of the Act. And while it is conceivable that the Legislature might have meant to legalise a different scale of punishment in the case of Police Courts from that existing in Sheriff and other Courts, it is in the highest degree improbable that the difference would take the shape of empowering police magistrates to impose heavier sentences than the Sheriffs could impose. The absence of any separate provisions applicable to police cases in the clause which regulates the duration of sentences strongly confirms me in the opinion that it was not intended that in the matter of sentences there should be any difference between the powers of police magistrates under local Acts and the powers that were to be exercised by a proper Court of summary jurisdiction.

I agree that this point is in substance and almost in terms decided by the case of Sherry.

I am also of opinion that we must suspend the sentence simpliciter, because it is impossible for us to know what lesser sentence the Magistrate might have given if he had known that he had the power to mitigate the penalty and the period of imprisonment.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think it important to follow decisions, so that the law should be fixed and known. I think that the case of Sherry is conclusive of the case which we have heard, and that we must follow that decision. It follows that the sentence must be suspended. On the question whether we can modify the punishment, I quite concur with your Lordships.

THE COURT quashed the conviction, and suspended the sentence.

ROBERT D. KER, W.S.—PARTY—Agents.

July 18, 1889.
Gray v. Dewar.

1841

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1888-89.

WINTER SESSION.

REV. CHARLES W. EDMONSTONE AND ANOTHER (Lumsden's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Murray—C. J. Guthrie.
SIR WILLIAM S. SETON, BART., AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—
Sir Charles Pearson—Low.

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1888.
Edmonstone
v. Seton.

Right in Security—Real Burden—Obligation ad factum præstandum—Obligation to purchase and transfer consols.—Held that a bond and disposition in security binding the grantor to purchase and to transfer to the grantee the capital stock or sum of £5000 3 per cent Consolidated Bank Annuities, and until such purchase and transfer to pay to the grantee the interest payable on that amount of stock, was effectual to make these obligations real burdens on the lands conveyed.

By two bonds and dispositions in security, dated in 1849 and 1858 respectively, the Rev. Henry Thomas Lumsden, heritable proprietor of the lands of Guisway or Cushnie in Aberdeenshire, acknowledged to have borrowed, from the trustees of a marriage-settlement between him and his wife in the English form, two sums of £5000 and £3500 respectively 3 per cent Consolidated Bank Annuities then standing in their names as trustees in the books of the Bank of England, which had accordingly been transferred to his name in the books of the bank. After narrating the loan in question, the first of the two deeds proceeded,—“Therefore I do hereby bind and oblige myself, and my heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, at any time during my life or after my death, when required in manner after provided for by the said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c. [the trustees] or the survivors or survivor of them, or their or his assigns, or the executors or administrators of such survivor . . . to purchase and transfer, or procure to be transferred in the books of the said Governor and Company of the Bank of England, unto and into the names or name of the said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c. . . or the survivors or survivor of them, or their or his assigns, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, the capital stock or sum of £5000 three pounds per centum Consolidated Bank Annuities, and that upon or within the day or time to be specified in the notice to be given to or left for me in manner after mentioned: As also I do hereby bind and oblige myself and my foresaids from time to time, and at all times hereafter, until the said sum of £5000 three pounds per centum Consolidated Bank Annuities shall be actually so purchased and transferred into the names or name of the said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c. . . or the survivors or survivor of them, or their or his assigns, or the executors or administrators of such survivor as aforesaid, to well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, unto the

1st DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1888.
Edmonstone
v. Seton.

said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c., or the survivors or survivor of them, or their or his foresaids, such sum and sums of money as shall be equal to the interest and dividends which from time to time, until such purchase and transfer as aforesaid shall be actually made, would have accrued due and become payable on or in respect of the said capital stock transferred into my name as aforesaid, if the same had not been so transferred, but had been left standing in the names of the said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c. . . . in the said books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and on the respective days and times at which the same interest or dividends would respectively have become due and payable."

In security of these obligations the granter of the deed disposed of his estate of Cushnie to the trustees. There was this further provision in the deed:—"Provided always, as it is also hereby expressly provided and declared, that if I, or my heirs, executors, or administrators, shall make default in making the transfer of the said capital stock or payment of interest or dividends aforesaid, or any of them, or any part or parts thereof, respectively upon or within the respective days or times hereinbefore mentioned for transfer or payment thereof respectively, or which shall be specified in any notice given to or by me under or by virtue of the conditions hereinbefore contained, then, and in any of such cases, it shall be lawful for the said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c., or the survivor or survivors of them, or his or their foresaids, to recover payment of such a sum as will at the time be sufficient to purchase the foresaid capital stock or sum of £5000 three pounds per centum Consolidated Bank Annuities, and as will replace the whole dividends or interests which may then be due thereon, and all costs, charges, damages, and expenses, which they, the said Sir Archibald Edmonstone, &c., or the survivors or survivor of them, or their or his foresaids, shall or may incur, sustain, or be put unto by reason or on account of default being made in making the transfer and payments aforesaid, or any of them, or any part or parts thereof."

The second bond and disposition in security, dated in 1858, dealing with the £3500 loan, was in similar terms.

Mr Lumsden died on 19th November 1867 leaving a widow but no children. Up to the time of his death he had regularly paid and accounted for the interest or dividends on the stocks above mentioned, but they had not been re-transferred to the trustees. By his will, dated 25th February 1867, he directed that the trust-funds, which included the stocks, should, subject to his wife's liferent, be divided among the several legatees therein mentioned. The estate of Cushnie he had by disposition and settlement disposed, on 28th October 1867, to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, in liferent for her liferent use allanarly, and to a series of heirs in fee. Mrs Lumsden died in 1886.

This action was raised in July 1887 by the Rev. C. W. Edmonstone and William Trotter, the surviving trustees under the marriage-settlement of the spouses, and William Trotter, the executor under Mr Lumsden's will, against Sir William S. Seton and others, the heirs of entail called in the destination of the lands of Cushnie, to have it found and declared that by the two bonds and dispositions before mentioned valid securities had been created over the estate of Cushnie for the obligation to purchase and re-transfer into the names of the trustees the stocks which had been borrowed, or the two sums of £5000 and £3500, or a sum equal to the value of the stocks, either at the date of the bonds or of citation, or for an annual payment of the sums of interest due thereon until the stocks should be re-transferred. There were other alternative conclusions, which need not be specified.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said two bonds are not effectual incumbrances upon the said estate, in respect that they are truly obligations ad factum præstandum, or otherwise are obligations for the payment of an indefinite and unascertained amount. (3) The obligation undertaken by the granter of the said bonds being of a personal nature, is primarily enforceable against his moveable estate, and the holders of his moveable estate have no right of relief against his heritable estate.

On 31st January 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the bonds and dispositions in security libelled in the summons create good and effectual securities over the lands thereby disposed, and that the heirs or gratuitous disponees of Henry Thomas Lumsden take the said lands under burden of the said securities without relief against his executors," &c.*

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1888.
Edmonstone
v. Seton.

* "OPINION.—The first question is, whether the two bonds and dispositions in security libelled in the summons are good charges upon the lands thereby disposed. The late Mr Lumsden had borrowed from his marriage-contract trustees two sums of £5000 and £3500 3 per cent Consolidated Annuities standing in their names in the books of the Bank of England. These sums were accordingly transferred from their names to his, and by the bonds in question he binds himself, and his heirs, executors, and representatives, when required, in a certain manner, or if not required during his life, then within six months after his death, to purchase and transfer, or procure to be transferred to the trustees, the like sums of £5000 and £3500 3 per cent consols, and in the meantime to pay to them the amount of the interest which would have become due and payable to them upon the transferred stock if it had been left standing in their names. In security of these obligations he disposes his lands of Cushnie or Guisway and others; and in case the granter or his heirs or executors shall make default in transferring the stock or in paying interest, each of the bonds contains a provision that in that case it shall be lawful for the trustees to recover payment of such a sum as will at the time be sufficient to purchase the stock and replace the interest which may be due.

"The defenders maintain that these are not effectual securities upon the lands, because the obligations secured are ad factum præstandum, or otherwise are obligations for payment of an indefinite and unascertained amount. The primary obligation to purchase and transfer a certain amount of Government stock is in form an obligation ad factum præstandum. But it results in the payment of money; and it does not appear to be very material to the question whether it is in form an obligation to pay or an obligation to transfer.

"There can be no doubt that an obligation ad factum præstandum may be made a real burden on land, and the only question in either view is, whether it is sufficiently definite to satisfy the rule of law that no indefinite or unknown burden can be created on land.

"On this question I am of opinion that the defenders' plea is not well founded. An obligation to assign a definite proportion of the National Debt is not, in my judgment, an indefinite obligation in the sense of the rule upon which they rely. I do not think that the cases cited of Stein's Creditors and Tod v. Dunlop are apposite. But even if it were to be held that an obligation to transfer the specified amount of Government stock when required to do so is too indefinite to be well secured on land, the same objection would not apply to the obligation which is immediately prestable to pay annuities equal to the interests payable in respect of such stock. It is said that the undertaking to pay interest is merely accessory, and that the validity of the security must depend upon the character of the principal obligation alone. But the amount of the interest is in no way affected by the considerations which are said to make the principal obligation uncertain. It is not the interest upon an indefinite or variable capital sum that is to be paid, but a sum equal to the interest which the Government pays upon £5000 or £3500 of 3 per cent Consolidated Annuities. In other words, it is an annuity equal to three per cent upon each of these specified sums. The obligation to pay such annuities is perfectly definite, and there appears to be no reason why it should not be made a burden upon land."

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1888.
Edmonstone
v. Seton.

The defenders reclaimed.

Argued for them ;—(1) The obligation to purchase and transfer the stocks which it was sought to enforce against the defenders was an obligation to pay an indefinite sum of money, and being so could not be effectually made a real burden upon land.<sup>1</sup> Assuming that it was an obligation ad factum præstandum, it was not such an obligation as was inter naturalia of the right of possession, and so could not be the subject of a real burden. (2) The obligation to pay interest was accessory to the obligation to pay the capital sums, and could not be validly imposed as a real burden any more than the other. It was not an obligation of a continuing nature, but only lasted so long as the capital remained unpaid.

The respondents were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has not disposed of the whole conclusions of the summons, but the finding in his interlocutor is that “the bonds and dispositions in security libelled in the summons create good and effectual securities over the lands thereby disposed, and that the heirs or gratuitous disponees of Henry Thomas Lumsden take the said lands under burden of the said securities without relief against his executors.” The view I take of the case depends upon a very simple principle. There are two obligations which were undertaken by the late Mr Lumsden, both of which are very distinct from one another, the one being an obligation ad factum præstandum, and the other to make a money payment of interest. The obligation ad factum præstandum is in these words, “to purchase and transfer, or procure to be transferred in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England . . . the capital stock or sum of £5000 3 per cent Consolidated Bank Annuities, and that upon or within the day or time to be specified in the notice to be given to or left for me in manner after mentioned.” That is certainly not an obligation to pay money ; no doubt it is an obligation, the performance of which may involve an expenditure of money, but that does not make it the less an obligation ad factum præstandum. The debtor in such an obligation may not be able to fulfil it without a money payment, but what he has to do in discharging the obligation is to perform certain acts. He has in the present case to put the creditor in the obligation in possession as owner or transferee of certain stock. That may cost him more or less according to the price of the stock at the time, but the obligation upon him is to place the trustees in the position in which they were before the bonds and dispositions were granted, that is, to make them owners qua transferees of £5000 and £3500 three per cent Consolidated Annuities.

Another obligation which was laid upon him at the same time was to pay interest at the rate of three per cent upon these two sums. That is a money obligation of an ascertained amount, and accordingly the objection, that that obligation which it was sought to secure is too indefinite, falls to the ground.

The first obligation is to perform an act which can only be done in one way, and the other is to pay a definite and stated sum of interest. I think the bonds are not subject to the objections which have been urged.

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Comms., i. (7th ed.) 730 ; Stein's Creditors v. Newnham, Everet, & Co., 1789, M. 1158, affd. H. of L. Feb. 25, 1791, 3 Pat. Appa. 345 ; Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Begg, Dec. 20, 1883, 11 R. 352 ; Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Dec. 20, 1834, 13 S. 226, H. of L. May 23, 1837, 2 S. & M'L's Appa. 609, and Aug. 3, 1840, 1 Robinson's Appa. 296 ; Tod v. Dunlop, Dec. 13, 1838, 1 D. 231 ; M'Donald & Lawson v. Place, Feb. 24, 1821, Hume's Decna. 544.

No. 1.

Oct. 16, 1888.
Edmonstone
v. Seton.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—If it could have been successfully maintained that an obligation ad factum præstandum cannot be made a real burden, there would have been room for argument in support of the reclaiming note, but, as the Lord Ordinary says, there is no doubt that such an obligation can be constituted a real burden, and that proposition has not been disputed. An obligation by one person to make or to procure the transference of certain specified stock into the name of another is an obligation ad factum præstandum, and the circumstance that money (the amount of which may be more or less according to circumstances) may have to be paid or laid out in order to the performance of the obligation does not affect the character of the obligation or make it in any way indefinite.

But further, the undertaking to pay interest is practically an obligation to pay three per cent upon a certain sum; and there is nothing of an indefinite character in that. The argument appears to me to fail upon both points.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—Agents.

ANDREW HENDERSON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Rhind.

No. 2.

MRS I. M. BURD OR HENDERSON, Defender (Respondent).—Salvesen.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Henderson v.
Henderson.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Expiry of reclaiming days in vacation—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 20.—The 20th section of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, provides that a Lord Ordinary's judgment in a petition for recall of arrestments "shall be subject to the review of the Inner-House by a reclaiming note duly lodged within ten days from the date thereof."

In cases where the time for reclaiming expires on a day when the Clerk's office is not open, the provision of the statute is sufficiently complied with if the reclaiming note is lodged on the first day thereafter on which it is open.

A PETITION was presented by Mrs I. M. Burd or Henderson for recall of arrestments used by her husband Andrew Henderson on the dependence of an action of count, reckoning, and payment at his instance against her. 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

On 18th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) recalled the arrestments on consignment of £120.

Henderson reclaimed against that interlocutor, but the reclaiming note was not lodged till Tuesday, 31st July, instead of Saturday, 28th July, the last of the reclaiming days, in consequence of the Clerk's office being open only on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday during vacation.

In the Single Bills, on 16th October following, the respondent objected to the competency of the reclaiming note on the ground that it had not been lodged within the ten days allowed for lodging a reclaiming note by the 20th section of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838.*

---

* The Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 20, provides that "it shall be competent to the Lord Ordinary in the Court of Session before whom any summons containing warrant of arrestment shall be enrolled as Judge therein, or before whom any action on the dependence whereof letters of arrestment have been

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Henderson v.
Henderson.

Argued for the respondent;—This was a ten days' interlocutor, and a reclaiming note fell to be lodged within ten days from the date of the interlocutor, whether the reclaiming days expired during session or in vacation. The case of Lockhart<sup>1</sup> was a direct authority, and the judgment in it had been approved in the subsequent case of Joel.<sup>2</sup> If the Clerk's office in the Register House was shut on the day on which the reclaiming days expired, the reclaiming note ought to have been taken to the Clerk's private residence.

Argued for the claimer;—According to the ordinary rule the reclaiming note would have been in time if lodged upon the first box-day. The Clerk's office where the reclaiming note fell to be lodged was not open on Saturday, 28th July—the tenth day after the date of the interlocutor—nor was it open till Tuesday the 31st, on which day it was lodged. That was sufficient.<sup>3</sup> The 94th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, had a bearing on the case. It provided that if the interlocutor had been signed in vacation, it could have been reclaimed against upon the next box-day in vacation. It was only reasonable that the same rule should apply to interlocutors signed during session—where the reclaiming days did not expire till vacation. In any view, Lockhart's case was distinguishable from the present, because there the reclaiming note was not lodged till the box-day.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor which is reclaimed against in this case was pronounced on 18th July last, and according to the provisions of the Personal Diligence Act the reclaiming note ought to have been lodged within ten days afterwards. These ten days expired on the 28th July, which was a Saturday, and the provision of the Act requiring the reclaiming note to be lodged within ten days from the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against appears to have been incapable of fulfilment, because the Clerk's office at which the reclaiming note falls to be lodged is not open on Saturdays, and there was no one to receive it. It seems to me that when a limited time is allowed by the Legislature for the exercise of a privilege of this kind, that must always be subject to the implied condition that it is possible to perform the act in question within the specified time. Here that was impossible. If we were to hold that in consequence of the impossibility of implementing the statutory obligation to lodge the reclaiming note within the specified period there was an obligation to lodge it within a shorter time, we should be construing the statute in a manner quite unprecedented. In this case it would limit the reclaiming days to eight instead of to ten, which are given by the statute. I therefore think that this objection must be repelled.

In repelling the objection I do not think we are doing anything to interfere with the judgment in the case of Lockhart, which has been cited. I should be executed has been or shall be enrolled as Judge therein, and to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in time of vacation, on the application of the debtor or defender by petition duly intimated to the creditor or pursuer, to which answers may be ordered, to recall or to restrict such arrestment, on caution or without caution, . . . provided that his judgment shall be subject to the review of the Inner-House by a reclaiming note duly lodged within ten days from the date thereof."

---

<sup>1</sup> Lockhart v. Cumming, May 27, 1851, 13 D. 996, 23 Scot. Jur. 459.

<sup>2</sup> Joel v. Gill, Jan. 11, 1860, 22 D. 357, 32 Scot. Jur. 159.

<sup>3</sup> Craig v. Jex Blake, March 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 715, 43 Scot. Jur. 363; Russell v. Russell, Nov. 12, 1874, 2 R. 82.

sorry to do so, because that judgment is supported not only by the authority of the Judges who decided the point, but also by the authority of the Judges of the other Division who decided the subsequent case of Joel v. Gill, and who took occasion in doing so to draw a distinction between it and Lockhart's case, and stated that they left the judgment in Lockhart's case undisturbed.

No. 2.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Henderson v.
Henderson.

LORD MURE.—I have always understood that where a reclaiming note is appointed to be lodged within a specified time, and the day on which that time expires is one on which the offices are not open, the note will be in time if it is lodged, as was the case here, at the first possible opportunity after the expiry of the days within which it is provided that this shall be done. It seems to me, therefore, that there was here a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the statute. If we were to decide otherwise, we should be shortening the time permitted by the statute.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

THE objection was repelled, and the case was sent to the Summar Roll.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—Agents.

DAVID SCOTT COWANS AND OTHERS (Daniel Cowan's Trustees),— Pursuers and Real Raisers.

No. 3.

HENRY COWAN, Claimant (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Cowan's Trustees v. Cowan.

MES MARGARET COWAN OR HODGE AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents).—Murray—Salvesen.

Process—Multiplepointing—Claimants benefiting by the litigation of one of their number—Expenses.—In a multiplepointing where only one of several next of kin, who were all called and had the same interest in the fund in medio, put in a claim and succeeded in making it good against the heir-at-law, the others who appeared afterwards were ordained to pay their shares of the whole expenses incurred by him in the litigation, not excluding the expenses of a part of it in which he had been unsuccessful.

(VIDE ante, March 19, 1887, 14 R. 670.)

The trustees of the late Daniel Cowan brought a multiplepointing for the purpose of settling certain disputes which had arisen between the heir-at-law and the next of kin in regard to the succession to the trust-estate. The heir-at-law and the next of kin of whom there were four were called as defenders. Henry Cowan was the only one of the next of kin who lodged a claim at this stage, and the question whether the estate fell to be dealt with as heritable or moveable was subsequently litigated between James Cowan, the heir-at-law, and him, with the result that the claim for the former was repelled by the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) on 9th November 1886. The heir-at-law reclaimed, and on 19th March 1887 the First Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found, inter alia, "that the undisposed of residue falls to be divided between the competitors, the heir and executors of the testator," in certain proportions, and the reclamer was found entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and it was remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause—(March 19, 1887, ante, vol. 14, 670.)

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
B.

On 20th May following, the Lord Ordinary decerned against Henry Cowan for £42, 2s. 6d., the amount of expenses found due by him as taxed,

No. 3. reserving to him the right to recover from the other next of kin their proportion of that sum.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Cowan's Trustees v. Cowan.

A claim was thereafter lodged for Mrs Margaret Cowan or Hodge and the two other next of kin, who claimed each to be preferred to one-fourth of the moveable estate, and on 27th January 1888 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Ranks and prefers the claimant James Cowan to the sum of £45, 17s. 1d., with interest corresponding thereto since the date of consignment, being his share of the fund in medio, in terms of the interlocutor pronounced by the First Division on the 19th March 1887: Finds the claimant Henry Cowan entitled to payment out of the fund in medio of the sum of £46, 12s., being three-fourths of the expenses in which he was found liable by the interlocutor of 20th May 1887, and three-fourths of the estimated expense incurred by him under the reclaiming note, No. 15 of process: Further, ranks and prefers the claimants Henry Cowan, Mrs Margaret Cowan or Hodge, Mrs Catherine Cowan or Waddell, and David Scott Cowans, each to the extent of one-fourth of the balance of the fund in medio."

Henry Cowan reclaimed, and argued;—The other next of kin, who were now to benefit by his having come forward and prevented the heir-at-law from carrying away the whole estate, must bear an equal share with him of the expenses of vindicating the fund.<sup>1</sup> That applied both to the Outer and to the Inner House expenses, although it was true that he had not succeeded in holding the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in its entirety in the Inner-House. He was respondent there, and it could not be said that his contentions were of a reckless nature. The whole expenses ought to be deducted from the fund in medio before division, or three-fourths of them ought to be paid to Henry by the other next of kin.

The respondents, who were Mrs Margaret Cowan or Hodge and the other next of kin, argued;—The reason why they had held back at first was that they were on terms for an amicable settlement of the case, in which Henry Cowan had refused to join them. They could not in any case be called upon to contribute to the expenses of that part of the action in which Henry had been unsuccessful. None of the authorities went that length.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the competition was between the heir and one of the four next of kin of the testator. The fund in medio consisted of heritage, but the Lord Ordinary, on 9th November 1886, found that the property forming the fund in medio was "to be regarded and dealt with as moveable succession." In a reclaiming note against that interlocutor we modified that judgment, and found that the heir was entitled to a certain portion of the fund in medio. The question between the heir and the executor having thus been determined, the three next of kin who had not appeared before put in a claim, in which they asked to be allowed to participate in the fund which had been recovered by the one executor, and the question is on what terms they ought to be permitted to participate in this fund.

The principle upon which questions of this kind fall to be decided is well settled. Those persons who are interested in an estate, but who do not come into Court, but leave the question to be fought out by one of their number who is more valiant than they, must, when they claim to participate in the fund which has been recovered by these means, bear a share of the expenses which have been incurred by him in vindicating and getting possession of the fund. That is a very obvious principle of equity, and in ordinary cases I think the way in which it is to be applied can be easily determined. In the present case the Lord Ordinary has found that Henry Cowan, the successful litigant who has come forward and fought the case for the next of kin, is entitled to payment out of the fund in medio of "three-fourths of the expenses in which he was found liable by the interlocutor of 20th May 1887, and three-fourths of the estimated expense incurred by him under the reclaiming note." I do not think that that is consistent with the principle to which I have referred. In order to give effect to the principle, we must do one of two things. Either we must order that three-fourths of the expenses must be paid over into the pockets of the successful litigant, or the entire amount of the expenses must be deducted before division of the fund in medio. Either of these courses is consistent with the principle in question. But the course which has been followed by the Lord Ordinary is inconsistent with it, because he appoints only three-fourths of the expenses in which Henry Cowan was found liable to be deducted from the fund in medio. He does not allow the other one-fourth to be also deducted.

<sup>1</sup> Morgan v. Morris, March 11, 1856, 18 D. 797, 28 Scot. Jur. 346; Binnie's Trustees v. Henry's Trustees, July 3, 1883, 10 R. 1075; Jaffé v. Carruthers, March 3, 1860, 22 D. 936, 32 Scot. Jur. 395.

I do not think it matters in which of the two ways the correction is made. The only point which was raised as constituting a specialty was that in the reclaiming note which was presented against Lord Trayner's interlocutor of 9th November 1886 Henry Cowan was to a certain extent unsuccessful, and that a portion of the fund in medio which the Lord Ordinary had held fell to him was by our judgment given to the heir. It is therefore said that the expenses incurred by him in supporting the reclaiming note ought to be borne by himself. I am not prepared to assent to that proposition. I can conceive a case of nimious and oppressive litigation where the litigant could not expect to be reimbursed for the expense he had incurred. But this is not a case of that kind. The true view in estimating the share of the expenses to be borne by the three parties who have a similar interest with Henry Cowan in the result of the case but did not appear to support it is, that when they seek to share in the fruits of his success they are bound to bear a share of the expense of all the mishaps which were incidental to the litigation.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—There is no doubt that if Henry Cowan had not appeared in the early stages of this case the whole fund in medio would have been swept away by the heir-at-law. The executors, who did not then come forward, are now taking the benefit of Henry Cowan's interference; and I am of opinion that whatever legitimate expenses were incurred by him in vindicating their and his own position must be paid equally by all of those who took benefit by what he did. I have reason to know that this was what was intended by the Lord Ordinary, although the form of his Lordship's interlocutor has not carried this out. What ought to have been done in order to produce this result was to have deducted from the fund in medio the whole of the expenses incurred in vindicating the fund.

The only specialty in the case is that alluded to by your Lordship. As Henry Cowan was not entirely successful in maintaining the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor when it came here upon a reclaiming note, that seems to shew that he was wrong in litigating as he did; and no doubt if his contention had been

No. 3.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Cowan's Trustees v. Cowan.

No. 3. recklessly improper or unreasonable, I think we should have held that he had no claim to be recouped. But that has not been made out, and I am therefore of opinion that those who benefited by the position which he took up must bear their share of the expenses which were incurred,—even although on certain incidental points he was not successful.

Oct. 17, 1888.
Cowan's Trustees v. Cowan.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it deals with the fund in medio falling to the next of kin: Find that the whole expenses incurred by said reclamer in the competition with James Cowan, the heir-at-law, including expenses for which the said reclamer was found liable to said heir-at-law, fall to be paid to the reclamer out of the fund in medio: Find the reclamer entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against, and of consent rank and prefer the said Henry Cowan to the sum of £143 being his share of the fund in medio, and the amount of the expenses to which he has been found entitled under the first and second findings of this interlocutor, as the same have been adjusted by the counsel for the parties: Further of consent, rank, and prefer the claimants Mrs Margaret Cowan or Hodge, Mrs Catherine Cowan or Waddell, and David Scott Cowans each to the extent of one-third of the balance of the fund in medio," &c.

REID & GUILD, W.S.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 4. HENRY TOD (Sutherland's Trustee), Pursuer (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie —MacWatt.

Oct. 19, 1888.
Sutherland's Trustee v. Miller's Trustee.

ALEXANDER GEDDES (Miller's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—Strachan—M'Lennan.

Lease—Tacit Relocation.—An agricultural tenant whose lease was to expire at Whitsunday 1885 made a verbal arrangement with his landlord as to a new lease at a reduced rent. The landlord, on 1st December 1884, delivered to him an open letter to the factor stating the terms of the new lease, and desiring the factor to prepare a formal lease. Owing to delay on the part of the factor, and to the insolvency of the landlord, who was obliged to execute a trust-deed for behoof of creditors, the formal lease was never executed. The tenant remained in possession of the holding till 1887. In an action by the landlord's trustee for the rent under the old lease on the ground that it had been renewed by tacit relocation, held that the tenant's possession was to be referred not to tacit relocation, but to the new arrangement.

Lease—Constitution—Rei interventus.—Question, whether a tenant's abstaining from giving the statutory notice of his intention to terminate a lease in consequence of an informal agreement with his landlord for a new lease at a reduced rent could be held to be sufficient rei interventus to validate the agreement.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Caithness.
I.

HENRY TOD, W.S., sole trustee under a trust for creditors granted in March 1885 by George Sutherland of Forse, Caithness-shire, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Caithness in March 1887 against John Miller, farmer, for payment of £97, 13s. 11½d. as rents due at Candlemas 1886, Lammas 1886, and Candlemas 1887 for certain small farms on the estate of Forse, about £61 being the annual rent of the whole.

The defender had been in possession of the subjects in question prior to 1885 under different leases, which, with one exception, expired at Whitsunday 1885. The pursuer averred that the defender had since Whitsunday 1885 remained tenant by tacit relocation, and was therefore liable for the rents sued for, being the same rents as under the expired leases.

No. 4.

Oct. 19, 1888.
Sutherland's
Trustee v.
Miller's Trustee.

The defender admitted that he had remained tenant, but denied that he had done so by tacit relocation. He averred that he entered into a verbal arrangement with Mr Sutherland on 8th November 1884, whereby he was to obtain a new lease for fifteen years at the reduced rent for the subjects of £53, and that this agreement was confirmed and reduced to writing in a subsequent letter addressed by Mr Sutherland to his factor and delivered to the defender as a completed memorandum of lease to be presented to the factor in order that a formal stamped lease might be prepared. He further averred that the term of Whitsunday 1885 "was the termination of a two years' lease of the said subjects between the defender and Mr Sutherland, and accordingly it was necessary, under section 28 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, that the defender, in order to prevent tacit relocation, and to secure his right to remove, should have given notice of removal to Mr Sutherland at Martinmas 1884. In consequence, however, of said agreement for a lease, and on the faith thereof, the defender abstained from given notice of removal, passed from his right to remove, and entered into arrangements for continuing in possession. These facts were well known to Mr Sutherland, who entirely acquiesced therein. The new lease was thus legally binding rei interventus."

This defender referred these averments as to the constitution of the lease to the oath of Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland deponed that on 8th November 1884 he and the defender came to a verbal agreement for a new lease for fifteen years from Whitsunday 1885, with certain breaks in the tenant's favour, and a fixed sum for meliorations, the rent to be £53. He further deponed that these conditions were reduced to writing in a letter of 1st December 1884 quoted below,* which was addressed to his factor Mr John Nimmo, writer, Wick, but which was handed by the witness to the defender's wife, to be given to Mr Nimmo that he might prepare a stamped lease in accordance with it. He deponed that he read over the letter to the defender's wife before handing it to her, and then put it in an envelope unclosed and addressed to Mr Nimmo.

The Sheriff-substitute (Harper) found "that the verbal agreement for a new lease averred by the defender, and the reduction to writing of the terms thereof also averred by the defender, have been proved by Mr Sutherland's oath: Allows to the defender a proof of his averments of rei interventus."

* "Dear Sir,—On the 8th of last month I arranged with John Miller, Boulglass, for a new lease to him from Whitsunday next of the farms and lots he now holds, at a yearly rent of fifty-three pounds (£53) and road-money. Duration of lease fifteen years, with breaks in his favour at the end of five and ten years. All improvements to be made solely at his own expenses, without any compensation to be paid therefor at the termination of the lease—wire fences excepted.

"As to the valuation he is now entitled to for the wood, flags, &c., on his houses, I have agreed that a sum of three hundred pounds (£300)—minus £2 per annum during the currency of the lease—is to be paid to him at his outgoing, in lieu of all expenses and other claims.

"A stamped lease to be entered into; also a stamped lease of fourteen years to be given to Widow Miller and the representatives of the late Benjamin Miller, Barogill, on the same conditions they now hold the farm."

No. 4.

Oct. 19, 1888.
Sutherland's
Trustee v.
Miller's Trust-
tee.

It was proved by the evidence of the defender that he had gone to Mr Sutherland on 8th November 1884 with the view of giving the notice of his intention to leave at Whitsunday 1885, which would be required under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, sec. 28, but that in consequence of the arrangement as to a new lease at a reduced rent, which was afterwards specified in the letter of 1st December 1884, he did not give the notice, but continued in possession and laboured the farms. It appeared further from the evidence of Mr Sutherland's factor, Mr Nimmo, that he did not on receipt of the letter of 1st December 1884 prepare a formal lease, in consequence of his being much engaged with other matters, and that Mr Sutherland granted a trust for creditors on 24th February 1885, after which he (witness) gave up all thought of preparing the lease; further that having been instructed by the agent under the trust-deed not to grant new leases containing any change on the rental, he wrote to the defender, as follows, on 25th April 1885,—“ . . . With reference to Mr Sutherland's letter to me of 1st December last, I delayed preparing the leases in the knowledge that they would not be binding unless possession was had under them; and after the execution by him in February last of the trust-deed, I brought it under the notice of the agents under the trust-deed, who informed me they had written to Mr Sutherland that it would be better to make no changes upon the rental by granting new leases.—Yours truly, JOHN M. NIMMO.” This witness also deponed that on 4th April 1885 he had verbally informed the defender that a new lease would not be granted, but there was no other evidence of this statement, and the defender did not remember its having been made.

The defender became bankrupt during the action, and Alex. Geddes was appointed trustee on his sequestrated estates.

The Sheriff-substitute (Harper) assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—(1) It could not be held that the tenant held under a new arrangement, and it must follow that he held by tacit relocation. The letter of 1st of December 1884 did not constitute a lease. It was not even a promise to the defender to give him one, for it was a letter addressed not to him, but to the landlord's own agent. It was alleged that the new arrangement came into effect at Whitsunday 1885. But the letter of 25th April 1885 had already intimated to the defender that no new lease would be granted. It lay on the defender to establish that he was holding under a new lease, and he had failed to do so. (2) It was said that the new arrangement, even if not complete in itself, was validated rei interventu. But nothing the tenant was said to have done in consequence of the new bargain was unequivocally referable to it. It was only said that he had abstained from doing something. Mr Bell<sup>1</sup> was of opinion that in order to constitute rei interventus there must be “proceedings unequivocally referable” to the new bargain. The word “proceedings” implied something positive, something that the other party might check.

Argued for the defender ;—(1) Tacit relocation was excluded by the letter of 1st December 1884, and by all the facts of the case. The obligation as to the new lease did not require rei interventus. It was a unilateral obligation relative to the land, and delivered to the tenant that it might be acted upon by the landlord's servant. Such a unilateral obligation bound the granter,<sup>2</sup> and it was clear that the tenant acted on it. It was thus quite sufficient to constitute a new bargain of lease.<sup>1</sup> The clause in the letter of 1st December 1884 bearing that a stamped lease was to be entered into was not suspensive of the transaction. It was an instruction to the writer's servant. (2) Where a landlord had so acted as to lead to the conclusion that the agreement for a new lease was complete, the tenant's mere continuation of possession, although without any further specific act constituted rei interventus.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Bell's Princ., sec. 26.

<sup>2</sup> Ferguson v. Paterson, 1748, M. 8440; Muirhead v. Chalmers, 1759, M. 8444; Fulton v. Johnston, 1761, M. 8446.

No. 4.

Oct. 19, 1888.
Sutherland's
Trustee v.
Miller's Trust-
tee.

LORD YOUNG.—The action is one for certain rents, and is laid upon the footing that the defender is tenant by tacit relocation, and has been so since Whitsunday 1885. If he has been, the rent sued for in the action is due. The first and only material issue, then, being whether the defender was tenant by tacit relocation, we find he says he was not, and in support of his denial he says that upon the eve of the expiry of the period when notice had to be given in order to terminate the then existing lease as at Whitsunday 1885, he resorted to the landlord, and that they arranged for a new lease, to come into effect at the termination of the old one. If that new lease was agreed upon that was an end to tacit relocation. Now, the alleged bargain for a new lease, to come into operation at the termination of the old one, is contained in the letter of 1st December 1884. That is a letter by the landlord to his agent expressing the fact of the new bargain and its terms, and desiring the agent to carry the bargain into formal execution. The landlord gave it to the tenant to give to the factor, communicating to the tenant its contents, and he then gave it to the factor. Thereupon, the tenant says, he abstained from giving the notice which he would otherwise have done, to terminate the old lease, and prevent tacit relocation. I think that is natural and probable in itself. Now, a letter so expressed by the landlord addressed to his agent, even though given to the tenant to carry, would not of itself constitute a lease for a period of years. More would be required. Whether the tenant's abstention from giving regular notice that he terminated the old lease and reliance on the new bargain would be sufficient rei interventus, I do not think we require to determine. The inclination of my opinion is that that circumstance would be sufficient to prevent the landlord from resiling from the bargain. The period elapsed in which the tenant would have looked for a new farm, and he may have allowed it to pass in reliance on the former agreement for a lease. But we need not, I say, decide that, for unless the contract as expressed in the letter to which I have referred was departed from, it remained and was in existence at the termination of the old lease in 1885. Now, the tenant remained in possession, and I think that his possession subsequent to Whitsunday 1885 must on principle (which has received effect in many cases) be attributed to the new bargain, and not to tacit relocation on the old lease. That is to my mind irresistible. The letter is inconsistent with the notion of tacit relocation. Expressum facit cessare tacitum. Tacit agreement to continue on the old relation is inconsistent with their having expressed the terms of the new one. Now, that reduces the question to this, Did the landlord validly withdraw from the agreement before the end of the old lease at Whitsunday 1885, so that the possession after that date is not to be attributed to the new bargain? It was argued that he did, and that that is shewn by the letter of his

<sup>1</sup> Arbuthnot v. Campbell, 1793, Hume's Decns. 785; Murdoch v. Moir, June 18, 1812, F. C.

<sup>2</sup> Sutherland v. Hay, Dec. 12, 1845, 8 D. 283, 18 Scot. Jur. 133; Ballantine v. Stevenson, July 15, 1881, 8 R. 959.

No. 4.

Oct. 19, 1888.
Sutherland's
Trustee v.
Miller's Trustee.

agent, dated 25th April 1885. Now, I do not think that that letter expresses withdrawal. The strongest expression in it is,—“I delayed preparing the leases in the knowledge that they would not be binding unless possession was had under them.” That is not quite accurate, for he explains in his evidence more accurately that the delay was because he was too busy to prepare the leases, and it would be sufficient to prepare them before Whitsunday. Now, that was not an intimation that the new lease was not to be gone into. The letter proceeds to say that after Mr Sutherland had executed his trust-deed in February, “I brought it under the notice of the agents under the trust-deed, who informed me that they had written to Mr Sutherland that it would be better to make no changes upon the rental by granting new leases.” That is not a withdrawal. It is a statement of fact as to a letter to Mr Sutherland. It did not lead Mr Sutherland to do anything to shew that he had departed from the arrangement upon which to his knowledge the tenant was acting. There is no evidence at all that he took up the position, which, while the law might allow it, no one would be likely to take up, of resiling from a bargain, while good faith would hold him to it. If, then, Mr Sutherland did not withdraw from the arrangement, the possession, as the tenant says, is not under the old lease but under the new arrangement, and this action, which is founded on tacit relocation under the old lease cannot stand. I propose, therefore, to negative the foundation of the action—tacit relocation since Whitsunday 1885—and to dismiss the action, reserving to the parties their rights inter se as to rent, for some rent will be due, and as to meliorations.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the letter of 1st December 1884 taken by itself would not constitute a binding agreement of lease. It was not addressed to the tenant, the defender, but to the landlord's agent. More will be required to constitute a lease. But there is no question that such a document will be sufficient if rei interventus has followed on it. If the defender had entered into possession, or continued it after Whitsunday 1885, without anything further being said, I think there is no question that the agreement would have been constituted. But it is said that the landlord resiled either by verbal intimation on 4th April 1885 or by letter on 25th April 1885. To take the latter first. It is clear that in the letter there is no evidence of resiling. It does not express that. I cannot therefore look upon it as affecting the position of the defender. But the question remains, whether there was any other intimation that the landlord was to resile from the new bargain. It is said that that was sufficiently intimated by Mr Nimmo, the landlord's agent, in a conversation which took place on 4th April 1885. I think that the evidence on which that contention was founded is not sufficient evidence that the landlord resiled from the new bargain. It is not even said in the evidence that Mr Nimmo had authority from his employer to make such an intimation. I think it would be unjust to the defender to hold that the landlord ever resiled from the new arrangement.

I think, therefore, that the pursuer has not established that the defender has been possessing under tacit relocation.

LORD LEE.—I incline to go the length of holding, along with Lord Young, as I understand his Lordship's view, that it would have been too late for the landlord to resile in April 1885. It is said that the tenant's mere abstention from giving a notice he might otherwise have given is insufficient. That may be, but I have difficulty in understanding a case of mere abstention. It cannot be taken by itself. By the necessity of the case there was more. The tenant not only gave no notice, but went on to possess, and after it became too late to give the notice he was possessing the farm in a position not so free as before. He did so under the belief, at least, that there was a new arrangement and not a tacit relocation of the old. If the landlord, on the other hand, could change his mind up to April 1885 the tenant might have had to go out in a few weeks without having made any other arrangement for himself.

No. 4.
Oct. 19, 1888.
Sutherland's
Trustee v.
Miller's Trustee.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find (1) that the defender possessed the lands and others libelled from Whitsunday 1883 till Whitsunday 1885, under a lease between him and George Sutherland of Forse, the proprietor of the subjects, and that the said lease terminated at Whitsunday 1885: (2) That he has since possessed the said subjects, not by tacit relocation under the said lease but under an arrangement entered into between him and Mr Sutherland, set forth in the letter of 1st December 1884, No. 14 of process, addressed by Mr Sutherland to his agent Mr Nimmo, and delivered by Mr Sutherland to the defender's wife on behalf of the defender: Therefore dismiss the action, reserving the pursuer's claims for rents, and the defender's claims for meliorations and all answers to said claims."

ALFRED SUTHERLAND, W.S.—THOMAS LIDDLE, S.S.C.—Agents.

ELIZABETH JAMIESON, Nominal Raiser (Appellant).—Low—Kennedy.

JAMES DALLAS, Real Raiser (Appellant).—Low—Kennedy.

ANN ROBERTSON, Defender (Respondent).—Sym.

WILLIAM DOUGLAS AND OTHERS, Defenders.

No. 5.

Oct. 23, 1888.
Jamieson v.
Robertson.

Process—Multiplepinding—Competency.—A creditor of a deceased person raised an action against his executor to constitute a claim against the estate which, if found due, would render the estate insolvent, and the executor defended the action. Thereupon another creditor, who maintained that the claim was excessive, raised a process of multiplepinding in name of the executor, calling all the other creditors of the deceased as defenders. It was stated at the bar that the multiplepinding was raised with the consent of the executor. The pursuer of the action of constitution objected to the multiplepinding as incompetent and unnecessary. Objection repelled.

ANN ROBERTSON, domestic servant, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Stonehaven against Elizabeth Jamieson, executrix of the deceased Peter Duffus, crofter, Clashendrum, in whose service she had been, for payment of £104, 17s., of which £47, 10s. was for aliment of an illegitimate child of which he was the father, and the remainder for wages for several years. The executrix defended the action.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Kin-
cardineshire.
I.

James Dallas, another creditor of the deceased, thereafter raised an action of multiplepinding in name of the executrix, calling as defenders himself, Robertson, and all the other creditors on the estate. He stated that the free balance of the deceased's estate in the hands of the executrix was £93, 6s. 0½d.; that Robertson had raised the action for £104, 17s. against the executrix; and that defences had been lodged stating that the claim was overstated. He further stated,—“The real raiser and several other defenders have intimated that they will not agree to a division (of the estate) as they have well-founded objections to the claim of the said Ann Robertson.”

No. 5.

Oct. 23, 1888.
Jamieson v.
Robertson.

Dallas pleaded;—(2) The pursuer, as holder of the fund in medio, being distressed by competing claims to the same, the estate ought to be distributed under the present action of multiplepinding, with costs to the real raiser. (3) The claim at the instance of the said Ann Robertson against the pursuer can be more satisfactorily determined under the present action, and the action at her instance should therefore be conjoined with the present proceedings.

Robertson denied that the action was necessary. She pleaded;—(1) There is no double distress, and the action ought therefore to be dismissed, with expenses. (2) The action of constitution by the defender having been first raised by her, and being the simpler and less complicated mode of action for dealing with her claim, the present action of multiplepinding was an unnecessary multiplication of actions, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson), on 5th August 1887, repelled the defences to competency, and found Robertson liable in expenses.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sists the process until the issue of the relative action raised in the name of Ann Robertson.”

The action at the instance of Ann Robertson was thereafter proceeded with, and it resulted in her obtaining decree for a certain sum, with expenses.

Thereafter the Sheriff—a motion being made to recall the sist in the multiplepinding—recalled the sist and also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 5th August 1887, dismissed the action, and found the real raiser liable in expenses. The pursuer and nominal raiser (the executrix) and the real raiser then appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for them;—The multiplepinding was competent, because ex facie of the action there was an executry estate insufficient to meet the claims upon it, and requiring to be distributed among contending claimants. It was said that there was no double distress, and that while a trustee or executor might raise such an action for exoneration, this action was raised at the instance of Dallas and not of the executrix. But the answer was that the executrix approved of the action, and desired it to proceed. That was quite evident from the fact that she had become a party to the appeal. The action was thus in the same position as if the executrix had brought it herself, and there was no doubt that double distress was not required in order to justify an executor or trustee obtaining exoneration by means of a multiplepinding. The claim of Robertson was larger than the free residue of the estate—a fact which clearly justified the real raiser in bringing the action with consent of the executrix. The case of Robb's Trustees v. Robb<sup>1</sup> was distinguishable, because there the trustees who held the fund objected to the action being brought in their name.

Argued for Robertson;—There was here no double distress. The one question was, What was the amount of Robertson's claim? It needed no such process as the multiplepinding to determine that, for the question was actually being tried in the process raised by Robertson, when the real raiser thought fit to raise it again in this action. It was said by him that Robertson's claim was excessive, and that he had an interest to have it reduced. If so, he could have aided the executrix in her defence to that action, or, as she had no interest in it, she would doubtless have allowed him to carry it on in her name. But to raise a multiplepoinding about it was an abuse of process. Robertson, who was first in Court with her action, had a very strong interest to object to the competency of the multiplepoinding, for if it were competent the real raiser would be found entitled to the expenses of raising the process out of the fund in medio. The multiplepoinding was both inexpedient and incompetent, and the opinion of Lord Gifford in Robb's case applied. His Lordship there said (7 R. 1049),—"When a debt is legally due, and the only question is how much the creditor will take in lieu of his full claim, that is certainly not a ground for an action of multiplepoinding." It was attempted to get rid of the objection by saying that the executrix approved of the action, and she had for this purpose been induced to join in the appeal. That was her first appearance in the action except as nominal raiser. But that was to get over the fact that Dallas had raised the action by the contention that it might have been raised by another person, the executrix. Assuming that, it was surely a good answer that she had not done it.

<sup>1</sup> Robb's Trustees v. Robb, July 3, 1880, 7 R. 1049; cf. Crocket v. Panmure, June 8, 1853, 15 D. 737, 25 Scot. Jur. 443; Pollard v. Galloway, Oct. 21, 1881, 9 R. 21.

No. 5.

Oct. 23, 1888.
Jamieson v.
Robertson.

LORD YOUNG.—The question in this case regards the competency of an action of multiplepoinding raised in name of the executrix-dative of the late Peter Duffus, a crofter in Kincardineshire. She is described as pursuer and nominal raiser—the real raiser being a creditor on the estate of the deceased of the name of Dallas. There are a number of persons called as defenders, who claim to be creditors on the estate, and one of them is Ann Robertson. The executrix, counsel for the real raiser informed us, assents to the action being raised in her name as pursuer and nominal raiser, and all the creditors assent, with the exception of Ann Robertson, who says that the action is incompetent. The nature of her claim has been explained to us. It is stated that she was in the service of the deceased Peter Duffus, and that her claim is for unpaid wages and for the aliment of a bastard child, of which the deceased was the father. It is stated, and apparently admitted, that while her claim is for £104, 17s., the whole amount of the estate in the hands of the executrix is £93, 6s. 0½d., and there are a number of other creditors. What objection is there to this action? I can conceive none. I must deal with it exactly as if it had been brought by the executrix herself. Mr Sym admitted that he could not dispute that an executor against whom claims are made which are greater than the estate in his hand may raise an action of multiplepoinding to obtain exoneration. What difference does it make that with her assent it is brought at the instance of other creditors? I see no reason to doubt its competency. It appears that Ann Robertson had before the multiplepoinding raised a summons to establish her claim by an action of constitution. I think the proper answer of the executrix was to bring the multiplepoinding. When it was brought at the instance of the other creditors I think the proper course would have been to bring the action of constitution before the attention of the Court, and to desire the Sheriff to treat the action of constitution raised by Ann Robertson as a claim in the action of multiplepoinding. Instead of that being done the Sheriff sisted the action of multiplepoinding until the other action had been disposed of. I cannot comprehend the wisdom of this course. It was the reverse of the right one, which was, as I have stated, to bring Ann Robertson's action into the multiplepoinding, and to hold the summons in the action as a claim in the multiplepoinding. The Sheriff thereafter dismissed the multiplepoinding as incompetent. Now, I am

No. 5. of opinion that it was perfectly competent, and I propose that we sustain the appeal, recall the judgments of the Sheriff appealed against, and find the appellant entitled to expenses, and remit the multiplepoinding back to the Sheriff.

Oct. 23, 1888.
Jamieson v. Robertson.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I concur. I do not think this was a case of a creditor attempting to take the management of the executry out of the hands of the executrix by a multiplepoinding raised against her will.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff sisting process in the multiplepoinding and the subsequent interlocutors recalling the sist and dismissing the action, and remitted the cause to the Sheriff.

D. LISTER SHAND, W.S.—W. B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 6. GEORGE GREIG (Inspector of Poor of City Parish, Edinburgh), Pursuer (Respondent).—Balfour—J. A. Reid.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Greig v. Simpson. ANDREW CRAIG SIMPSON (Inspector of Poor of South Leith Parish), Defender (Appellant).—J. G. Smith—Salvesen.

Poor—Settlement—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 76—Continuity of residence.—A tailor, who lived with his wife and family in a house which he rented in the parish of South Leith, accepted a situation in Cupar-Fife, when there were still six weeks to run of the five years necessary to give him a residential settlement in South Leith. At first he took lodgings in Cupar, generally returning to visit his wife in Leith from Saturday to Monday. At the end of the six weeks, 26th May 1884, he removed his wife and family to Cupar to a house he had taken for them there immediately after he went to reside at Cupar, but of which he could not get possession till the May term. Held that he had not acquired a residential settlement in South Leith.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians.
M.

THE inspector of poor of the City Parish, Edinburgh, raised an action against the inspector of poor of South Leith Parish in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians at Edinburgh, for repayment of advances made by him to Mrs Abigail Simpson or Morham and her children, alleging that the pauper's husband had at his death an industrial residential settlement in the latter parish by residence within that parish for five years prior to 26th May 1884, and that that settlement had been transmitted to his widow and family at his death.

The defender denied that Morham had resided in South Leith Parish for the five years necessary to acquire a settlement, as he had removed to and taken up his residence at Cupar, where he had obtained a new situation, on 9th April 1884.

The decision of the case came to depend entirely upon the question whether the acquisition by Morham of a residential settlement in South Leith had been interrupted by his removal to Cupar, it being proved that he had resided in South Leith continuously from 26th May 1879 till April 1884. The nature of the evidence appears from the extracts which are given below.*

---

* Mrs Morham, who had been married to Morham in 1875, deponed, inter alia, as follows:—"My husband went to Cupar and got employment there from a Mr Miles. He went there on 9th April 1884. . . . He did not take the family and me over to Fife at that time; we did not leave till the term. My husband took lodgings with a Mrs Stark, at 16 Crossgate, Cupar.

On 4th February 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds as matter of fact (1) that John Wilson Morham, a tailor's cutter, died on the 29th of June 1886, survived by his wife, Mrs Abigail Simpson or Morham, and several young children; (2) that on the 10th of September 1886 the said Mrs Abigail Simpson or Morham became chargeable to the City Parish of Edinburgh, in which she was then residing with her children, and that she was at that time, and has ever since continued to be, a proper object of parochial relief; (3) that between the 10th of September 1886 and the 1st of October 1887 the pursuer, as inspector of poor of the said City Parish, advanced to Mrs Morham, for behoof of herself and her children, sums amounting in all to £20, 11s. 4d., conform to account No. 4 of process: Finds in fact and in law that the said John Wilson Morham had continuously resided in the parish of South Leith for the period of five years immediately preceding the 26th of May 1884, and thereby acquired for himself and for his said wife and children a residential settlement in that parish, which they retained at his death, on the 29th of June 1886: Finds further in point of law that son.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Graig v. Simp-

The family and I remained in the house in North Elliot Street till the 26th of May 1884. I remember that day distinctly from some letters that I have in my possession written by my husband. In a letter to me, dated 13th May 1884, he says,—'I am sure you wish that it (the removal) was all over, as well as I do. I think I will get away from the Saturday to the Tuesday—that is Saturday week.' The Saturday week which is there mentioned was the 24th of May. I received a letter from my husband, dated 18th May 1884, in which he says,—'I am glad to think that I will be home beside you next Sunday, and then the Sunday after that I will have you all over here and settled.' . . . . . When we went over to Cupar we stayed in my husband's lodgings for two days. Then we went to a house which he had taken for us at 44 Bonnygate, Cupar. The family and I settled down in that house with him. During the interval between the 10th of April and the 24th of May 1884, when he came across to remove the family and me, he generally visited me on the Saturdays, staying from the Saturday till the Monday. I only remember one week in which he did not come, but there may have been more. He was in the habit of staying till the Monday morning, and then going back to his work. During all that time the family and I had no other dwelling-house than the one in North Elliot Street. My husband sent me money to keep the house at that time. I had no other source of income. . . . Cross.—The house in Bonnygate was taken at Whitsunday for a year. I had taken the house in North Elliot Street for another year before that, but it was given up; the landlord took it off our hands. The house in Cupar was not ready for us when we went over there, and we stayed in Mrs Stark's for two days. We all stayed in Cupar for six months, and then we went to live in Portobello. My husband had got a situation with Mr Wallace in High Street, Edinburgh. That was a better situation than the one he had in Cupar."

Robert Miles deponed,—“I was a draper in Cupar for some years. I was engaged in business there in 1884. I required a cutter in the spring of that year. . . . I came across and saw Mr Morham, and engaged him. The terms of his engagement were £2, 2s. 6d. a-week, and a month's warning on either side. He came over to Cupar about the middle of March, but I could not give the exact date. I arranged lodgings for him with Mrs Stark, 16 Crossgate. He was with me for seven months. He left in the month of October, having got another situation in Edinburgh.”

Jessie Mason, Cupar, deponed,—“I reside with my grandmother, Mrs Stark. We keep lodgers. . . . Mr Morham engaged a room. I think it was in the end of March or beginning of April 1884 that he came. He then said that he intended to bring over his wife and children, but he did not say when. Sometime after he came he told us he had taken a house in Bonnygate.”

No. 6. the said parish of South Leith is bound to relieve the City Parish of Edinburgh, . . . of the sums disbursed by the pursuer for behoof of the widow and children of the said John Wilson Morham," &c.*
 Oct. 25, 1888.
 Greig v. Simpson.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—The fact that Morham had removed to Cupar in April on a permanent engagement there prevented the acquisition of a constructive residential settlement in the parish of South Leith. Hodgert's case<sup>1</sup> decided that where the father of a family removed from a parish and went to a new employment in another parish, although the family remained behind and only joined him afterwards, the severance for poor-law purposes dated from the time when the head of the house left. Morham left for Cupar in April 1884, and took a residence there with the intention of bringing his wife and family to it as soon as possible. He thereby commenced an industrial settlement there, and the continuity of the settlement in South Leith was interrupted.<sup>2</sup> It was different where a man left in search of work and failed to find it; in that case the continuity was not interrupted. It was of importance to note that the words of the 76th section were "unless such person shall have resided in such parish," and there was no mention of the word "home."

Argued for the respondent;—It was clear upon the authorities that if the six weeks of absence in Cupar had been not at the end of a period of residence but in the middle, then they would not have interrupted the continuity of the settlement in South Leith. Personal presence was not required for the acquisition of a constructive residential settlement. What would suffice to keep up the relation, where there was personal absence, was well illustrated by the case of Hodgert.<sup>3</sup> It was very different from the present case. There the wife and family, although they remained behind when the husband went to work elsewhere, did so, not on the footing of proper tenants paying rent, but rather by favour and tolerance. Besides that case was decided before the doctrine of constructive

---

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute had the benefit of an ingenious argument on the part of the defender in this case, but he does not think it necessary to enter into a discussion of all the authorities that were cited. The doctrine of constructive residence in the acquisition of a settlement is now settled by a series of decisions, and as Lord Shand observed in the case of Wallace v. Beattie, 1881, 8 R. 345, 'The real test in questions of this kind is, where is the person's home?' In the present instance the Sheriff-substitute thinks that it is not doubtful that the home of the pauper's husband, for the period of five years from the 26th of May 1879 to the 26th of May 1884, was in the parish of South Leith. It is true that, for about six weeks prior to the term of Whitsunday 1884, he himself was absent in Cupar, where he had got work. But his home still continued to be in South Leith, where his wife and family still resided in the house which he had taken up to the Whitsunday term, and he joined them there as often as he could from a Saturday to a Monday. That he considered his home to be in South Leith is evident from his letter to his wife, dated Sunday 18th May (No. 22 of process), in which he says,—'I am glad to think that I will be home beside you next Sunday, and then the Sunday after that I will have you all over here and settled.'" residence was developed.<sup>1</sup> If the test was "the home" as had been laid down by several Judges, then the home was in South Leith. Morham's family, furniture, &c., were all there. He was only a lodger in Cupar.

<sup>1</sup> Hodgert v. Petrie and Mason, June 13, 1851, 1 Poor-Law Magazine, 350.

<sup>2</sup> Hastings v. Hughan and Semple, Jan. 27, 1866, 8 Poor-Law Magazine, 331 (Lord President Colonsay, p. 336); Allan v. Shaw and King, Feb. 24, 1875, 2 R. 463; Hamilton v. Kirkwood and Smith, Nov. 13, 1863, 2 Macph. 107, 36 Scot. Jur. 49; Wallace v. Beattie and Highet, Jan. 6, 1881, 8 R. 345; Deas v. Nixon, June 17, 1884, 11 R. 945; Hewat v. Hunter, July 6, 1866, 4 Macph. 1033.

<sup>3</sup> 1 Poor-Law Magazine, 350.

No. 6.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Greig v. Simpson.

LORD MURE.—In this case the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded upon the view that the deceased John Wilson Morham looked upon his home as being in South Leith Parish, after he went to reside in Cupar, and has therefore held that he did not lose the settlement which he was then in the course of acquiring in South Leith Parish, the five years necessary to acquire that settlement having been completed shortly after he went to Cupar. In support of this view the Sheriff-substitute refers to the fact that in a letter written by the deceased to his wife in May 1884, he speaks of Edinburgh as his "home." But I do not think it would be safe to hold this isolated expression as conclusive of the present question, which depends upon the main leading facts of the case.

Now these facts are very clearly explained by the witness Miles, a draper in Cupar, whose cutter Morham was. He depones,—“I was a draper in Cupar for some years. I was engaged in business there in 1884. I required a cutter in the spring of that year. I was a draper, but I also carried on a tailoring business. It was in the month of March that I required a cutter. I advertised in the Scotman, and had several applications in writing, including one from John Wilson Morham, North Elliot Street, Edinburgh. I came across and saw Mr Morham, and engaged him. The terms of his engagement were £2, 2s. 6d. a week, and a month's warning on either side. He came over to Cupar about the middle of March, but I could not give the exact date. I arranged lodgings for him with Mrs Stark, 16 Crossgate. He was with me for seven months. He left in the month of October, having got another situation in Edinburgh. He told me about it, and I allowed him to go on a week's warning. He gave me to understand that he was to have a partnership or a commission with the party he was going to.”

The result of this evidence appears to me to make it clear that Morham entered into a permanent engagement with Miles, and made up his mind to take up his residence in Cupar as soon as that engagement was made. That that was his position is confirmed by the evidence of his widow, who is examined at considerable length, and states that immediately after her husband entered into the employment of Mr Miles he took a house in Cupar, and resolved to bring over his wife and family to reside with him there. This he accordingly did at the May term, as he could not till then secure a house for his family; but he continued to reside in Cupar himself from the time he entered upon his employment there, and never again took up his residence in South Leith.

In these circumstances, the question we have to decide arises upon the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), which it is of importance to observe speaks not of the pauper's "home" but of his "residence," and what we have to consider is whether Morham ever resided for five years continuously in South Leith in the sense of the 76th section of the statute. I am of opinion that he never did. To complete that period he would have required to reside in South Leith till Whitsunday 1884. But he left South Leith, and took up

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Greig v. Miles and Simpson, July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1132, 39 Scot. Jur. 617; Harvey v. Roger and Morison, Dec. 21, 1878, 6 R. 446; Moncreiff v. Ross, Jan. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 331.

No. 6.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Greig v. Simpson.

his residence in Cupar upon the 9th of April 1884, living in lodgings there until his family came over and joined him in the end of May, from which time he had secured a house; and I think it is pretty clear upon the evidence, that if he had been able to get a house sooner he would have taken it, and brought his family over at the first. If he had been able to do that, there would not, as I conceive, have been any difficulty or even doubt about the case. His connection, and that of his family, with South Leith would then have been entirely broken. But even as matters stand, and having regard to the fact that he took up his own permanent residence at Cupar in April, I cannot look upon the circumstance that he had to leave his family in South Leith as a matter of convenience, and occasionally visited them there, as making South Leith his own residence in the sense of the 76th section of the statute. This would, I think, be carrying the doctrine of constructive residence a good deal farther than it has ever before been carried, and to an extent not warranted by the decisions in any of the leading cases on the subject. For I cannot see how Morham, after fixing his own residence at Cupar, and settling himself there, could at the same time be held to be acquiring a constructive residence in South Leith Parish through his wife and family residing there till the house he had taken for them at Cupar was ready for their use.

I am therefore of opinion that we must sustain this appeal, and hold that the parish of South Leith is not liable to support the pauper and her family.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by the Parochial Board of the City Parish of Edinburgh to have it found that Abigail Simpson Morham, at the date of her application for relief from that parish, had, in respect of the residence of her deceased husband in the parish of South Leith from 25th May 1879 to 26th May 1884 a subsisting parochial settlement in the latter parish, and for decree for payment of certain advances made to her by the pursuer. If the pursuer is able to establish the residence of the deceased John Wilson Morham in the parish of South Leith for the period in question, he must necessarily succeed in his action. The answer which is made is that it is not true that Morham resided in South Leith Parish for the whole five years.

The question turns upon the nature and effect of Morham's residence in Cupar from 9th April till 26th May 1884. If we are to put upon that residence the construction contended for by the appellant, then the continuity required to establish a settlement in South Leith Parish is broken—if we are to adopt the respondent's argument, it is not broken.

Morham was a tailor's cutter, and obtained a situation as such in Cupar, where he remained for seven months from 9th April 1884. That was a permanent engagement at the time it was made, and it was so intended. When he accepted it, he formed the intention of going to reside in Cupar in the immediate future and carrying on his occupation there. He took lodgings there at first, but he set about at once to find a house to which he might bring his wife and children at the ensuing term, and to which they then removed. He continued from the 9th April to reside continuously in Cupar, except that occasionally upon a Saturday he returned for the Sunday to Edinburgh to pay his wife and children a visit. Otherwise his residence in Cupar was continuous until October when he removed elsewhere in consequence of getting a better situation.

What then in law is the effect of that residence in Cupar, and are we to hold that from 9th April to 26th May Morham was constructively residing in the parish of South Leith? The cases of constructive residence which have been cited deal with circumstances where there have been casual and temporary absences incidental to employment undertaken elsewhere than in the parish; where also there has been an intention to return when the temporary employment was over. Here there is an element which distinguishes this case from these previous ones. Morham's residence in Cupar was permanent. So little did he intend to return to South Leith that he arranged at once after going to Cupar to send for his wife and children. No doubt he came over occasionally for Sunday to Edinburgh, but Cupar was the permanent residence to which he returned upon the Mondays. Accordingly the continuity required to establish a settlement in the parish of South Leith was broken when he went to reside in Cupar.

No. 6.

Oct. 25, 1888.

Greig v. Simpson.

In so deciding I do not think we are going counter to the cases of Miles and others which established the doctrine of constructive residence, and we are deciding in conformity with the earlier cases of Hodgert and Hastings cited to us. These cases would have been directly applicable if the question had been whether or not Morham had acquired a settlement in Cupar, and from what period did it run. A permanent residence having been begun in Cupar, it was, in my opinion, impossible that a residential settlement could at the same time be in course of being acquired in another parish by holding that Morham was nevertheless constructively resident there.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The only question appears to me to be whether Morham's residence in Cupar was merely casual or occasional so as not to interrupt the continuity of his residence in the parish of South Leith. The evidence leaves no doubt in my mind that the residence in Cupar was due to a fixed intention to leave South Leith, and live permanently in Cupar, using the word "permanently" in the sense which Lord Adam has explained. The 9th April 1884, when Morham went to Cupar, appears to me to have been the beginning of a period of industrial residence, which would have given him a settlement there if it had lasted for the statutory period; and from that time his connection with South Leith came to an end.

As to the decisions which have been cited, the only cases which seem to have a material bearing are those in which the effect of temporary or occasional absences from a permanent place of residence has been considered. In these cases, as the Lord President points out in Beattie v. Stark, the judgment proceeded on a construction of the word "continuously," which the Court held must be read reasonably, and in accordance with the habits of mankind. I agree with your Lordships that in such cases as these the material question is whether the circumstances attending the occasional absence are such as to indicate an intention to return to the permanent residence.

The other class of decisions, by which it has been held, upon a construction of the word "residence," that a man may acquire a settlement by what is called constructive residence in a parish in which he has never actually resided, appear to me to have no bearing upon the present case. There is no question of constructive residence. The man's actual residence was in South Leith until April 1884, and when he left South Leith he established his actual residence in Cupar. I am satisfied upon the evidence that when he went to Cupar he had no intention of returning to South Leith, and I think that consideration conclusive of the whole question.

No. 6. The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD SHAND were absent.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Greig v. Simpson.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find, as matter of fact [after repeating the three first findings of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor]—(4) That the said John Wilson Morham had not continuously resided in the parish of South Leith for the period of five years immediately preceding the 26th of May 1884: Find in these circumstances, in point of law, that the said John Wilson Morham had not acquired for himself and for his wife and children a residential settlement in that parish which they retained at his death, and that the appellant, the inspector of the parish of South Leith, is not liable for the sum sued for," &c.

CURROB, COWPER, & CURROB, W.S.—SNODY & ASHER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 7. WILLIAM FORD & SONS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—G. W. Burnet—Salvesen.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v. Stephenson.

RICHARD STEPHENSON, Defender (Respondent).—J. C. Thomson—Mac Watt.

Trust—Trust for creditors—Principal and Agent—Responsibility of trustee who carries on business.—A trader in embarrassed circumstances conveyed to one of his creditors his whole estates and business in trust for behoof of the grantor and his creditors, the trustee to have the management of the business, and the truster to act as his submanager, and to receive such weekly allowance as the trustee should think proper, the business to be carried on by the trustee till he should think it expedient to restore it to the truster or to sell it.

The business was carried on for twenty years by the truster under supervision of the trustee, the supplies being ordered by the truster and paid for by cheques drawn by the trustee upon a bank account in his name into which the drawings were paid. The trustee gave the truster a cheque for £6 monthly for his support.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the trustee was personally liable for goods supplied to the business, on the ground that it was carried on by him under the trust-deed, and that the truster had acted as his manager.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
I.

WILLIAM FORD & SONS, merchants, Leith, raised an action against Richard Stephenson, designed as "ironmonger and grocer, Duns," for payment of £175, 7s. 7d. as the amount of an account for goods delivered by the pursuers to the business of Matthew Wilson, grocer, Duns, between 6th July 1887 and 19th September 1887, when Wilson died, for which the defender was alleged to be liable.

The pursuers averred that on 26th June 1866 Wilson had granted a trust-deed conveying his whole estate to the defender for the purpose of carrying on the business,* and that thereafter Wilson was truly in the em-

* The trust-deed, which was prepared by a Mr Hunter, writer in Duns, and agent for the Royal Bank there, with which bank Wilson had previously been endeavouring to arrange a cash-credit, proceeded upon the narrative that Wilson's affairs had become embarrassed, and that without both pecuniary assistance and advice he found himself unable to carry on his business, and that he had exhibited to the defender a statement of his debts, accounts due to him, and a valuation of his means and estate (exclusive of certain policies of assurance), "and seeing that it is for the advantage of my creditors, as well as of myself, that my business should for a time be carried on under proper management, and the said Richard Stephenson being of opinion that by a prudent administration and management of my affairs under his control and supervision ployment of Stephenson as manager. (Cond. 4) "The whole of the said account was incurred with the knowledge and approval of the defender, and on his behalf, in his conduct of the said business as trustee for Mr Wilson, and on the order of himself or persons authorised by him."

No. 7.
Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

The pursuers pleaded that the goods having been ordered and supplied for behoof of the defender, as trustee for Wilson, or as an individual, he was liable to them in payment of the price.

The defender stated that Wilson, when his affairs became embarrassed in 1866, had applied to him for assistance and advice, and that he had agreed to make him certain advances to enable him to extricate himself and continue his business. "The defender was advised to procure the said deed (i.e. the trust-deed quoted below) as a security, if possible, for his advances, and in order that he might secure and enforce some supervision over Mr Wilson's business. The said trust-deed was not acted on to the effect of superseding Wilson in the conduct of his business, nor was that intended. No change took place in the conduct of said business, except as after men-they may be extricated from their present embarrassment, and he, with that view, being willing to make an advance on my behalf to the amount of £150 for the purpose of meeting with the present demands upon me, and with the view ultimately of paying all my debts and restoring my business to a healthy condition, it being hereby expressly provided, stipulated, and declared, that in security of the sum so to be advanced, or any further sum which may be advanced by the said Richard Stephenson, I shall assign to him the foresaid policies of life assurance" for £500 "in absolute security to him, his heirs, executors, and successors, by a separate deed of assignation, and the said Richard Stephenson being further willing to undertake the management of my affairs in trust for behoof of me and all my creditors, and for the purpose of enabling and empowering him so to do, I have resolved to grant these presents in manner underwritten: Therefore I do hereby dispoise, assign, and convey to and in favour of the said Richard Stephenson, as trustee, for behoof of me and all my just and lawful creditors, my whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, presently belonging and owing to me, and which may belong and be owing to me, or to which I may acquire right during the subsistence of this trust . . . excepting always from this trust the foresaid policies of life assurance; in trust for the uses, ends, and purposes, with the powers, and under the conditions, provisions, and declarations underwritten, namely:—Primo, That the said Richard Stephenson shall take the full management and control of my whole means and estate, and that I shall act as his sub-manager, and that the business of a grocer shall be carried on by the purchase and sale of spirits, porters, ales, groceries, and other such goods, and that for such time as shall seem expedient to the said Richard Stephenson, that is, until it shall seem to him that the business is in so healthy a condition as that he may restore the possession and management to me, and that he may with advantage to me and my creditors resign and upgive the present trust; it being hereby provided that I shall have the occupancy of the dwelling-house, and the use of the household furniture; and prices and proceeds of sales, and all purchases of goods to supplement the stock shall be under the control and management of the said Richard Stephenson, he being bound to make such weekly allowance for my services as shall seem to him necessary and proper for the maintenance of my family." The second purpose of the trust was for payment of the expenses thereof, with suitable remuneration to the trustee. The third purpose was,—“If it shall at any time appear to the said Richard Stephenson, as trustee foresaid, it is not for the advantage of me and my creditors to carry on the said business, then he is hereby empowered, without any further advice or consent of me, and at such time and in such manner as he may think expedient, to sell and dispose of the whole estate and effects hereby disposed, and such other goods or effects as may be bought in under his management.”

---

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
 Ford & Sons v.
 Stephenson.

tioned, in regard to cash transactions, and it was carried on as before by Mr Wilson for his own behoof. The said trust-deed was not intimated to creditors or published in any way. Of even date therewith Mr Wilson granted to the defender, in further security of said advances and interest, an assignation in security of two policies of insurance on his life with the Life Association of Scotland for £200 and £300, a copy whereof is herewith produced. In pursuance of the arrangement, and for the purposes of the business, an account was opened with the Royal Bank of Scotland at Duns, which was operated upon by cheques signed by the defender, and into which all money derived from the business was paid by Mr Wilson. The defender's position was that of a secured creditor with some charge of the cash and banking transactions. The existence and nature of the said deed and the defender's position under it have since the date of said deed, or at least since the year 1871, been well known to the pursuers, who were creditors at said date."

The defender pleaded;—(3) The said goods not having been ordered by, supplied to, or used for behoof of the defender, as trustee or as an individual, he ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The pursuers having since the date of the deed condescended on, or shortly thereafter, been fully aware of the defender's position thereunder, are not entitled to decree as concluded for.

A proof was led, from which the following facts appeared:—

Wilson began to deal with the pursuers in 1863. In 1866 he had become somewhat in arrear in his payments to them, and his business had got into a condition of embarrassment. On 19th June 1866 he informed the pursuers that he was arranging a cash-credit with the Royal Bank, Duns, and referred them to Mr Hunter, writer there, agent for that bank. In answer to their inquiries Mr Hunter wrote to them, on 26th June 1866, that Wilson, "finding it impossible to carry on his business from his own resources, has made an arrangement with Mr Richard Stephenson, ironmonger here, to aid him with money and advice. A trust-deed is to be executed in Mr Stephenson's favour giving him the full management of the business, so that any orders you receive will be through Mr Stephenson. Mr S. feels assured he will be able to restore matters to a healthy condition very shortly."

On 27th June 1866 the pursuers wrote to Wilson asking the nature of the arrangement which Mr Hunter's letter to them had indicated, and their letter was answered by Hunter on 28th June,—“Mr Wilson has now executed the trust-deed in favour of Mr Stephenson to which I alluded. The purpose of this trust is to carry on the business under Mr Stephenson's supervision, so that while the trust exists Mr Stephenson is the responsible party. He has opened an account here, into which, I understand, all monies drawn are to be paid, and from which all accounts are to be paid. If, therefore, you have the sanction of Mr Stephenson for any orders you may execute, Mr Stephenson will take care that you are paid. In short, Mr Stephenson has taken the management, and is to carry on the business for behoof of Mr Wilson.”

Hunter was not the private agent of the defender.

The pursuers from and after the date of Mr Hunter's letter to them continued to supply goods to the business. The orders were given by Wilson, who carried on the business ostensibly as before, receiving a monthly allowance from the defender. They were paid for by cheques drawn by the defender on an account opened by him in his own name in the Royal Bank, and titled Stephenson's "No. 2 account." This account he used for the purposes of the payments required for the business, and Wilson's duty was to pay into it the money received in the course of business. The defender did not charge or receive any sum as remuneration for his services.

No. 7.

On 24th May 1870 the defender wrote to the pursuers,—“ I would like very much to see you here with Wilson. As you are aware, I have been carrying on his business under trust for the last four years ; but as I have entered on a lease of the farm of Chapel, and now reside there, I am not able to devote any of my time to his business, and I am anxious to bring the trust to a close, and I would be glad to consult with you as to the best mode of procedure, so as no interest should suffer by my withdrawal.” On 3d June following he wrote saying that Wilson was probably about to obtain a certain loan, “ and should he be successful, I hope it will place Wilson in a position to dispense with my services and the trust-deed.” Pending this contemplated arrangement, Wilson desired certain additional credit from the pursuers, which they were unwilling to give, but which the defender was anxious that they should give. In the course of the correspondence he wrote to them that Wilson’s estate owed him upwards of £400, and that he was not in a position to allow that amount to be increased, and that if they could not accommodate Wilson as he desired, “ the only thing that I can see for it is to bring his affairs to a standstill and advertise the business.” The pursuers maintained the position they had taken up of declining to give Wilson the terms as to credit which he desired, unless some satisfactory security was given them.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

In the course of the correspondence passing at that period the letters quoted below were written by the pursuers to the defender.*

On 25th August 1870, while the proposed new arrangement between

* 23d July 1870.—“ We are in receipt of yours of yesterday. It is very inconvenient for any of us to go to Duns on an early day, and we feel we cannot allow Wilson’s debt to remain any longer in its present state. It is evident that, whatever the cause, his funds have not of late been employed in the payment of his business debts, if we may judge from the state of our long overdue account, as described to you in ours of the 21st. We would like to be informed as to the amount of cash he has received for the last five months, and what has been done with it ; and as it is now some years since your arrangement with him was entered into, we will feel obliged by your sending us a copy or the original, which we shall return in course. If we do not receive a payment to account in course, or are not assured by you that we may count upon one within three or four days, we feel there will be nothing for it but the necessary steps under such circumstances. Having come to this decision, we hope to hear in reply what course you mean to adopt.”

26th July 1870.—“ . . . If you wish, as we understand, to withdraw from your present connection with him, and if he has no other security to offer us, then it can only remain to decide what steps should be adopted under the circumstances, and to enable us to judge of that we would like to know the precise nature of the deed under which you are connected with him.”

1st August 1870.—“ . . . If we get sufficient security we would continue to supply Mr Wilson on our very best terms with goods to the amount of £400 or £500 as now ; but if, say by Thursday, you find it is not likely to be provided, we trust that you will take immediate action to realise and pay our claim, and render unnecessary any steps we might think otherwise incumbent on us.”

On 17th August 1870 the pursuers wrote to the defender offering to let their claim lie over on condition of satisfactory security being found, and, further, to give, on that condition, certain terms of credit. In this letter they wrote,—“ We would also suggest that in order further to induce his friends to befriend him, you should agree to continue the trust-deed, which would enable his securities through you to put a stopper at once on Wilson should he be found failing in any respect to implement his engagement, and enable you at any time to look into his affairs.”

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

the pursuers and Wilson was under discussion, the defender gave the pursuers a special guarantee of payment of certain goods which Wilson required. In the letter undertaking this obligation he wrote referring to the proposed arrangement, and stating that it was likely to be carried through in a few days, and concluded his letter thus:—"In the meantime send him what goods he may order, and I will see you paid until the arrangement is carried through." Eventually the pursuers received bills to the amount of £350 signed by Wilson and guaranteed by two persons named Kellie and Hannan, and a cheque of £28 from the defender, which wiped out the debt then existing.

Thereafter matters went on as they had done prior to 1870, goods being ordered from the pursuers by Wilson, and paid for by the defender's cheque.

In 1874 the defender purchased the premises in which Wilson's business was carried on, and of which Wilson was the tenant. Thereafter the defender in keeping the trust account credited himself with the rent.

In April 1882 the defender again became desirous of being free from the trust-deed, and the letters on that subject quoted below passed between him and the pursuers.* In consequence of the proposal to dispose * Defender to pursuers, 14th April 1882.—"Dear Sirs,—I think it right that you should know from me the present state of Mr M. Wilson's affairs, especially as he intends seeing you to-morrow on the subject. You are aware that several years ago he was seriously embarrassed; at that time he executed a trust-deed in my favour, under which the business has been carried on, and I am glad to say that now he is perfectly solvent. The carrying on of the trust has involved me in raising, for the purpose of carrying on the business efficiently, a considerable sum of money, and I am anxious now to be relieved from this, as well as the responsibility of the trust, but Wilson's difficulty seems to be in raising a sufficient capital to allow me to resign, and if this cannot be done, the only other alternative seems to me to dispose of the business. This on Wilson's account would be a serious matter, as the business is a good one, easily managed, and on the whole profitable; besides, the premises have now been bought and improved to suit the requirements of his trade. If you can suggest any way out of the difficulty, perhaps you will communicate it to Wilson, who will call on you sometime to-morrow."

Defender to pursuers, 19th April 1882.—"Dear Sirs,—I have been seriously considering the matter as to which Mr Wilson called on you on Saturday. It appears to me the only way practicable under the circumstances is to try and get someone who wishes to extend their business to take this one and retain Wilson as their manager, and give him either a share of the profits or a salary for his services. It's a nice tidy business, easily managed, with a most select connection, turning over about £4000 per annum, with good profits, and capable of great extension. He has a large and a growing trade of sending whisky to London and the south of England. It would take about £1000 to take the business in its present state, paying for stock and debts, and I must either arrange to let the premises on a long lease, or sell them, as it may be wished. If you know of anything likely to suit kindly let me know, as well as your opinion as to this proposal."

Pursuers to defender, 20th April 1882.—"Dear Sir,—We are favoured with yours of yesterday. We would be very sorry if Mr Wilson has to give up his business, but we cannot be surprised that you should wish to be free of your present responsibility. No one occurs to us in the meantime whom it might suit to take over the business under the management of Wilson, but we shall keep the matter before us, and communicate with you should we find any likely person to entertain it."

Defender to pursuers, 21st April 1882.—"Dear Sirs,—I am duly in receipt of yours. Perhaps the best way will be to advertise the business, and see what of the business referred to in these letters an advertisement offering such a business for sale was inserted in the newspapers, reference being made in it to the pursuers, who directed the persons who made inquiries regarding it to communicate with the defender. No sale, however, took place.

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

In December 1882, some orders by Wilson being then unpaid, he ordered a supply of goods. The pursuers were unwilling to furnish them, considering the state of his accounts, and wrote to him the letters as to the conditions on which they would do so which are quoted below.* The dealings of parties, however, notwithstanding these letters, continued as they had done throughout the course of the trust, orders being given by Wilson and executed by the pursuers without the defender's indorsation.

On Wilson's death, as above stated, in September 1887 he left a settlement, under which the defender and Wilson's daughters were trustees and executors.†

In his evidence the defender deponed,—“I never took possession of the business. It was carried on precisely the same as before. I am not aware that the trust-deed was intimated to anyone in 1866. It was not intimated to creditors that they might accede to my being trustee. I looked into Mr Wilson's shop almost every day to supervise the business. I cannot say that I examined all the books, but I looked at the bank-book and cash-book. I made an examination at the balancing time. I did not take anything to do with the orders. . . . Cross for pursuers. —(Q.) In the matter of the arrangement under which you acted, did Mr Hunter, a lawyer in Duns, act for you? (A.) I don't think I had anyone acting for me; I think I acted for myself. . . . I certainly never authorised Mr Hunter to say that I was responsible.” He explained that Wilson's allowance from the trust was £6 monthly, payable by defender's cheque, but that he often took more. “I objected to his taking more, but I could not help his doing so. . . . (Q.) According to the arrangement, comes of it. Would you have any objection to allow the reference to be to yourselves in the first instance.”

* 28th Dec. 1882.—“We have your telegram, and have forwarded, not without some hesitation, the hhd. whisky. When executing your last order, we pointed out that the October goods were not yet paid, and you replied on 18th inst. that a cheque would be sent shortly. Instead of sending a cheque you now order this whisky, and do not say a word in explanation. We trust to have a cheque from you to-morrow, and in future we would like your orders for goods countersigned by Mr Stephenson.”

5th Jan. 1883.—“We have your order for sugar, which has been forwarded; but we must remind you of the request we made in our last that your orders in future should be countersigned by Mr Stephenson. Looking at late delays in payment, we think this arrangement is proper and necessary in the interest of Mr Stephenson, as well as in yours and our own. Don't forget this in sending future orders.”

† On 5th October 1887 the pursuers wrote to Miss Wilson, who was then managing the business, with an invoice of goods sent,—“Before sending more goods we would like to know who is to be responsible for payment. Hitherto we have had Mr Stephenson's guarantee, which we hope he will be pleased to continue.” The defender replied, on 6th October 1887,—“Miss Wilson has shewn me your letter to her of 5th. You are aware Mr Wilson granted a trust-deed in my favour several years ago, and the business has been carried on under the powers granted to me by the same up to his death, when the deed lapsed. . . . The trustees under the settlement will be responsible to you for any goods supplied to them after Mr Wilson's death. With reference to what you say as to my personal guarantee for any goods supplied to Mr Wilson, I can only admit this in so far as the trust-funds will enable me to pay the same, and I am hopeful the estate may admit of everyone being paid in full.”

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

he got nothing from the business except what he got by your cheque? (A.) The arrangement is embodied in the trust-deed. (Q.) Is not that the case? (A.) He was not to take any money except what he got through my cheque. (Q.) In point of fact, the position which he held was that of submanager? (A.) Certainly not; you did not know him! It was impossible to have carried on that business with an imperium in imperio; the nature of the business was such that it was impossible for any man to have acted as manager. (Q.) I understand you to say that the management of the business was not according to the trust-deed? (A.) The management of the business was continued the same as it had been before the trust-deed was granted. (Q.) Having been referred to that passage in the trust-deed, was the arrangement or was it not in accordance with the trust-deed? (A.) If I was to be manager, it certainly was not in accordance with the trust-deed. By the Court.—(Q.) You were not manager? (A.) I was not manager, neither was Wilson submanager. I was his trustee, exercising supervision over him.”

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) assoilzied the defender.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—The correspondence shewed that the defender was the person whom the law must hold responsible for their accounts. By the trust-deed he was invested in Wilson's business and estate, and Wilson was merely his servant. The defender was in absolute control of the business, with a power of sale, and occupied his position without any limit of time. The case was thus distinguishable from those quoted by the Lord Ordinary, where the person sought to be made liable was a creditor put for a limited time into a position to work out a security. The simple ground on which the defender was liable was that he carried on the business; he was therefore, like any trustee who carried on a business, liable for the orders given by himself or by the person who, with his authority, gave them. It could not be maintained that the pursuers did not rely upon the defender's paying the account sued for when they had for many years been paid by him for every other order given in the course of the business. They had been told by Hunter at the time the trust-deed was executed what was intended to be its effect. They had, after a time, * “OPINION.—I think it quite clear that the defender and the late Matthew Wilson never stood towards each other in the relation of principal and agent, or master and servant, in connection with Wilson's business, and that, therefore, the decision in Macphail's case (15 R. 47) has no application to the present. On the other hand, I am unable to distinguish this case in principle from the cases of Eaglesham (2 R. 960), Miller (3 R. 548), Stott (5 R. 1104), and Newcastle Chemical Company (9 R. 110).

“The trust-deed granted in favour of the defender was intended as a security to him for advances made; and although it authorises the defender to take the management of Mr Wilson's business, and to place Mr Wilson in the position of a submanager, the relations between the defender and Mr Wilson never took that shape. Wilson continued in the management of his business, as the pursuers knew. They corresponded with him on that footing. Even if the defender had assumed the position of manager of Wilson's business, that would not have inferred liability for Wilson's debts.

“The pursuers say that in sending the goods to Wilson the price of which is now sued for they relied on the defender being liable therefor. They had no good ground for so relying on the defender. They knew the terms of the trust-deed, and should have known that the trustee under such a deed was not personally liable for the debts of the truster. It is not pretended that the defender ever gave the pursuers any reason to suppose that he would be liable for Wilson's debts. On the contrary, the correspondence in process appears to me to establish that, while the pursuers relied on the defender taking a supervision of Wilson's business, they looked to Wilson alone as their debtor.”

asked to see it, and the defender had shewn it them without suggesting that it was not really the charter of the dealings between them. The defender, as well as they, had again and again referred in the correspondence to his responsibility in carrying on the business as trustee. It was said that the pursuers did not rely on the defender, because they had asked and got special guarantees more than once. But the explanation was that the special guarantees were given at two periods, 1870 and 1882, when the trust was for a time in abeyance, and a new arrangement was contemplated, which made it desirable to have a special temporary guarantee.

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

Argued for the defender;—The defender's position was that of a creditor supervising a business, and advising the trader in money matters. It was not that of a trustee in possession of a business, and carrying it on with the cedent as manager. The pursuers must have known that the deed was not acted on to the effect of divesting Wilson and investing the defender with the full control of the business. The correspondence shewed that they looked upon the defender as Wilson's adviser and his substitute, to whom they trusted. They looked upon him as a sort of interdictor of Wilson. The Lord Ordinary was right in distinguishing the recent case of Macphail & Son v. Maclean's Trustee<sup>1</sup> from the present, because the defender in that case was placed by the lease and by delivery in full possession of the cedent's estate, and the cedent thereafter held the estate merely as agent for him. Besides, in that case the defender was made responsible to the extent of the trust-estate only, and the defender was quite willing to make a concession to that extent here. Again, the case of Eaglesham<sup>2</sup> was different on another ground. There the person sought to be made liable was in receipt of payment by way of commission for his services to the trader. Yet there the judgment was for the defender, because, as here, his true position was held to be that of a creditor having supervision of the trader's business, but not substituted for him in it. As the Lord Ordinary pointed out, the principle which applied to the present case was the same as received effect in the other cases cited by the Lord Ordinary.<sup>3</sup> The pursuers desired the Court to look to the form of the deed under which the defender was made trustee. But the substance of the transaction was the thing to be regarded, and it was clear that the pursuers regarded the trust as a check upon Wilson to be made effectual by the business abilities and good offices of the defender, and such it really was.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action at the instance of a firm of merchants for payment of an account for supplies which were made to a grocery business in Duns which was at one time carried on by a Mr Wilson, who died in September 1887. The period of currency of the account sued for as it now stands is from July 1887 to the date of Wilson's death in September 1887. The amount as ascertained in the minute of restriction is £175, 17s. 7d. The action is not against Wilson's representatives as such, but against Stephenson, an ironmonger in Duns, in whose favour Wilson executed a trust-deed about twenty years ago. We have the trust-deed. I do not detain your Lordships by quoting it at length, but shall state what appears to me its import and effect. Wilson was in labouring

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 16, 1887, 15 R. 47.

<sup>2</sup> Eaglesham v. Grant, July 15, 1875, 2 R. 960.

<sup>3</sup> Miller v. Downie, March 4, 1876, 3 R. 548; Stott v. Fender & Crombie, July 20, 1878, 5 R. 1104; Newcastle Chemical Co. v. Oliphant & Jamieson, Nov. 15, 1881, 9 R. 110.

No. 7. circumstances at the time of its date, 26th June 1866. His business had not been going on satisfactorily. Stephenson acted the friendly part of undertaking to carry it on, and put it on a more satisfactory footing. In order to carry it on he had to make some advances. On the other hand, Wilson by the trust-deed divested himself of the business and of everything else of which he could divest himself in favour of Stephenson, as trustee, in order that he might carry on the business and endeavour by his exertions and by his sensible management to put it on a better footing. By the trust-deed Wilson was completely divested and Stephenson invested subject to the trust. He appointed Wilson himself to carry on the business, as manager and under his supervision, accounting to him by paying over to him all the receipts, that is, the income from the business, while he Stephenson, paid for the supplies made to the business.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

Now, I cannot take the trust-deed as what it was represented to be—that is, a mere sham. I think it was a reality, and that we have not to consider the case of a trust-deed not acted upon, for the trust-deed was acted on. It was acted upon for twenty years. During that period the trustee received the receipts of the business, and paid for the supplies. His purpose was so to carry it on that the receipts should exceed the outgoings, for otherwise it would have been according to his trust and duty to bring the business to an end by selling it, if possible, or at all events to terminate it in some way so as to avoid loss. That during those twenty years, Stephenson knew the exact state of matters from day to day is certain, for one of the admitted facts of the case is that the drawings were paid to him, and that the supplies were paid for by him. There was no other source of payment, for Wilson had nothing. He was the manager and had an allowance, but Stephenson had the funds with which the payments were to be made. It is for that reason I say that Stephenson knew the condition of the business for twenty years. The trust indeed subsists still. The business, if worth anything at all, will be sold by the trustee, and in the course of the execution of the trust, for the trust includes all that Wilson possessed.

Now, the pursuers were acquainted with the fact of the trust-deed being granted from the first. In 1866 they, who were the chief merchants who made the supplies, received in reply to their inquiries letters from Hunter, the man of business who prepared the trust-deed, and who must have known what was intended by the parties. He said in one of these, that dated 26th June 1866, —“A trust-deed is to be executed in Mr Stephenson's favour giving him the full management of the business, so that any orders you receive will be through Mr Stephenson”; and again on 28th June 1886, “Mr Wilson has now executed the trust-deed in favour of Mr Stephenson to which I alluded. The purpose of the trust is to carry on the business under Mr Stephenson's supervision, so that while the trust exists Mr Stephenson is the responsible party.” Now, what Mr Hunter there states would be the legal result of the trust is not in my opinion doubtful in point of law. If a trustee carries on a business directly or through the medium of a manager, he is responsible for the debts undertaken in so carrying it on, whether they are undertaken by himself or by the manager acting within the scope of his authority. That is a familiar thing in the case of a trustee in bankruptcy. He may go on with a contract or (to take a familiar instance) continue to manage, with the landlord's consent, the farm of a bankrupt farmer. Or he may appoint the bankrupt as his manager, and continue to manage the farm through him. He is responsible in such a case for the debts incurred by himself or by the manager. Now, the question here is whether the account sued for is for debts incurred by Stephenson, the trustee, it being immaterial whether they were incurred by himself or by his manager Wilson with his authority. I do not doubt that they are debts of the trust. Stephenson was not carrying on the business for himself. I observe some confusion on this matter in the examination of the witnesses, and the same was observable at the debate. It seems to have been supposed that the allegation was that Stephenson was carrying on the business for his own profit—a thing never suggested at all. It would have been a breach of trust if he had carried it on for his own profit. The legal responsibility was upon him because the contract was his contract. It is said that Stephenson is not liable for Wilson's debts. He is not. But he is liable for a debt incurred by himself in carrying on the trust to the party with whom he dealt. We know from the trust-deed what Wilson's authority to order the goods was. Wilson was manager, and the orders he gave were from 1866 to 1887 given with Stephenson's sanction, which was shewn by his paying the accounts so incurred. It is not suggested that the orders were in excess of his authority with regard to the account in question. Stephenson had a duty to see that the debts incurred in consequence of the orders given did not exceed the drawings of the business. He was successful in that to a considerable extent. I observe that in one or two of his letters he alludes to that. He says (on 14th April 1882 in a letter to the pursuers) that "the business is a good one, easily managed, and on the whole profitable," and in a letter of 19th April 1882 he calls it "a nice tidy business, easily managed . . . and capable of great extension." That shews that he had performed his duty by seeing that the debts were not getting beyond the drawings, which were his means of meeting them.

Now, two incidents in the conduct of the trust were referred to at the debate. One of them occurred in 1870. It appears that then Stephenson had taken a farm and did not expect to be able to give to the business the same amount of attention as before. He told the pursuers of this fact, saying that he wished to bring his actings as trustee to an end, and be free from the position he occupied. The import of the answer to this letter is that the pursuers appreciated his desire, but they pointed out that it would be fair to them that some arrangement should be made as to what was due to them, and that some provision should be made for the future. Nothing came of it at that time, and matters went on as before, Wilson, I mean, being manager and accounting to Stephenson. In 1882 there was another manifestation of desire to be free from the trust on the part of Stephenson. He wrote to the pursuers—"I think it right that you should know from me the present state of Mr M. Wilson's affairs, especially as he intends seeing you to-morrow on the subject. You are aware that several years ago he was seriously embarrassed; at that time he executed a trust-deed in my favour under which the business has been carried on"—(that is the business which it has been argued to us was not carried on under the trust at all). "I am glad to say that now he is perfectly solvent. The carrying on of the trust has involved me in raising for the purpose of carrying on the business efficiently a considerable sum of money, and I am now anxious to be relieved from this as well as the responsibility of the trust" (what responsibility, if his present argument is right?) "but Wilson's difficulty seems to be in raising a sufficient capital to allow me to resign, and if this cannot be done, the only other alternative seems to me to dispose of the

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

No. 7. business. This on Wilson's account would be a serious matter, as the business is a good one, easily managed, and on the whole profitable; besides, the premises have now been bought and improved to suit the requirements of his trade." I may here notice that we were told in answer to our question that in 1874—thirteen years before the account sued for—the defender purchased the premises, so that the trust business was thenceforth conducted in premises belonging to him, he charging the trust a rent for them, and taking credit for it out of the trust funds. That puts out of this case any question of need of delivery in order to operate a legal transfer to him of anything belonging to Wilson or brought into the premises when purchased for the business. The title being with him, and the business being his in trust, he asked the pursuers to assist him in disposing of the business, and on 20th April 1882 they write to him—"We would be very sorry if Mr Wilson has to give up his business, but we cannot be surprised that you should wish to be free of your present responsibility," and go on to say that though no one occurs to them at the time as a purchaser of the business, they will communicate with him (the defender) if they hear of anyone who would be a likely person to take it over. It is thus again pointed out to the defender that the pursuers are quite willing that he should be freed from his position on reasonable terms for themselves. If they continued their supplies, they wished him to continue responsible for them until the new arrangement should take place. Then come two letters, one in December 1882 and the other in January 1883. The former is as follows—"We have your telegram, and have forwarded, not without some hesitation, the hogshead whisky. When executing your last order, we pointed out that the October goods were not yet paid, and you replied on 18th inst. that a cheque would be sent shortly. Instead of sending a cheque you now order this whisky, and do not say a word in explanation. We trust to have a cheque from you to-morrow, and in future we would like your orders for goods countersigned by Mr Stephenson." The other letter is as follows,—“We have your order for sugar, which has been forwarded, but we must remind you of the request we made in our last, that your orders in future should be countersigned by Mr Stephenson. Looking at late delays in payment, we think this arrangement is proper and necessary in the interest of Mr Stephenson, as well as in yours and our own. Don't forget this in sending future orders.”

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

Now the meaning which these letters convey to my mind is this. The pursuers were, though business men, and properly alive to their own interests as such, evidently friendly to Wilson and to the defender, whose interference in Wilson's affairs, thereby involving himself in responsibility, they appreciated. They wished that no orders, and especially no large orders, should be executed without Stephenson's knowledge. He was kept aware of his responsibility for his manager's orders. They say in the letter "in the interest of Mr Stephenson as well as yours and our own," meaning that the business will thrive according as the defender's judgment is followed, and that the defender has an interest because he has a responsibility to them. But I cannot read these letters as meaning that between the defender and the pursuers goods would henceforth only be supplied when the defender signed the order. The ordinary law as to a trustee's order by himself or his manager, as I have already explained it, was applicable. It might have been superseded by a special contract that no order was to be good unless the defender signed it, but I do not think that that agreement was made. No distinction was made between the future and the past, and it is not said that orders were paid for which had Stephenson's signature and that payment of others was refused because they were not signed. On the contrary, the defender paid for them all. Nor yet is it suggested that any of Wilson's orders were in excess of his authority as manager.

No. 7.

Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

On the whole, therefore, I am unable to reach the conclusion that the defender is not responsible. Nor do I think that in this or in any case it makes any difference to the liability of the trustee that the beneficiary may be liable also. Wilson was no doubt a beneficiary in this trust. Profit made after payment of the debts and restoration of the business to a healthy condition would have gone to him. In the same sense a bankrupt is a beneficiary in the trust held by a trustee in bankruptcy, and rare cases have occurred in which a surplus has existed in a bankruptcy and the bankrupt has received it. But the interest of Wilson in this trust makes no difference to the liability of the trustee, who carried on the business for twenty years.

I am unable, on the grounds I have now stated, to concur with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and I have reached my conclusion with regret, for I should be sorry if the defender's kindness in acting as he did should cause him serious loss. I hope it may not do so. We were told during the debate that the estate of Wilson will pay at least 10s. per £1. That makes the case not very important in point of money. But I am of opinion that the pursuers must have decrea

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think the business was carried on by the defender. He says so in various letters, and his statement is in my judgment in accordance with the fact. He was carrying on the business at the time when the goods were ordered of which the price is here sued for. In these circumstances, I hold that the true legal view is that the defender was the purchaser of the goods, and is therefore liable for the price. I therefore agree that the interlocutor ought to be altered.

LORD LEE.—I have no difficulty in assenting to the doctrine that a trustee who, in carrying on a business under such a trust as that now before us, orders goods for the purposes of the business, either personally or by another deriving authority from him, must be liable in payment of the price. Nor have I any difficulty in holding with your Lordships that this trust was acted on for some time by the parties. But I have difficulty on the question whether the account sued for was incurred during a time when the trust-deed really represented the relation in which the defender stood to the pursuers.

The question is, whether the goods charged for in this account were supplied to the defender's order or to the order of anyone authorised by him? The allegation in condescendence 4 is,—“The whole of the said account was incurred with the knowledge and approval of the defender and on his behalf, in his conduct of the said business as trustee for Mr Wilson, and on the order of himself or persons authorised by him.” If that is true, then the defender is liable without doubt. The view of the Lord Ordinary is,—“I think it quite clear that the defender and the late Matthew Wilson never stood towards each other in the relation of principal and agent or master and servant in connection with Wilson's business.” I cannot say that their relations never took that shape, but my difficulty is that there were two periods at which the relation constituted by the trust appears to have been superseeded. The first was in 1870, the second in 1882. I think that the correspondence of 1870 shews that the pursuers accepted the defender's intimation as sufficient notice that the trust was then suspended, and that it was not until the defender agreed to continue the trust that the former relation was resumed. I refer particularly to the letters between 25th August and 13th September 1870, as proving that the trust was suspended at that time. But the question is, whether there was not another suspension of the trust in 1882. A letter from the defender to the pursuers intimating his unwillingness to continue in the trust has been read. This was followed by two letters, dated 28th December 1882 and 5th January 1883, which your Lordship has noticed. In the letter of 5th January the pursuers intimated to Mr Wilson their wish that "your orders in future should be countersigned by Mr Stephenson," and they added, "we think this arrangement is proper and necessary in the interests of Mr Stephenson as well as in yours and our own." What is the meaning of these letters? I think it can only be that any orders not so countersigned by the defender would not be regarded by the pursuers as given with his authority, and I should have thought it incumbent on the pursuers to shew that the orders, the payment of which is sued for in this account, were so countersigned by the defender. But no argument was addressed to us on this point. It was not contended that there was any change in the relations between the pursuers and the defender at this time in point of fact. I therefore cannot dissent from your Lordship's judgment, but I wish to say, that if it had been shewn that these letters were acted upon after January 1883 I might have come to a different conclusion.

No. 7. Oct. 25, 1888.
Ford & Sons v.
Stephenson.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, repelled the defences, and gave decree for the sum £175, 7s. 7d., with expenses.

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—MACK & GRANT, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 8. Oct. 27, 1888.
Smith v.
M'Bride &
Smith.

JAMES SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—J. G. Stewart.
JOSEPH M'BRIDE AND WILLIAM SMITH, Defenders (Appellants).—
M'Lennan.

Partnership—Goodwill of business—Right of partner who has purchased goodwill to exclusive use of firm name.—Smith, one of the partners of Smith & M'Bride, bought the business and goodwill, and carried the business on for three years in his own name. At the end of that time his former partner M'Bride and a person also named Smith, who had entered into partnership with him, began to trade in the same business in the same town, under the name Smith & M'Bride. Held that Smith was entitled to interdict against their trading under that name.

2D DIVISION. James Smith and Joseph M'Bride carried on business in partnership as aerated water manufacturers at Waverley Lane and Sugarhouse Lane, Greenock, and also at Largs, prior to August 1884, under the name of Smith & M'Bride. In that month, their agreement of copartnery having terminated, they advertised for sale "the business of aerated water manufacturing carried on for many years extensively and successfully . . . by Smith & M'Bride . . . together with goodwill, stock in trade, machinery, horses, harness, vans, bottles, bottle-racks, boxes, and whole utensils and outstanding debts."

Thereafter they entered into a minute of agreement, by which it was arranged that the advertisement should be withdrawn, and that Smith should pay and M'Bride accept £300 for the latter's "share and interest in the business." The fourth article of the agreement was,—“Mr Smith gets all that is offered for sale in the advertisement; takes and pays all liabilities of the firm, and gets right to collect all debts due to the firm, and to the goodwill of the business." Thereafter a notice of dissolution signed by both parties was advertised. It stated, inter alia, that Smith had "acquired the said business, with goodwill, machinery, and stock in trade. He will continue to carry on said business in his own name."

No. 8.

Oct. 27, 1888.
Smith v.
M'Bride &
Smith.

James Smith thereafter continued the business in the premises formerly occupied by the firm.

About a month after the dissolution M'Bride began business as an aerated water manufacturer in Nicolson Street, Greenock.

On 24th December 1885 M'Bride, David M'Kelvie, and William Smith (a brother of James) entered into partnership as aerated water manufacturers, under the firm "M'Bride, Smith, & M'Kelvie."

On 27th August 1887 M'Kelvie retired from the firm, and M'Bride & Smith entered into an agreement to carry on the business under the same conditions as those contained in their contract with M'Kelvie, but under the firm "Smith & M'Bride." A notice of M'Kelvie's retirement was advertised in the Gazette. It stated that the "business continues to be carried on by the subscribers, Joseph M'Bride and William Smith, on their own account, under the firm of Smith & M'Bride." M'Bride and William Smith subsequently traded as Smith & M'Bride.

James Smith raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Greenock against Joseph M'Bride and William Smith, "who carry on business as aerated water manufacturers under the style or firm of Smith & M'Bride, aerated water manufacturers, at No. 61 Nicolson Street, Greenock," craving interdict against the defenders as a company or as partners thereof, or as individuals, "trading under the firm name or style of Smith & M'Bride."

The pursuer averred that he continued to carry on the business of his former firm of Smith & M'Bride, "under the style or firm of Smith & M'Bride, and his own name," that his business was still known as that of "Smith & M'Bride," "and that the assumption and use of that style or firm by the defenders will injure him in his business, mislead the public, and cause confusion between the pursuer's and the defenders' businesses. This has already happened."

The defenders denied these averments, and averred that the pursuer carried on business under his own name and in no other, and that he had renounced any right he might have to the exclusive use of the name Smith & M'Bride. With regard to the change in the name of their firm, they stated,—"In consequence of said retirement of Mr M'Kelvie, and of there being no person of the name of M'Kelvie left in the firm, and because of certain re-arrangement of their business and otherwise, the defenders resolved thereafter to change their firm's name into that of Smith & M'Bride. Said firm had no connection whatever with the old and long previously dissolved and defunct firm of Smith & M'Bride, nor was it a continuation in any sense, or a succession in any way, of said old firm, but it was simply adopted because of the individual partners composing said firm having said names."

The pursuer pleaded;—(3) The defender M'Bride, having sold to the pursuer all his right, title, and interest in the stock, plant, and goodwill of said firm of "Smith & M'Bride," is not entitled, either by himself or in conjunction with any other person or persons, to carry on the business or trade of an aerated water manufacturer or aerated water manufacturers, in the locality of Greenock, under the style or firm of "Smith & M'Bride," and interdict should be granted as prayed for.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The pursuer having no right or title to the use or continuation or adoption of the firm of Smith & M'Bride, the prayer of the petition should be refused, with costs. (5) The defenders

No. 8.

Oct. 27, 1888.
Smith v.
M'Bride &
Smith.

being at liberty or in right to assume the name of said firm, or to carry on business under said firm, should be assailable, with costs.

The facts above narrated were admitted, and further probation was renounced.

The Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson), after findings in fact to the effect already stated, found in law "that the defenders are not entitled to assume and use the name of the firm whose business and goodwill the pursuer purchased from the defender M'Bride," and granted interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Moncreiff) affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.†

---

* "NOTE.— . . . When the defenders parted with M'Kelvie, the name of the firm had to be changed, and the omission of M'Kelvie was all that was necessary. Instead of 'M'Bride, Smith, & M'Kelvie' it should thenceforth have been 'M'Bride & Smith.' But instead of that the name of the junior partner has been put first and that of the senior second. Why so? 'Because of certain re-arrangement of their business and otherwise,' say the defenders (art. 4). 'Otherwise' is a very vague and comprehensive word, and if here I take it to mean 'because the name of Smith & M'Bride was already well known in the trade, while that of M'Bride & Smith was new,' I believe I rightly interpret the words and the conduct of the defenders. Their further explanation that the new name 'was simply adopted because of the individual partners composing said firm having said names,' I must regard as scarcely tolerable, if not simply incredible.

"That the assumption of this name by the defenders, and the consequent confusion of a new firm with an older firm represented by the pursuer, is injurious to him, and that he is entitled to be protected from such injury, I cannot doubt."

† "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute's judgment is clearly right. Whatever may be the defenders' legal rights, there can be little doubt as to their animus or intention in adopting the firm of 'Smith & M'Bride,' viz., to obtain any benefit that was to be derived from the name of the old firm. The Sheriff-substitute has explained this so fully that I need add nothing. As to the law of the case, I think that in a question with a partner who has sold his interest in the 'goodwill' of a business it must be held that he loses the right to use the old firm. This is correctly laid down by Lindley on Partnership (4th edition), p. 861,— 'The purchaser of a goodwill of a business acquires the right not only to represent himself as the successor of those who formerly carried it on, but also to prevent other persons from doing the like.' In the case to which he refers (which closely resembles the present), viz., Churton v. Douglas, 1859, Johnson's Chan. Reps., p. 174, there will be found a valuable exposition of the law by Vice-Chancellor Page Wood, which fully supports the statement in the text.

"It is said that the pursuer bound himself not to assume the name of the old firm. I do not so read the notice in the Gazette. That notice means no more than this, that it was the intention of the pursuer to carry on the business in his own name; and I think it is clear that he would have been at least entitled to have added 'Successor of Smith & M'Bride,' if he had thought fit. Even if the pursuer were not entitled to use the old name of 'Smith & M'Bride' (which I do not affirm), it by no means would follow that M'Bride, who was bought out, and had assigned his whole interest in the concern to Smith, was entitled to do so, and represent himself as carrying on the business of the old firm. As to the time which had elapsed without the pursuer using the old firm's name (if this is the case), I think a sufficient explanation is, that until the assumption of the name by the defenders it was quite understood by the public that the pursuer was carrying on the business of the old firm. I therefore think that he is entitled to the protection sought, and that interdict has been rightly granted."

No. 8.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—No one could be interdicted from carrying on business in his own name, or by means of a collocation of his own name with that of a partner. The only exception to this was the case of one fraudulently selling an article which another had long been selling, and taking an unfair advantage of the similarity of name.<sup>1</sup> The defenders were not committing any fraud on the pursuer, who had renounced the opportunity of proving any by renouncing probation. It was clear that the pursuer had never intended to use the name "Smith & M'Bride," though he might have used it when he bought the goodwill of the old firm, for he advertised that he intended to trade under his own name, and had done so from 1884 till he raised the action. He had thus renounced the use of the name, or at least barred himself from objecting to its use by the defenders. His contention must be that because he had once been a partner of a firm, and had bought its goodwill, another firm bearing the same name could never exist. The case of Churton<sup>2</sup> relied on by the pursuer was very different, for there the old firm had gone on with the old business, and Douglas, the defender, had set up a new business, adopting the name of the old firm, and had solicited business from the customers of the old firm.

Oct. 27, 1888.
Smith v.
M'Bride &
Smith.

In answer to the Court defenders' counsel stated that he had no further explanation to give of the change in the order in which the names of the partners appeared in their new firm than that set out on record.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer having purchased the goodwill of Smith & M'Bride was entitled to the use of the name, and to restrain others from using it.<sup>3</sup> He did not admit that he had abandoned the use of that firm name, and he still conducted his business in the premises with which it was associated. In any view the term of four years during which he had carried on business in his own name was not so long as to shew an intention to abandon the right he had purchased to the use of the name Smith & M'Bride.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an application by a person who purchased a going business as an aerated water manufacturer, with its stock and goodwill, in August 1884, to have the person from whom he purchased it, and the firm which that person has now formed, interdicted from trading under the firm's name, the right to which he purchased along with the goodwill. The Sheriff-substitute in his interlocutor of 14th February 1888, after stating the facts that the business was purchased, and that the defenders had assumed the name and were using it in carrying on their business, found in law "that the defenders are not entitled to assume and use the name of the firm whose business and goodwill the pursuer purchased from the defender M'Bride," and he therefore granted interdict. I think that judgment was altogether right in fact and in law. It takes a strong case of right in another and consequent danger of injury to him to justify a Court in restraining any man from conducting his business in his own name. But I think this case is of such a character. Smith & M'Bride is the firm name under which the business was formerly conducted, and, as the advertisement issued when the business was sold bears, "extensively and successfully" conducted. The pursuer Smith, one of the partners, purchased it with

<sup>1</sup> Burgess v. Burgess, March 17, 1853, 3 De Jex, M'Naughton, & Gordon, 896.

<sup>2</sup> Churton v. Douglas, 1859, Johnston's Ch. Rep. 174.

<sup>3</sup> Levy v. Walker, Feb. 5, 1879, 10 Ch. Div. 463 (Lord Justice James), and Churton v. Douglas, supra.

No. 8.
Oct. 27, 1888.
Smith v.
M'Bride &
Smith.

the right to use the firm name. M'Bride, the other partner, assumed two partners, another Smith and a man named M'Kelvie. They set up a similar business in other premises in the same neighbourhood, and though M'Bride had been a partner of Smith & M'Bride, it was within his legal right to do so. The name of the new firm was M'Bride, Smith, & M'Kelvie. That did not answer—M'Kelvie retired and M'Bride & Smith were left. They in August 1887, three years after the sale of the business of Smith & M'Bride to the pursuer inverted the order in which their names had previously appeared, and brought their firm name exactly to that of the original firm. It has appeared to both the Sheriffs that the object of this was to obtain the benefit to be derived from the name of the old firm in the conduct of a business the same as that of the old firm. Now, no answer has been made to that suggestion, no other view of it has been given to us. The obvious reason of the change, in the absence of explanation, is that which the Sheriffs thus brought prominently before the notice of the parties some months ago, and no other explanation is furnished to us. In these circumstances, I think the judgments of the Sheriffs ought to be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

LORD LEE.—I also concur. I think that a man who sells his business with its goodwill cannot derogate from his own grant. It was said for the defenders that the pursuer had abandoned the right he originally had to use the name, and to object to the use of it by anyone else. But I think that the circumstances afford no ground for that contention.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal dismiss the same, affirm the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff appealed against: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

EMSLIE & GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—MILLAR & MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 9.
Oct. 30, 1888.
Marshall v.
King.

MRS CATHERINE MELVILLE SIMPSON OR MARSHALL AND OTHERS,
First Party.—C. J. Guthrie.

JOHN KING AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—C. S. Dickson.

JOHN KING AND OTHERS (Melville's Trustees), Third Parties.—
C. J. Guthrie.

Succession—Vesting—Payment postponed till death of liferenters—Clause of survivorship.—A trustor by his trust-settlement, inter alia, directed his trustees, so soon as they should see fit, to convey certain heritable property to two daughters—his only children—in liferent respectively, and to two grandchildren nominatim and other grandchildren nascituri, equally among them, share and share alike, "any of whom failing, the share or shares of the decessor or decessors to the survivors, equally among them, share and share alike, in fee."

Held that the fee did not vest in the testator's grandchildren or their issue at the testator's death, but that on the death of each daughter the half liferented by her fell to be divided among the testator's grandchildren or their issue then in existence, exclusively.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

By trust-disposition and settlement David Melville, a merchant in Greenock, who died on 30th November 1845, conveyed to John King and others, as trustees, inter alia, heritable estate in Greenock. The seventh purpose of the deed was in these terms:—"In the seventh place, that my said trustees, acceptors or acceptor, survivors or survivor of them, the major number accepting and surviving being a quorum, shall, so soon as they see fit, give, grant, and dispose to and in favour of the said Mrs Martha Melville Simpson and Mrs Catherine Melville or King" (who were his only children), "equally between them in liferent, for their liferent use respectively allienarly, and in the event of any one of them deceasing without leaving lawful issue of her body, the share of deceased to be given and disposed and to belong to the daughter surviving in liferent, for her liferent use allienarly, but excluding the jus mariti of her present husband, or any future husband she may marry; and to the said Catherine Melville Simpson and John King, my grandchildren lawfully born, and other grandchildren to be lawfully born, by my said two daughters, of their present or any future marriage, equally among them, share and share alike, any of whom failing, the share or shares of the deceiver or deceasers to the survivors, equally among them, share and share alike, my whole heritable subjects and estates before described in fee."

Oct. 30, 1888.
Marshall v.
King.

The truster was survived by his widow, who died on 6th May 1859, and by his only children, Mrs Martha Melville or Simpson, wife of David Simpson, residing in Greenock, and Mrs Catherine Melville or King, widow of John King, a physician in Portrush, Ireland.

Mrs Simpson died on 1st December 1886.

At that date there were three surviving grandchildren of the testator, Mrs Marshall, Mrs Fraser, and John King, and two grandchildren, who had predeceased, were represented by their sons, David M. Simpson and John E. M. Simpson. The right of these five persons to equal shares of the estate liferented by Mrs Simpson was not disputed, but a question arose as to the rights of the representatives of Alexander Simpson and David King, two grandchildren who had died in 1853 and 1863 without issue, to share in the distribution.

This special case was accordingly presented to the Court.

The first parties were Mrs Marshall and others, who maintained "that the vesting of the properties did not take place until the death of Mrs Martha Melville or Simpson, or otherwise until a period subsequent to the deaths of Alexander Simpson in 1853 and David King in 1863, and that they should be divided into five equal shares, one of which should be conveyed to each of the said Mrs Marshall, Mrs Fraser, John King, David Melville Simpson, and John Ewing Melville Simpson."

The second parties were John King, the heir of the testator's grandchild David King, who died without issue, and David Melville Simpson, the heir of the testator's grandchild Alexander Simpson, who also died without issue, who maintained "that vesting took place a morte testatoris, or otherwise at a period prior to the deaths of the said Alexander Simpson in 1853 and David King in 1863, and that the subjects should be divided into seven shares, one of which should be conveyed to each of the said Mrs Marshall, Mrs Fraser, John King, David Melville Simpson, and John Ewing Melville Simpson, leaving two shares to be dealt with as follows:—One to be conveyed to the said John King as heir of his deceased brother David King, and the other share to be conveyed to David Melville Simpson as heir of his father, who was heir of conquest of Alexander Simpson."

The third parties were the surviving trustees acting under the truster's settlement and codicil.

The questions of law were as follows:—"(1) Did the fee of the said Greenock properties vest in the testator's grandchildren or their issue at the testator's death, or otherwise at a period prior to the deaths of the said Alexander Simpson in 1853, and David King in 1863? or was vest-

No. 9.
Oct. 30, 1888.
Marshall v.
King.

ing postponed till the death of his daughter Mrs Martha Melville or Simpson, or otherwise till a period subsequent to the deaths of Alexander Simpson in 1853 and David King in 1863? 2. Do the said Greenock properties fall to be divided into five equal shares, one of which is to be conveyed to each of Mrs Marshall, Mrs Fraser, John King, David Melville Simpson, and John Ewing Melville Simpson, or into seven equal shares, which fall to be conveyed as follows:—One share each to Mrs Marshall, Mrs Fraser, and John Ewing Melville Simpson, and two shares to be conveyed to each of John King and David Melville Simpson, or in what other proportions or shares do the same fall to be divided among the beneficiaries?"

Argued for first parties;—The question here was what was to be done with the shares of the truster's estate, which he undoubtedly destined to the two grandchildren, Alexander Simpson and David King, who died respectively in 1853 and 1863. Had the first part of the clause stood alone there might have been vesting a morte testatoris. But it was followed by a clause of survivorship, and the effect of such a clause where there was an interposed liferent, was absolutely settled by a series of cases.<sup>1</sup> It postponed vesting till the period of distribution. Vesting, then, was postponed till the death of each of the truster's daughters, as regarded the half of their father's estate liferented by them respectively. Mrs King was still alive, but Mrs Simpson died in 1886, and her share therefore being set free by her death fell to be divided among the whole grandchildren of the testator or their issue then in existence.

Argued for the second parties;—The trustees were directed, as soon as they saw fit, to convey the estate in liferent and in fee respectively. It could not be said that because they did not in fact convey vesting was postponed. There was no case to be found where it had been held that such a discretion to the trustees affected the period of vesting. The words "any of whom failing" simply meant "any of whom failing prior to my death." An interposed liferent did not necessarily postpone vesting. In many cases it had been held that where there was a destination over, vesting was a morte testatoris. The shares, then, of Alexander Simpson and David King must be held to have vested in them at the truster's death, and their representatives were entitled to participate in the division of the share of the truster's estate set free by Mrs Simpson's death.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The clause requiring construction in this settlement is that which occurs in the seventh head of the deed. In construing this clause I do not think that we get much light from other portions of the deed, or even from the codicil. The testator contemplated generally that his two children, who were both daughters, should have the liferent of the properties mentioned, and that the fee should be equally divided amongst the children of those daughters. There were two grandchildren alive at the making of the settlement, one a daughter of Mrs Simpson, and the other a son of Mrs King, and they are mentioned in the clause as the parties to whom the fee of the properties is to be conveyed. The testator also makes provision for grandchildren nascituri, and they are obviously intended to be in the same position as those grandchildren already in existence for whom the special provision is made. The clause is expressed in this way :—"My trustees shall, so soon as they see fit, give, grant, and dispo<sup>se</sup> to and in favour of the said Mrs Martha Melville or Simpson and Mrs Catherine Melville or King, equally between them in liferent, for their

<sup>1</sup> Young et al. v. Robertson et al., Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 314, per Lord Westbury, Ld. Ch., p. 319; Snell v. White and Others, May 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 745, 44 Scot. Jur. 198; M'Alpine, &c., March 20, 1883, 10 R. 837.

No. 9.

Oct. 30, 1888.
Marshall v. King.

liferent use respectively alienably, and in the event of any one of them deceasing without lawful issue of her body, the share of deceased to be given and disposed and to belong to the daughter surviving in liferent for her liferent use alienably." Now, it may be as well to stop there for the purpose of disposing of this part of the clause. Mrs Simpson died in 1886, but she left issue, and therefore this part of the clause did not take effect: her liferent expired and did not transmit to her sister. That part of the clause then is out of the case altogether. The clause then proceeds to expressly exclude the jus mariti of any husband the surviving daughter might marry, and thereafter goes on to give the fee to the two grandchildren already in existence in these terms :—"To the said Catherine Melville Simpson and John King, my grandchildren lawfully born, and other grandchildren to be lawfully born by my said two daughters of their present or any future marriage equally among them, share and share alike, any of whom failing, the share or shares of the decessor or decessors, to the survivors equally among them, share and share alike."

Now, one party contends that the fee of this estate vested in the grandchildren a morte testatoris, and it is maintained that the effect of this is that all the grandchildren who either were in existence at the time of the testator's death, or came into existence afterwards, are entitled equally to share in the fee of the estate. That, it appears to me, is to ignore altogether the most important part of the provision—the clause of survivorship—which is expressed in terms impossible to construe but in one way,—“Any of whom failing” necessarily means any one of the grandchildren whether named in the deed or afterwards born. If any one fails, then his or her share goes to the survivors. It is needless to say that the grandchildren to be born could not very well fail by predeceasing the testator. The clause can then neither be applied nor construed in that sense. It must be construed as applying to those grandchildren who may fail at some other period than the death of the testator. When vesting did not take place at the death of the testator, the next inquiry is what is the period of distribution? If the term of vesting is not the date of the death of the testator, it is difficult to find any other period of vesting except the period of distribution, if we except some special cases where the testator has either expressly or by implication assigned a term of vesting other than the period of distribution. Such cases have occurred, but where no other period is suggested the term of vesting is either (1) the death of the testator, or (2) the period of distribution. Now, it appears to me that to take the death of the testator as the term of vesting is impossible and inconsistent with the undoubted nature and scope of the provision in the deed, and against the plain words of the clause.

The next thing accordingly is to consider what is the period of distribution, and I need hardly say that there may be more than one, as part of the estate may be distributed at one period and part at another. It seems to me that the result is that one portion of the estate is set free for distribution on the death of the first of the two liferentices. Mrs Simpson died in 1886, and that was the end of her liferent. She left children, and therefore the right of her sister to her liferent by survivorship did not come into existence. Accordingly, the liferent of Mrs King remains where it was, and the liferent of Mrs Simpson has

No. 9.

Oct. 30, 1888.
Marshall v.
King.

been extinguished. Well then, it appears that there is nothing in the deed to prevent immediate distribution of that half of the estate liferented by Mrs Simpson, and accordingly by the necessary operation of the deed the period of distribution of that half of the estate is her death, and the period of distribution of the other half is postponed because of Mrs King's liferent. So long as Mrs King is alive, there can be no distribution of her half of the estate.

I am of opinion therefore that the parties claiming here are entitled to have a distribution as grandchildren in equal shares among them—that is per capita—of the one-half of the estate set free by the expiry of Mrs Simpson's liferent.

LORD MURE.—I agree with what your Lordship has stated, that at the date of the death of Mrs Simpson one half of the estate in question was set free for distribution in terms of the seventh purpose of the settlement, and that it is to go in equal shares to the grandchildren of the testator, being the families of his two daughters; and in that view I think that our answer to the first question ought to shew that Mrs King's child is to take a share with the children of Mrs Simpson.

The main question we have to deal with is one of vesting, and they are often puzzling. I am inclined to think that there was here, in one sense, a kind of vesting a morte testatoris—that is to say, that the fee vested in the families of the two daughters on the grandchildren being born. The fee was destined to them as a class, though no division could take place until after the death of the liferentrix, as there was no absolute vesting in individuals. That view, however, makes no difference as to the parties amongst whom the distribution now falls to be made. As to who these are, I agree with your Lordship.

LORD SHAND.—The trustees are directed by the testator in his deed to dis-pone his heritable estate to and in favour of his two daughters equally in life-rent; and I think it is clear from the terms in which this direction is made, that on the death of one of the two liferentrics leaving issue there was no access-ion of liferent to the other, but that one half of the estate became liable then to distribution. The question is how that half is to be distributed. The clause dealing with the fee directs that the conveyance is to be “to the said Catherine Melville Simpson and John King, my grandchildren, lawfully born; and other grandchildren to be lawfully born by my said two daughters of their present or any future marriage, equally among them, share and share alike.” If the clause had stopped there, there would have been vesting a morte testatoris, subject only to this, that any child coming into existence after the death of the testa-tor would have been entitled to share with those in existence before that event. And, in that case, I should have come to the conclusion that the property vested in each child, although his share might have been diminished by others subse-quently coming into existence. That would have been a vesting subject to a possible partial defeasance of the right. It is contended that this is the result of the deed. That view is, in my opinion, unsound however, because we have a survivorship clause of the ordinary kind following the clause which I have just read, and to this effect,—“any of whom failing, the share or shares of the de-ceaser or deceasers to the survivors equally among them, share and share alike.” There is to be an equal division of the estate, but the share or shares of any one who has died—that is, without issue, because the deed was granted by the grandfather as a provision to children and grandchildren—are to go to the survivors share and share alike. I have heard no argument against the propriety of giving to that clause the usual interpretation which a clause of survivorship received in the case of Young v. Robertson. Accordingly I am of opinion that, as there were two children who did not survive the first liferentrix and who left no children, their shares accresced to the others under the clause of survivorship, and that therefore there are only five persons to take shares.

No. 9.

Oct. 30, 1888.
Marshall v.
King.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. There are only two possible terms of vesting. It might have been a morte testatoris or at the period of distribution. Now, looking at the terms of the clause of survivorship, I think there was no term at which it could have taken place but the period of distribution. One half of the estate being now set free for distribution by the death of one of the children, I am of opinion that it has now vested in the surviving grandchildren. As to the other half, there has been no vesting. This view suggests no difficulty as regards legal considerations, because the trustees hold the fee for whichever of the grandchildren shall survive the period of distribution. It is possible that none of the grandchildren may survive that period, in which case that purpose of the deed will lapse. If we were dealing here with such a question as occurred in the case of Snell v. White, where there was a direct conveyance by the testator, the presumption of a fiduciary fee might become necessary to satisfy the legal rule that a fee cannot be in pendente, but that would be just because there had been no trustees named by the testator himself. So also if the conveyance were now to be made by the trustees in the terms of the seventh clause of this deed, it would be necessary to presume a fiduciary fee in the daughters. But in this case trustees have been appointed to hold the fee for the purposes of the trust-deed, and one of those purposes is to make payment among the surviving grandchildren of the testator when the period of distribution arrives, so that no difficulties of that kind occur.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“(1) Find and declare that the fee of the Greenock properties did not vest in the testator's grandchildren or their issue at the testator's death, but that on the death in 1886 of his daughter Mrs Martha Melville or Simpson one half of the said properties fell to be distributed among the whole grandchildren of the testator or their issue then existing, and that the other half of the said properties has not vested in the grandchildren or their issue now in existence, but will fall to be distributed, on the death of Mrs King, among the whole grandchildren or their issue then in existence: (2) Find and declare that the said Greenock properties fall to be divided into five equal shares, one of which is to be conveyed to each of Mrs Marshall, Mrs Fraser, John King, David Melville Simpson, and John Ewing Melville Simpson, and decern,” &c.

SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN M'PHEDRON AND JOHN CURRIE, Petitioners.—Deas.
JOHN M'CALLUM AND OTHERS, Respondents.—C. S. Dickson.

No. 10.

Oct. 31, 1888.

Ship—Arrestment—Recall of arrestment—Caution or consignment for expenses.—In a petition at the instance of the owners of a ship praying the Court and Currie v. to recall arrestments laid on the ship upon the dependence of an action against M'Callum.

No. 10. them for payment of £176, and to prohibit any further arrestment on the dependence of the same action, the Court (following Stewart v. Macbeth & Gray, 10 R. 382) recalled the arrestments, and prohibited further arrestments as prayed for on the petitioners finding caution for £200 or consigning that sum.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Phedron
and Currie v.
M'Callum.
1ST DIVISION.
M.

THIS was a petition by John M'Phedron and John Currie, owners of the steamship "Easdale," of Glasgow.

The petitioners stated that on 3d October 1888 a summons containing a precept of arrestment was served upon them for payment of the sum of £176, 8s. 11d. at the instance of John M'Callum and others, the owners of the steamship "Hebridean," of Glasgow, the respondents in the petition; and that on the 15th October following the ship, which was lying in Irvine harbour, was arrested and dismantled.

That the petitioners had offered to consign the sum sued for in the joint names of the parties' agents or in the hands of the Clerk of Court, to abide the issue of the action, which they proposed to defend.

That the "Easdale" was a coasting steamer carrying on trade for the most part between ports in the West Highlands of Scotland, and was under present engagement to carry cargo.

That the petitioners were in consequence of the arrestments suffering loss and damage.

The petitioners therefore prayed the Court "to recall the arrestments which have been used upon the dependence of the said summons of the said steamship 'Easdale,' and to prohibit and discharge any further arrestment from being used upon the dependence of the said summons, and that upon consignation in the hands of the Clerk of Court of the said sum of £176, 8s. 11d."

The respondents opposed the petition and contended that, as the condition of the recall of arrestments being granted, the petitioners should be ordered to find caution not only for the sum sued for, but also for expenses.<sup>1</sup>

The petitioners replied that the ship was registered in Glasgow, traded regularly with the West Highlands, and was therefore subject at any time to the jurisdiction of the Court. There was no allegation of impecuniosity or that the petitioners were vergentes ad inopiam. Neither of the petitioners were foreigners, both being resident within the jurisdiction of the Court. The claim was illiquid and disputed, and the sum offered for consignation was in the circumstances fair and reasonable.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think we ought to follow the precedent in the case of Stewart v. Macbeth & Gray.<sup>1</sup> No doubt we have a discretion in the matter, but still I think regard must be shewn to the previous practice of the Court. I am for recalling the arrestments on the petitioners finding caution for £200, or consigning that sum.

LORD MURE.—I agree.

LORD ADAM.—And I also, and I may say that I am glad we have a case to follow.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the arrestments therein mentioned, and prohibit and discharge the use of further arrestments as prayed for upon the petitioners finding caution, in common form, to the extent of £200, or upon their consigning that sum in the hands of the Clerk of Court, and decern."

<sup>1</sup> Stewart v. Macbeth & Gray, Dec. 19, 1882, 10 R. 382.

FODD, SIMPSON, & MARWICK, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Phedron
and Currie v.
M'Callum.

MARY M'ELMAIL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Sir Charles Pearson—Kennedy. No. 11.
ROBERT STARK LUNDIE AND OTHERS (Lundie's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Balfour—J. A. Reid.
JOHN LUNDIE JUNIOR, Defender (Reclaimer).—Low.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

Trust—Directions to trustees—Power of trustees to make or withhold payment—Vesting—Husband and Wife—Divorce for adultery—Wife's legal provision.
—A truster in the second purpose of his trust-settlement directed his trustees to pay an annuity to his widow, and to set apart a capital sum to secure it, which sum he directed "on the death of my said spouse" to be divided into six equal shares, of which two were to be paid over to two of his sons, but in the case of the third son, J. L., the trustees were to hold one share in trust for his use and behoof, and they "shall retain the same, or such part thereof as they may think proper, in their own hands for such period after the death of my said spouse as they may deem expedient, and they shall pay the said share to him by such instalments or in such portions and at such times as they may think fit, but so long as the said share, or any part thereof, shall not be paid over to my said son, the trustees shall pay to him the interest of such share or part thereof remaining unpaid up . . . aye and until the said share be wholly paid over to him and discharged." The other three shares he directed to be held for his three daughters in liferent and their children in fee. In the fifth purpose, he directed his trustees to apportion and divide the residue of his estate into six shares, repeating the above directions contained in the second purpose, with the exception of directing that payment of the shares was to be made "so soon as my estate shall be realised." The deed then provided,—"Declaring that the fore-said provisions to my said sons and the issue of my three daughters shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof."

J. L. married, but was divorced by his wife, who thereupon claimed her jus relictæ out of her husband's estate, to which it was admitted that she was entitled.

In an action by her to have it declared that that estate included at the date of the dissolution of the marriage her husband's shares of his father's estate, held for his behoof by the trustees, it was held, on a construction of the deed, (1) that the terms of payment referred to by the testator in fixing the dates of vesting were in regard to the second purpose the death of his widow, and in regard to the fifth purpose the realisation of his estate, and that the special discretion given to the trustees to postpone payment of J. L.'s shares did not suspend vesting in his case; and (2) that J. L.'s shares under the second and fifth purposes had vested in him and formed, at the date of the dissolution of the marriage, part of his moveable estate, subject to jus relictæ.

JOHN LUNDIE, a pawnbroker in Glasgow, died in the end of July 1869, 1ST DIVISION. survived by his widow and by six children, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 23d July 1869. Lord Kinnear.
B.

In the second purpose of the deed he directed his trustees, Robert Stark Lundie and others, to pay an annuity of £60 to his widow, Mrs Elizabeth Stark or Lundie, and to lay aside or invest a sufficient capital sum to provide for its due payment, "which capital sum shall, upon the death of my said spouse, be divided into six equal shares or portions, and my said trustees shall pay over one share thereof to my son the said Robert Stark Lundie, and one share thereof to my son James Buchanan Lundie; and my said trustees shall hold one share thereof in trust for the use and

No. 11.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

behoof of my son John Lundie junior, and shall retain the same, or such part thereof as they may think proper, in their own hands, for such period after the death of my said spouse as they may deem expedient, and they shall pay the said share to him by such instalments, or in such portions, and at such times as they may think fit; but so long as the said share, or any part thereof, shall not be paid over to my said son, my trustees shall pay to him the interest or annual produce of such share, or part thereof, so remaining unpaid up, and that half-yearly, by equal portions at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday in each year, aye and until the said share be wholly paid over to him and discharged." He then directed his trustees to "hold one share of the said capital sum in trust for the use and behoof of my daughter, Mrs Elizabeth Lundie or Thornhill, wife of William Thornhill, hatter, Argyle Street, Glasgow, in liferent for her liferent use allenary, and her lawful issue, equally between them, if more than one, share and share alike, in fee." In similar terms the trustees were directed to hold the two remaining shares for the truster's other two daughters, Mary Lundie and Jessie Lundie.

In the fifth purpose the truster disposed of the residue of his estate in the following terms:—"I ordain my said trustees to apportion and divide the whole of the free residue and remainder of my said heritable and moveable means, property, and estate, under deduction of expenses of management, incidental expenses, and all expenses in connection with this trust, into six equal shares, and so soon as my estate shall be realised, they shall pay over one share of said residue to my son the said Robert Stark Lundie: But declaring that the said Robert Stark Lundie shall account for and pay to my said trustees the sums of money due by him to me, as the same shall appear from my books or vouchers or be otherwise ascertained by my said trustees; and my trustees shall pay over one share of said residue to my son the said James Buchanan Lundie; and my said trustees shall hold one share thereof in trust for the use and behoof of my son John Lundie junior, and shall retain the same, or such part thereof as they may think proper, in their own hands for such period after the realisation of my estate as they may deem expedient, and they shall pay the said share to him by such instalments, or in such portions, and at such times as they may think fit; but so long as the said share or any part thereof shall not be paid over to my said son, my trustees shall pay to him the interest or annual produce of such share or part thereof so remaining unpaid up, and that half-yearly by equal portions at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday in each year, aye and until the said share be wholly paid over to him and discharged." The trustees were then directed to hold one share of the said residue in trust for the use and behoof of each of the truster's three daughters, for their liferent use allenary, and their lawful issue, equally between them, if more than one, share and share alike, in fee, in terms similar to those used in the second purpose above quoted. There was this further provision,—“Declaring that the foresaid provisions to my said three sons and to the issue of my said three daughters shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof: And, accordingly, upon the death of any of my said sons or daughters without leaving lawful issue, the said provisions of such of them so dying without leaving lawful issue, shall accresce and be paid to and divided equally amongst my surviving sons in fee, and my surviving daughters in liferent and their issue respectively in fee.”

John Lundie, the truster's third son, known as John Lundie junior, married Mary M'Elmail on 10th February 1870.

On 22d February 1887 Mrs Lundie obtained decree of divorce against her husband on the ground of adultery, and became entitled in consequence to her legal rights of terce and jus relictæ out of his estate, just as No. 11.

if the marriage had been at that date dissolved by his death.

On the death of Mr Lundie senior his widow claimed her legal rights out of his estate, and the claim was admitted and settled by the trustees, as also was a claim by one of the daughters for legitim. The whole interest of John Lundie junior in his father's estate under the second purpose amounted to about £6600, as at the date of his father's death. The trustees, with a view of starting him in business, had from time to time paid him on account of this capital about £1900. The balance of his share was, with the other trust-funds, retained by the trustees at the date of the decree of divorce.

Oct. 31, 1888.
McElmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

Mrs Lundie brought this action against the surviving and accepting and assumed trustees of Mr Lundie senior and against her husband to have it found and declared that "on the dissolution of the marriage between her and the said John Lundie, defender, by decree of divorce, in respect of his adultery, obtained before our said Lords, at her instance against him, dated the 22d day of February 1887, she became and is entitled to her legal provisions of terce and jus relictæ out of the estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to the said John Lundie, defender; and that his said estate included and includes the share or shares of the trust-estate of the said deceased John Lundie carried to the other defenders, as trustees foresaid, by the said deceased John Lundie's trust-disposition and settlement, which share or shares are thereby, and particularly by the second and fifth purposes thereof, provided to and appointed to be held for the use and behoof of the said John Lundie, defender, therein designed John Lundie junior, and the profits, interests, or annual produce thereof, and all right, title, and interest in the estate of the deceased John Lundie subsisting, as at the said dissolution of the said marriage, in the said John Lundie, defender." The summons then contained conclusions for count, reckoning, and payment of £3000; "and, in the event of the said defenders claiming and being found entitled, and resolving to postpone payment of the amount due to the pursuer in respect of her legal rights as aforesaid out of the defender John Lundie's share or shares of the said estate of the deceased John Lundie, or any part thereof, or payment of the said share or shares, or any part thereof, then until the said amount due to the pursuer be wholly paid to and discharged by her, to make payment to the pursuer of one-half, or other proportion as may be determined, of the interest or annual produce of the said share or shares, or any part thereof, remaining unpaid as from the said 22d day of February 1887"; then followed conclusions against John Lundie junior, personally, for count, reckoning, and payment of £3500.

Separate defences were lodged by the trustees and by John Lundie junior.

The trustees maintained that, looking to the directions of the truster in the fifth purpose of the deed, John Lundie's share in his father's estate had not vested in him at the date of the dissolution of his marriage. They declared themselves willing to pay over the half of the income of the sum of £4700 which they retained in their hands under the second purpose of the trust, but they refused to allow the pursuer to participate in the capital.

John Lundie junior averred that he was willing to pay the pursuer year by year one-half of his income, although he had not succeeded in inducing the trustees to advance a sufficient sum from his share of his father's estate to enable him to settle with her.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having become entitled, on the dissolution of her marriage with the defender John Lundie in respect of

No. 11.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

the latter's adultery, to terce and jus relictæ out of his estate, including his interest in his said father's estate, is entitled to declarator as craved. (2) The share or shares of the defender John Lundie in the trust-estate held by the other defenders under the provisions of the trust-deed, and also in respect of the funds set free by legal claims as aforesaid, being vested in him at the date of dissolution of his said marriage, are subject to the legal rights of the pursuer, as if the said marriage had been then dissolved by his death. (3) The defenders Lundie's trustees having intromitted with, and now holding, the said share or shares, are bound to produce accounts or statements shewing the amount thereof, and make payment, or in default of production, to make payment as concluded for, with expenses. (4) In the event of the trustees being found entitled to retain the said share or shares, the pursuer is entitled to termly payment of half the income, or a sum equivalent thereto, of the said share or shares, as fixed at the said date of dissolution, during the trustees' retention thereof. (5) The defender John Lundie being liable in payment of the pursuer's legal provisions, should be ordained to produce accounts of his estate, and make payment, or in default of production, make payment as concluded for, with expenses.

The trustees pleaded ;—(3) The share of the defender John Lundie in the trust-estate administered by the present defenders not having vested, they are entitled to absolvitor. (4) The pursuer having no higher right than the defender John Lundie in the trust-estate administered by the present defenders, they ought to be assoilzied. (5) The present defenders being bound to exercise the discretion conferred on them by the settlement, and having resolved to retain the balance of capital of the other defender's share, are entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions for count, reckoning, and payment.

On 23d February 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinneir) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds and declares, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and appoints the defenders John Lundie's trustees to lodge an account, shewing the amount in their hands of the defender John Lundie's share of the trust-estate of the deceased John Lundie, and that quam primum."*

---

* "NOTE.—I do not understand it to be disputed that on the divorce of a husband for adultery the wife has right to her legal or conventional provisions in the same manner as if the husband had died. It follows that the pursuer is entitled to claim her share of the defender's moveable estate in name of jus relictæ. The only question is, whether the defender John Lundie's share of his father's estate, in the hands of the other defenders, his father's trustees, is vested in him so as to form part of his moveable estate.

"It is maintained that nothing vests in him under his father's will except such portions of his share as the trustees may from time to time think fit to pay to him in the exercise of their discretion.

"I do not think this a sound construction. The trustees are directed to divide the estate on the death of the widow, and to hold one share 'for the use and behoof' of John Lundie from the period of division. They are to retain John Lundie's share for such time as they may deem expedient, and to pay it by such instalments as they may think fit. But the interest of the portion retained by the trustees is to be paid to him 'until the said share shall be wholly paid over to him and discharged.' Sooner or later, therefore, the whole is to be paid to him, and to him alone. There is no destination over with regard to any part, and in the event of his death before the whole has been paid the unpaid portion must go to his representatives. No one could take it except through him. It is true that it is declared that the provisions to the testator's sons and daughters shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment. But that must in my opinion be referred to the term of

The trustees reclaimed, and argued ;—On a sound construction of the trust-deed John Lundie junior's share of the residue of his father's estate had not vested in him so as to form part of his moveable estate at the date of the dissolution of his marriage. The truster had disapproved of his conduct, and had given the trustees such an ample discretion as to payment of his share of the residue as made it obvious that he intended that the period of payment as regarded him should be different from that in the cases of his two brothers. The trustees were directed to pay when and in what shares they thought fit—all at once, or after a lapse—no term at all was fixed by the truster. Indeed, no term could be fixed, because the trustees were to consider it from time to time. This discretion they had acted upon, making such payments as they thought expedient. It could not be said that in these circumstances John Lundie junior's whole shares had vested. It had been held that such a discretion suspended vesting.<sup>1</sup> If there was any doubt about the matter it was set at rest by the terms of the vesting-clause. The phrase "respective terms of payment thereof" clearly shewed that the truster contemplated different periods of vesting for different portions of his estate. In the cases relied on by the pursuer there was only an accidental or capricious delay in payment. Then, again, in the clause declaring that so long as John Lundie's share was not paid over to him, the trustees were to pay him the interest of it until the share was wholly discharged, the payment of any part of the share was coincident with the vesting of that part. Quoad the whole share, if the trustees did not exercise the powers of payment, he was to be a liferenter, but he might become a fiar if he was ever paid in full. [LORD ADAM.—Suppose John Lundie junior contracted debt, and a creditor brought an action of furthcoming seeking to get at the money in the hands of the trustees, quid juris ?] The case of Chambers' Trustees<sup>2</sup> was in point, and was a fortiori. There there was a general vesting in all the children, and the House of Lords held that the power of retention in the trustees prevented the estate being attached by such a creditor. Here the power to retain came first. The widow was in no better position than a creditor who had taken means to attach. If John Lundie had assigned, could the creditor assignee have forced payment when Lundie himself could not ? The former would have had to take the cedent's right tantum et tale as it stood in the cedent. Any vesting, then, was of such a qualified nature that nothing in the nature of a furthcoming could have been effectual.

Argued for the pursuer ;—There was one period of vesting as regarded John Lundie junior's share, and that was at the realisation of the estate, or at least when it could be divided into six shares by the trustees.

payment fixed by the testator himself. The trustees are empowered to pay to John Lundie at the same time as to the other sons. They are also authorised for his benefit to retain his share, or a part of it, and pay it by instalments. But that cannot be construed into a power to withhold it absolutely from him and his representatives. It is unnecessary to consider whether the discretion of the trustees could be effectually exercised against creditors during the lifetime of the beneficiary. It is certain that if the right has vested it can be of no effect against his representatives after his death, and the pursuer is placed by the divorce in precisely the same position as if she were a widow claiming jus relictae on the death of her husband. The principle laid down in Beattie v. Johnston, 5 Macph. 340, and in the later case of Harvie, appears to me to be directly applicable."

<sup>1</sup> Smith's Trustees v. Smith, &c., July 11, 1883, 10 R. 1144.

<sup>2</sup> Smiths v. Chambers' Trustees, Nov. 9, 1877, 5 R. 97, rev. April 15, 1878, ibidem H. of L. 151.

No. 11. They had no power to withhold his share, but only a discretion given them as to the term of payment, for reasons which were personal to John Lundie junior, and which would be at an end at his death. The interest of his share retained by them was to be paid to him "until the share shall be wholly discharged." If he died before the whole was paid the unpaid portion must go to his representatives. The clause as to payment was indeed as imperative as the clause of retention. It was said that the vesting-clause shewed that the truster contemplated different terms of vesting for different children, and that the discretionary power to withhold John Lundie junior's share shewed his desire to defer vesting in his case. That involved the idea that his share only vested at the times the money was actually paid over to him by instalments, and this construction was not familiar, indeed it was contrary to the current of decision.<sup>1</sup> Smith v. Chambers differed toto celo from this case. In the House of Lords the deed in that case was read as giving a power to the trustees to re-settle the shares pendente lite, with a fee to the children. That was different from a direction to pay the capital by instalments. There was here no question as to what was the effect as against creditors of a power to cut down the fee. The manifest solution was that the testator had in his mind more than one term of payment. These were—1st, The widow's death, as regarded the capital sum set apart to meet her annuity; 2d, their mother's death, as regarded the fee to be taken by the daughters' children; 3d, the realisation of the estate as regarded the sons' shares of the residue. The very words "aye and until" shewed that the truster intended a temporary postponement only.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action was the wife of the defender John Lundie junior. The marriage was dissolved on the 22d February 1887, the pursuer obtaining decree of divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery. The effect of this was, of course, to entitle her to her legal rights—that is to say, to her right of terce and jus relictæ,—in the same way as if her husband was naturally dead. There is indeed no question about this, but she contends that one great part, if not the whole, of her husband's moveable estate at the dissolution of her marriage was his right and interest in the trust-estate of his father, held and administered by the other defenders, the trustees; and she seeks to have it found and declared that she became entitled to her terce and jus relictæ by the decree of divorce, and that her husband's estate "included and includes the share or shares of the trust-estate of the said deceased John Lundie carried to the other defenders, as trustees foresaid, by the said deceased John Lundie's trust-disposition and settlement, which share or shares are thereby, and particularly by the second and fifth purposes thereof, provided to and appointed to be held for the use and behoof of the said John Lundie, defender, therein designed John Lundie junior, and the profits, interests or annual produce thereof, and all right, title, and interest in the estate of the deceased John Lundie subsisting, as at the said dissolution of the said marriage, in the said John Lundie defender."

Now, the Lord Ordinary has decerned in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and the trustees have reclaimed against his Lordship's judgment, on the ground that at the dissolution of the marriage by the decree of divorce no part of Mr John Lundie junior's right in the estate of his father had vested, and therefore that it formed no portion of his moveable estate. No. 11.

<sup>1</sup> Leighton v. Leighton, March 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 561; Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter, Feb. 9, 1888, 15 R. 399, per Lord President, p. 406; Ferrier v. Ferrier, May 18, 1872, 10 Macph. 711; Sutherland's Trustees v. Clarkson, Oct. 29, 1874, 2 R. 46; Scott, &c. v. Scott's Executrix, Jan. 27, 1877, 4 R. 384.

The question depends upon the construction of the trust-deed of Mr John Lundie the elder. It contains several clauses which must be referred to in order that the question may be solved. Mr Lundie provided among other things an annuity to his widow, and directed that a capital sum should be set apart to secure it, which capital sum he further directed "shall upon the death of my said spouse, be divided into six equal shares or portions, and my said trustees shall pay over one share thereof to my son the said Robert Stark Lundie, and one share thereof to my son James Buchanan Lundie; and my said trustees shall hold one share thereof in trust for the use and behoof of my son John Lundie junior, and shall retain the same, or such part thereof as they may think proper, in their own hands for such period after the death of my said spouse as they may deem expedient, and they shall pay the said share to him by such instalments, or in such portions, and at such times as they may think fit; but so long as the said share, or any part thereof, shall not be paid over to my said son, my trustees shall pay to him the interest or annual produce of such share, or part thereof so remaining unpaid up, and that half-yearly by equal portions at the term of Martinmas and Whitsunday in each year, aye and until the said share be wholly paid over to him and discharged." The truster then directs one share of the capital sum to be held for a married daughter, Mrs Thornhill, another for another unmarried daughter, and the sixth and remaining share for his third unmarried daughter; but there is provision in the cases of the daughters that the shares are to be to them in liferent and to their children in fee. This portion of the estate then fell to be divided into shares on the death of the widow, and at that time the proceeds of the security, or whatever it might be, was to be paid over, so far as regards two of his sons, but was to be held by the trustees for his third son, John Lundie junior. In the fifth purpose of the trust-deed the truster gives directions as regards the disposal of the residue of his estate, and repeats in terms the same provisions. He orders the trustees to apportion and divide the residue into six shares, "and so soon as my estate shall be realised they shall pay over one share of said residue to my son the said Robert Stark Lundie, . . . and my trustees shall pay over one share of said residue to my son the said James Buchanan Lundie; and my said trustees shall hold one share thereof in trust for the use and behoof of my son John Lundie junior," and then the clause proceeds in the same words as were used in the second clause of the deed dealing with his share of the capital to be set free by the widow's death. The two elder sons are to have immediate payment, and John Lundie junior is to have his share held in trust for him.

Now, although all this does not throw much light upon the question of vesting, it is necessary to keep the precise provisions of these two clauses in view in dealing with the important clause regarding the vesting of the different interests. That clause runs thus,—“Declaring that the foresaid provisions to my said three sons and to the issue of my said three daughters shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof; and accordingly upon the death of any of my said sons or daughters without leaving lawful issue, the said provisions of such of them so dying without leaving lawful issue shall accresce and be paid to and divided equally amongst my surviving sons in fee and my surviving daughters in liferent and their issue respectively in fee.”

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

No. 11.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

There are two things to be attended to here,—first, to ascertain what precisely the testator has assigned here as the term or terms of vesting ; and second, what is the effect of the death of any of the sons or daughters dying without issue before vesting takes place. As regards the latter, there cannot be much room for doubt that if before vesting takes place any of them die without leaving issue there is accretion to the survivors. But the words requiring particular construction are, “declaring that the foressaid provisions to my said three sons and to the issue of my said three daughters shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof.”

Now, in the first place, it is quite clear that the testator had in his mind more than one term of payment, and also that these terms of payment were applicable either to different persons or to different portions of the estate. That is the idea suggested by the word “respectively.” We must therefore endeavour to ascertain what are the respective terms of payment as regards the subjects and objects of the gift in the prior clause of the deed. The trustees seem to try to bring their contention to this: that in so far as John Lundie junior is concerned, there can be no term of payment except the precise time at which the money actually passes out of the hands of the trustees into the hands of John Lundie junior, and therefore that every instalment paid under the direction of the previous clause is a separate term of payment. It appears to me that, prima facie, the expression “term of payment” refers to something the testator had already fixed by the provisions of the deed ; and consequently, in ordinary circumstances at least, we always look at the deed to ascertain what are the terms of payment in the mind of the testator. There are several about which there can be no mistake at all. First, as regards the payment of the capital sum set apart to meet the widow’s annuity, the term of payment there is the death of the widow. That is a separate matter from the term of payment of other parts of the estate. Then in the next place, as regards the children of the daughters, who are to take the fee, the term of payment there is in each case the death of their mother. That again is another and separate term of payment. Then as regards the two sons Robert Stark Lundie and James Buchanan Lundie, the term of payment in their case of their share of the residue is undoubtedly “so soon as my estate shall be realised.” These two sons are then to obtain immediate payment. The question remains whether that is not also the term of payment of the share destined to John Lundie junior. The trustees say that it is not, because they are not entitled then to pay over his share—they being directed to pay by such instalments as they shall think fit.

There is certainly a distinction between the two elder sons and the younger, but that does not quite solve the question whether the testator did not mean that the terms of payment of which he speaks in the vesting-clause were to be the same in the case of all his sons. It is true the trustees are not authorised to pay over the shares all at once. On the contrary, they are directed to do so by instalments, but in what number of instalments, or in instalments of what amount, is left to their discretion. Still, from the time the estate is realised, they are to pay to him as well as to the others. It may be that they may not pay for some time after that event. It may be that they may not have paid for a considerable time after the arrival of the period at which they are directed to pay to the other sons. But still it is the only term of payment as regards the residue of the estate, and there is none other to be found in the deed. We therefore come back to the vesting-clause, with this light thrown upon it from the other provisions of the deed, that there are several terms of payment applicable to different sums and different persons, and we must see whether there is anything in the phrase "respectively" which can create for John Lundie junior a different term of payment from the terms at which his brothers are to receive their shares.

No. 11.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

I have come to the conclusion with the Lord Ordinary that the only terms of payment in the deed are those three which I have mentioned, viz., the terms of payment, 1st, of the capital set aside for the widow's annuity; 2d, of the provisions for the issue of the daughters; and 3d, of the residue; and there are no others in the deed. To say that the phrase "terms of payment" necessarily means in the case of John Lundie junior the times at which each particular instalment is handed over to him by the trustees is a false reading of the phrase. The time at which payment may be made is one thing, and the term contemplated by the truster is quite a different thing. The one is in the mind of the testator, and the other is the result of accident. We have seen cases where there is a provision that no vesting is to take place till the sums are actually paid over, and where the testator so expresses himself he leaves no room for doubt, and he means that until the money is placed in the hands of the beneficiaries the vesting is suspended. But this is not such a case.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary proceeds upon the footing that the share of John Lundie in the residue of his father's estate was vested in him at the date of the decree of divorce, and in this I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The clause providing for the disposal of the residue is pretty distinct. By it the trustees are to apportion and divide the whole free residue into six equal shares, and as soon as the estate shall be realised one share is appointed to be paid over under certain conditions to Robert Stark Lundie. James Buchanan Lundie is to get another share, and then the deed directs that the trustees are to "hold one share thereof in trust for the use and behoof of my son John Lundie junior, and shall retain the same, or such part thereof as they may think proper, in their own hands, for such period after the realisation of my estate as they may deem expedient, and they shall pay the said share to him by such instalments or in such portions and at such times as they may think fit."

There is here, therefore, a distinct order to pay in certain proportions on the realisation of the estate; and then the deed proceeds to declare that so long as the share, or any part thereof, shall "not be paid over to my said son, my trustees shall pay to him the interest or annual produce of such share or part thereof so remaining unpaid up, and that half-yearly, by equal portions, at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday in each year, aye and until the said share be wholly paid over to him and discharged." This share, therefore, of the realised estate the trustees are distinctly appointed to hold for behoof of John Lundie, though they have a discretion to pay it to him by instalments, upon which they have to some extent acted; and in the event of their so acting they are expressly directed to pay to him half-yearly the whole interest of the part of the share remaining unpaid. If that clause had stood alone, there would, I think, be no doubt as to the vested right of John Lundie in the share held for him. There is, however, a subsequent clause which declares that "the foresaid provisions to my said three sons, and to the issue of my said three daughters, shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment

No. 11.

Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

thereof," and in respect of this declaration it is maintained that because there is a discretion to pay at certain periods, there can be no vesting in John Lundie till the times at which each payment is made to him. I agree, however, in the opinion which your Lordship has expressed as to the meaning and effect of that clause, for I do not think that it can, on fair construction, be held to prevent the share of John Lundie from vesting in him in respect of the leading provisions of the deed.

LORD ADAM.—By the second purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement the truster provides an annuity to his widow, and a capital sum is set apart to meet this, and on her death he directs the capital sum to be divided as is there set forth. It is needless to consider that clause further. It contains the same provisions as the clause dealing with residue. The capital sum is to be divided in the same way as the residue, except that the division is to be on the death of the widow. Perhaps I may remark, as I agree with the Lord Ordinary's reasoning, that he seems to have thought that the whole estate was to be divided on the death of the widow. That makes, however, no difference in the reasoning on which he proceeds, but I merely point out that he does not distinguish between the two periods of division. In the fifth purpose of the deed there is a direction to divide the residue into six equal shares, and to pay, so soon as the estate is realised, one-sixth share to each of his two elder sons, but "they shall hold one share thereof in trust for the use and behoof of my son John Lundie junior, and shall retain the same, or such part thereof as they may think proper, in their own hands, for such period after the realisation of my estate as they may deem expedient." Now, I agree with Sir Charles Pearson that that one share belongs to John Lundie, since, as Lord Mure points out, the clause goes on to say that "they shall pay the said share to him by such instalments, or in such portions and at such times as they may think fit." No option is given them as to whether they shall pay the whole share to John Lundie or not. He is to have the whole share. That is made still clearer by the next clause, which provides that "so long as the said share, or any part thereof, shall not be paid over to my said son, my trustees shall pay to him the interest or annual produce of such share or part thereof so remaining unpaid up, and that half-yearly by equal portions at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday in each year, aye and until the said share be wholly paid over to him and discharged,"—that is to say, that so long as the whole or part of the estate is not paid over, the clear intention and direction of the testator is to give to John Lundie the absolute right to one-sixth share. That being so, if the question had stood on this clause alone, I should have thought that the mere direction to the trustees to pay as they thought fit would not have suspended the vesting in him. But then we have the vesting-clause, which declares that "the foresaid provisions to my said three sons, and to the issue of my said three daughters, shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof." If we could put the construction on the phrase "terms of payment" that it meant the times at which the actual sums were to be paid in instalments to John Lundie junior, then there would be no vesting until they were so paid. But I agree with your Lordship that that is not the meaning of the phrase. The "terms of payment" meant by the testator are 1st, the death of the widow; 2d, the realisation of the estate; and 3d, the death of their mothers as regards the grandchildren. These are the "terms of payment," and not the actual times at which the trustees happen to pay over his share to John Lundie junior. I do not think that the vesting-clause at all modifies the meaning of the previous clause, by which an immediate right is given to John Lundie in his share of the residue upon the realisation of the estate.

No. 11.
Oct. 31, 1888.
M'Elmail v.
Lundie's
Trustees.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

CAMPBELL & SOMERVELL, W.S.—BUCHAN & BUCHAN, S.S.C.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

CHARLES SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. J. Guthrie. No. 12.
THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—Balfour
—Low.

Nov. 1, 1888.
Smith v.
Highland
Railway Co.

Reparation—Culpa—Child killed on private line of railway—Reasonable precaution.—On a line of rails, leading from a railway station to a private harbour, seven disconnected waggons were standing alongside a steamer lying at the quay. A boy of eleven, who had been standing on a narrow space left between the rails and the edge of the quay, while attempting to cross the line, was crushed between two of the waggons which had been set in motion by a train which was being moved backwards for the purpose of attaching the waggons. The driver of the train, which was 128 feet from the nearest waggon, had before starting it given two loud and prolonged whistles, and moved the train at a pace not exceeding three miles an hour. It was accompanied by two porters on foot, one of whom had coupled two of the waggons before the accident happened. In an action of damages by the boy's father against the railway company the Court assolizied the defenders on the ground that no fault on their part had been proved.

IN terms of an agreement with William Young, proprietor of the 1st DIVISION. harbour, Burghead, the Highland Railway Company laid down from their station at Burghead, Morayshire, a line of rails for goods traffic, to the end of the south pier or quay of the harbour, in order that waggons might be loaded from steamers lying at the quay. Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn. M.

On 28th February 1887 seven waggons stood on this line of rails, with open spaces between each of them. A boy of eleven years of age named George Smith, who had been standing on the narrow space between the rails and quay, and opposite one of the waggons, was killed in attempting to cross the line through one of the open spaces just as a train was being shunted down to the waggons for the purpose of bringing them back to the station.

His father thereupon raised an action of damages against the railway company, alleging that his son had been killed by the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they were responsible, in conducting the operations of moving the waggons in an improper manner, and in failing to use reasonable care, caution, or skill, or to take due precautions to secure the safety of the public.

This averment the defenders denied, averring that the injury, if not purely accidental, was caused or materially contributed to by the negligence or want of ordinary circumspection and care of the boy himself in placing himself in a position in which there was obvious danger.

A proof was allowed, the result of which sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges and from the following findings in fact contained in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini), dated 14th January 1888:—"Finds that the pursuer is a farm-servant at Rosevalley, in the parish of Duffus, and the defenders are the High-

No. 12.
—
Nov. 1, 1888.
Smith v.
Highland
Railway Co.

land Railway Company, incorporated under Act of Parliament, and that they have a station at Burghead, and a line of rails for goods traffic only, running therefrom to the end of the south pier or quay of the harbour of Burghead; that the distance between the outside of the line of rails and the edge of the quay is 3 feet 11½ inches; and that waggons standing upon them overlap the said space of 3 feet 11½ inches to the extent of 1 foot 5½ inches; that the said south pier or quay is the property of William Young, Esq. of Burghead, and that the defenders have laid down rails thereon, and possess the right to use the said quay under the agreement: That the space between the outside of the said line of rails and the edge of the quay is not a public thoroughfare, but that the use of it by the public is not objected to either by the said William Young or by the defenders: Finds that on Saturday the 28th day of May 1887, the pursuer's son George—a boy of about eleven years of age—was sent into Burghead by his parents on a message, and that about six o'clock of the evening of that day he was standing on the said quay opposite the after-hold of the steamer "Ranger," which was lying alongside the quay: That there was at this time on the rails seven waggons, of which the four westmost and the two eastmost were loaded with coals, and one—being that lying between the fore and aft holds of the said steamer—was unloaded: That this waggon was separated from the four westmost waggons by a small open space: That the whole of the said seven waggons were standing on the rails, with spaces between them: That while the waggons were in this position a train of eighteen or twenty empty waggons was started from the station: That the said train was propelled by a locomotive in the charge of Paul Junor, its driver, and Angus Thomson, its fireman; and that the said train was accompanied by Donald Budge and William Clark, servants in the employment of the defenders: That the said William Clark gave the signal to start, and the train was started accordingly by Paul Junor, the driver—after he had whistled twice in a sufficiently long and loud manner, to give warning that the train was about to start: That the train accordingly started at a pace not exceeding three miles an hour: That Clark and Budge preceded the train on foot: That while the train was in motion a person on board the steamer called the attention of the boy George Smith to the approach of the train, and that the boy thereupon moved to jump on board the steamer, but that, apparently changing his purpose, and seeing the opening between the empty waggons and the first of the four loaded waggons to the west, he turned to cross the line through that space, and in doing so was caught by the buffers of the said waggons, which being set in motion by the train of empty waggons coming up against the two eastmost waggons, he was crushed between the said buffers, and received such injuries that he subsequently died therefrom: Finds that the shunting of the trucks was conducted by those acting on behalf of the defenders with due care and caution, and according to the usual manner of such an operation."

The Sheriff-substitute further found in law "that the accident was entirely attributable to the conduct of the said George Smith, and not to any neglect on the part of the defenders: Therefore assoilzies them from the conclusions of the petition."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Ivory) recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and, after findings in fact, further found "that the deceased was killed through the fault of the defenders or their servants, who conducted the operation of shunting the said train without using reasonable care, or taking due precautions to secure the safety of the deceased or other members of the public walking on or otherwise using the said quay."

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff's interlocutor was not supported by the evidence, and proceeded on an erroneous opinion as to the duties incumbent on the defenders. On the other hand, the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute contained an accurate statement of the facts of the case. The locus of the accident was not a public thoroughfare. If the public went there, they did so at their own risk. Consequently there was no obligation on the railway company to take special precautions.<sup>1</sup> The method of shunting adopted was the usual one, and was carried on with all the usual precautions. Due notice was given by whistling, and it was incumbent on the pursuer to prove that the whistle was not sounded.<sup>2</sup> The train went at a slow rate. It had only to go 128 feet before it came to the first of the seven waggons, so that it could not have got up a high rate of speed. The medical man who saw the boy after the accident was of opinion that he had been slowly squeezed. Two porters accompanied the train. Budge preceded it, and had actually coupled two waggons before the accident happened. In these circumstances, it was clear that no fault had been established on the part of the defenders. Further, even assuming that there was such fault proved, the boy was himself to blame. He had no right to be there at all, and if he had taken ordinary care, and remained where he was standing, no accident would have happened.<sup>3</sup>

No. 12.

Nov. 1, 1888.

Smith v.

Highland

Railway Co.

Argued for the pursuer;—The harbour was a public place where persons were in the habit of congregating, and the best proof of this was that all sorts of people were proved to have been there when the accident occurred. A special obligation then was placed on the railway company to see that the public safety was attended to.<sup>4</sup> There was no proof that the whistling had been long and continuous, as was held necessary in Russell, &c. v. Caledonian Railway Co.<sup>5</sup> There was a discrepancy in the evidence as regards the speed of the train, some witnesses saying five or six miles, others saying two miles per hour. The probability was that it was travelling at the undue rate of four or five miles an hour. There ought to have been one man to attach the empty waggons to the two full ones, and another to attach these to the empty waggon opposite the quay. The case of Balfour v. Baird and Brown was not in point. The boy there brought the disaster on himself. In this case he had not started the engine. In the case of Grant v. Caledonian Railway Co., the child had omitted the most obvious precautions for his safety.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In some respects this case is in an unsatisfactory condition. It is certainly difficult to find out what is the ground of action. There is none disclosed on record, and it is very much to be regretted that when the case was before the Sheriff-substitute, and the record closed, he did not advert to it, and either throw out the action altogether or call upon the pursuer to amend his record. That would have been of less consequence, so far as we are concerned, if the ground of action had been clearly disclosed in the evidence, but

<sup>1</sup> Balfour v. Baird and Brown, Dec. 5, 1857, 20 D. 238, per Lord Justice-Clerk, p. 242; Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Jan. 24, 1888, 15 R. 323.

<sup>2</sup> Grant v. Caledonian Railway Co., Dec. 10, 1870, 9 Macph. 258, per Lord President, p. 270.

<sup>3</sup> Fraser v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., Dec. 2, 1882, 10 R. 264.

<sup>4</sup> Morran v. Waddell, Oct. 24, 1883, 11 R. 44; Shaw v. Croall & Sons, July 1, 1885, 12 R. 1186; Illidge v. Goodwin, Dec. 22, 1831, 5 Carrington & Payne, 190.

<sup>5</sup> Russell, &c. v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 5, 1879, 7 R. 148.

No. 12.

Nov. 1, 1888.
Smith v.
Highland
Railway Co.

I confess it is very puzzling in reading the proof to find it out precisely. The findings on which the Sheriff's judgment proceeds are some of them not justified at all by the evidence, and seem to have been suggested by the Sheriff himself from his own knowledge or opinion. On the other hand, the findings of the Sheriff-substitute commend themselves more to my mind, because I do find a fairly well digested series of facts brought out.

I do not think it is necessary or desirable to go into a minute examination of the evidence, except in so far as it is necessary to shew the ground of judgment which commends itself to me. I think this poor lad had no right to be where he was, and by his having no right I mean that as one of the public he had no business occupation to take him to the harbour at all. The harbour works are intended for the occupation of persons with business to transact, and for no one else, and the public have no right to be there unless they are there with such occupation. It is therefore vain to represent this space as a public highway. It is nothing of the kind. It is plainly devoted to a particular kind of business, and no one has any right to go there unless he is engaged in that business. This lad was there for no purpose but an idle one, and he was therefore in a place where the defenders were not bound to expect him to be. He was there without any legitimate occupation, and as he must have known that the place was dangerous he took the risk of the ordinary perils attending the place. But then if it can be shewn that the railway company conducted the shunting at the harbour in an unusual or reckless manner, and in such a manner as to cause unnecessary danger to persons legally there on business, it would raise a case of a different kind. But I must take leave to state that as the result of my examination of the evidence I can find nothing in the proof which is inconsistent with the ordinary practice and use of railway companies in their shunting operations. We all know that the process of shunting depends greatly on how much accommodation there is for siding, e.g., here, if there had been ample siding accommodation into which waggons might be shunted, probably the empty waggons would have been put there, and the shunting at the quay would only have been done with an engine. But then it is not proved that there was a siding, or that the shunting could have been done otherwise than it was. To justify an allegation that it had been recklessly done, would require the most minute investigation. Of that we have no sort of evidence. The conclusion which I draw from the evidence, and it is the only possible one, is that it has not been proved that the shunting operations were conducted recklessly. I am therefore for altering the judgment of the Sheriff, and for reverting to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. It is plain that this poor boy went through curiosity to see the ship which was lying in the harbour, and was on the edge of the quay at the time the shunting was going on. He was apparently not aware that he was exposed to risk, but the moment he was warned of his danger, he seems to have got flurried. He tried to get into the ship, but changed his mind, and attempted to cross the rails through the opening between the waggons, and so was crushed. It is also plain, I think, that if he had known more about the localities he would have stayed where he was, for two boys Hendry and Mitchell, who had before seen shunting carried on, and saw the accident, have deposed distinctly that he would have sustained no injury if he had done this. In these circumstances, it would, I think, require very clear proof of negligence in the shunting operations on the part of the railway company to establish liability against them. Mr Guthrie put three points very clearly in which he maintained that they had failed in their duty. In the first place, he maintained that no one was in front of the waggons when they were being shunted along the quay. Now certainly Budge was as close in front as he could well be, because he had succeeded in coupling the waggons. Secondly, he argued that there was insufficient whistling. But I do not know that any amount of whistling would have been intelligible to this boy. Lastly, he maintained that the speed at which the waggons were shunted was too great. But in this contention also I think he has failed. I am therefore of opinion that no fault has been proved sufficient to render the defenders liable.

No. 12.

Nov. 1, 1888.
Smith v.
Highland
Railway Co.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer must establish fault on the part of the railway company before he can recover in this case, and unless he does establish such fault, the question of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer does not arise. I agree with the Dean of Faculty that in this case it is not necessary to consider this question, because I am very clearly of opinion that the pursuer has not proved fault on the part of the railway company. It is not very clear from the proof how the accident happened; I think, however, it happened in this way: The engine and empty waggons went down the quay a few feet—or rather, I should say, along, for it is not proved that there is any incline, and the whole distance was only 128 feet—until they came into contact with the two loaded waggons which were standing opposite the quay. I think it is proved that they came along without any undue speed. Clark came down on one side of the empty waggons, and Budge came down on the other side, but before them. I think it is proved that at the crossing, which is immediately above this part of the quay, Budge had crossed in front of the going waggons and went along with them till they came into contact with the standing waggons, and then the whole train was set in motion, but not at a fast rate of speed. I think it is also proved that in the meanwhile Budge proceeded to couple, and had actually coupled, the first and second loaded waggons, and that the train, moved on slowly and steadily till it came into contact with the empty waggon, without any shock or rebound, but with steady onward progress, crushed the boy between the buffers. I think the medical evidence shews no appearance of anything except slow and steady crushing, and that being so, and these being to my mind the facts, I can find no fault on the part of the railway company. So far as I can see, they left nothing undone which they ought to have done. I can therefore see no fault in this case, and I think, therefore, that we must return to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, the findings of which I think are quite satisfactory.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against: Adopt the findings in fact contained in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and hold the same as repeated herein brevitatis causa: Affirm the said interlocutor: Of new assolvie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

GIBSON & PATERSON, W.S.—J. K. & W. P. LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13.

Nov. 3, 1888.
Lawrie v.
Pearson.

MRS EMILY M'GUIRE OR LAWRIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Lennan.
DAVID PEARSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—J. A. Reid—Macdonald.

Process—Expenses—Caution—Defender.—As a general rule the Court will not ordain an insolvent defender to find caution for expenses.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
1.

ON 28th February 1888 Mrs Emily M'Guire or Lawrie, Greenside Row, Edinburgh, brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment against David Pearson, solicitor, Kirkcaldy, sole surviving trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of Mr and Mrs Greig, under which the pursuer was one of the beneficiaries, concluding for an account of his intromissions as trustee, whereby the sum due to her might be ascertained, or, failing an accounting, for payment of £500.

The pursuer alleged, inter alia, that the defender was personally responsible for certain investments of the trust funds. The defender denied that he was liable as averred, and stated that he had fully accounted to the pursuer.

After the action had been raised the pursuer ascertained that the defender had, before the date of the action, executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. She in consequence added this plea,—(1) The defender being insolvent, and having divested himself of his whole estates, is not entitled to defend this action without finding caution for expenses.

On 16th May the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) appointed intimation to be made to the defender's trustee.

The trustee having declined to sist himself, the Lord Ordinary, on 6th July, ordained the defender to find caution for expenses within eight days.

On 19th July, the defender having failed to find caution, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the defender has failed to find caution for the expenses of process as ordered by the interlocutor of 6th July current, on the motion of the pursuer, and in respect the pursuer restricts her claim under the alternative conclusions of the summons to the sum of £250 (said sum being exclusive of and in addition to the sums which the defender has already transferred to the pursuer in the course of the process), decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £250 under the said alternative conclusion of the summons, reserving to the pursuer her right in and against the various funds in which the trust-estate under the defender's charge is or may be invested, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The question of caution for expenses was one for the discretion of the Court, and in the case of defenders the Court would readily dispense with caution. This was peculiarly a case for such dispensation, as the defender was sued as trustee, a capacity with which his trustee had nothing to do.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was raised before the pursuer knew of the granting of the trust-deed. The question was one for the discretion of the Court,<sup>2</sup> and that in the case of defenders as well as pursuers.<sup>3</sup> The defender though sued as a trustee was sought to be made personally liable, and as he had divested himself of his estate there was nothing which the pursuer could arrest.

<sup>1</sup> Taylor v. Fairlie's Trustees, March 1, 1833, 6 W. and S. 301; Goudy on Bankruptcy, 355.

<sup>2</sup> Stevenson v. Lee, June 4, 1886, 13 R. 913.

<sup>3</sup> Thom v. Andrew, June 26, 1888, 15 R. 780 (per Lord Young).

No. 13.

LORD YOUNG.—I cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary has fallen into error in the view he has taken of this case. It is an action of count, reckoning, and payment against Mr Pearson, a writer in Kirkcaldy, as trustee under the testamentary trust of a Mr and Mrs Greig. Mr Pearson defends the action, and he says that he has already sufficiently accounted—that he is not indebted to the pursuer; and we have been informed that the question really turns upon the point whether the defender is personally responsible for certain investments of the trust-money which are said to have turned out badly. Before the action was raised, but, as we were informed very properly by Mr McLennan, without the knowledge of the pursuer, Mr Pearson had executed a voluntary trust-deed with a view to the judicious management of his affairs and the payment of his debts; and the pursuer now puts in this plea,—“The defender being insolvent, and having divested himself of his whole estates, is not entitled to defend this action without finding caution for expenses.” On this plea being brought under his notice the Lord Ordinary ordered intimation to be made to the trustee, and as the trustee declined—and very properly declined—to have anything to do with the case, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor appointing the defender to find caution for expenses. It was here, I think, the Lord Ordinary fell into error. In my opinion Mr Pearson is absolutely entitled to defend himself without finding caution. The trust is a voluntary trust, although it would not have affected my opinion if this had been a sequestration. No trust-estate in which the defender acted as trustee and executor would have been affected by his sequestration any more than by his voluntary trust; the trust-estate would have remained in his hands, and he would have been responsible to the beneficiaries for it, and neither the trustee upon a voluntary trust executed by him nor the trustee under his sequestration could with any propriety have interfered. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary's view was erroneous, and I should propose to your Lordships that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor appointing the defender to find caution, and also the subsequent interlocutor granting decree against him for £250, and remit the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

LORD LEE.—There are two questions to be considered in a case like the present. The first is, whether the defender has so completely divested himself of his estates as to have no title to defend. But it is not said here that the defender has completely divested himself of his estates, at least no question of his title to defend the action was raised in argument; the only question was, whether he should be ordained to find caution before he can be allowed to defend. I do not say that there may not be cases in which the defender may be called upon to find caution, but the general rule as to caution which applies to pursuers does not apply to the case of defenders. There is no better illustration of this than the well-known case of Stephen v. Skinner, May 31, 1860, 22 D. 1122. Here I entirely agree that no ground has been shewn to us why the defender should be made to find caution as a condition of defending the action.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur, and only wish to add that if this doctrine of making the defender in an action find caution were to be carried to its limits it would amount to intolerable hardship. If we were to affirm that principle it would amount to this, that where an action of any kind is brought against a bankrupt or against a person who has placed his property under a

Nov. 3, 1888.
Lawrie v.
Pearson.

No. 13.

Nov. 3, 1888.
Lawrie v.
Pearson.

voluntary trust, he would be compelled either to find caution or to allow decree to go against him for any amount that might be asked. I therefore concur in the judgment proposed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the defender against Lord Fraser's interlocutor of 19th July last, recall the said interlocutor and the previous interlocutor of 6th July 1888: Repel the first plea in law for the pursuer: Find the defender entitled to expenses from the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against: Remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report; authorise the Lord Ordinary to decern for the taxed amount thereof, and remit the cause to his Lordship accordingly, and to proceed otherwise as accords."

ROBERT BROATCH, Solicitor—W. G. L. WINCHESTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 14.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Australasian
Mortgage and Agency Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

THE AUSTRALASIAN MORTGAGE AND AGENCY COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—D.-F. Mackintosh—J. C. Lorimer.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Robertson—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Stamp—Bill of Exchange—Coupon—Renewal of debenture—Stamp Act, 1870 (Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 48, and schedule, voce Bill of Exchange.—Under the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, dealing with bills of exchange, there is exempted from the ld. stamp duty exigible upon bills of exchange payable on demand (9) "coupon or warrant for interest attached to and issued with any security."

Held that that exemption did not cover interest coupons which were attached to the original security upon its being renewed by minute for a further term of years after its original term of endurance had expired, and that they fell to be stamped with the ld. stamp.

1st DIVISION.
M.

ON 2d May 1883 the Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, issued a debenture bond for £2000, bearing five per cent interest, in favour of Mr R. E. Scott, C.A., the date of payment being 15th May 1888, "or upon such subsequent date as may hereafter be mutually agreed upon by minute to be indorsed hereon." The debenture was stamped with a £2, 10s. stamp, being the ad valorem duty applicable to a mortgage.

Unstamped coupons or warrants for the interest payable each half year during the currency of the debenture down to and including 15th May 1888 were attached to and issued with the debenture.* These were detached and payment made upon them as each half year's interest fell due.

When the debenture fell due at Whitsunday 1888 it was arranged by the parties that it should be renewed, and a minute of renewal for five years was indorsed upon the debenture, and a new set of coupons or warrants for the interest issued.* The minute of renewal was stamped with a 6d. agreement stamp. No. 14.

* The Stamp Act, 1870 (Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 48 (1) enacted,—"The term 'bill of exchange,' for the purposes of this Act, includes also draft, order, cheque, and letter of credit, and any document or writing (except a bank note), entitling or purporting to entitle any person, whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of, or to draw upon any other person for, any sum of money therein mentioned."

Under the head "bill of exchange" in the schedule to the Act appear certain exemptions, and the ninth of those exemptions is as follows:—"Coupon or warrant for interest, attached to and issued with any security."

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, at the instance of the Mortgage Company, on appeal against the determination of the Commissioners, in which the question was whether each of these coupons was "liable to the duty of one penny applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand, or if not, whether it is liable to any duty, or whether it is exempt from duty as 'a coupon or warrant for interest attached to and issued with any security.'"† Nov. 9, 1888.
Australasian
Mortgage and Agency Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The case bore that "these coupons were attached to the debenture by being pasted thereto, and both debenture and coupons were thereupon delivered to the holders or their agents."

It was further stated,—"There is a provision in section 18 of the said Act that nothing in the said section contained shall be deemed to authorise the stamping after execution thereof of any instrument prohibited by law from being so stamped, and the instrument in question being regarded as a bill of exchange payable on demand, it would come under this provision, but the instrument being already stamped with the duty of one penny, the said Commissioners expressed their opinion that it was a bill of exchange payable on demand and properly stamped with the duty of one penny, and it was stamped with the particular stamp provided by the said Commissioners under the said Act to denote and signify that the full amount of stamp-duty with which the document was by law chargeable had been paid. But the said Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the said Commissioners on the ground that the coupon in question falls within the exemption above quoted of a 'coupon or warrant for interest attached to and issued with any security,' and is not liable to any stamp-duty. They therefore required the said Commissioners to state specially and sign the case on which the question with respect to such duty arose, together with their determination thereon, which the Commissioners do hereby state and sign accordingly."

Argued for the appellants;—The coupons attached to the original debenture required no stamp. The new coupons were precisely in terms of those originally issued. A coupon was not a promissory-note. It was not an order to pay, and it added nothing to the debenture. It was merely a form of receipt which might be presented by bearer, and was accepted without indorsation as an absolute voucher. The statute had therefore permitted coupons to escape both a bill of exchange and receipt duty. The duty on the debenture was fixed without reference to the date of repayment, and there was no reason why a debenture with a stipulation as to renewal should be on a different footing. It was in-

* The minute of renewal was,—"Edinburgh, 14th May 1888.—It is hereby agreed that the term of payment of this debenture shall be extended from the 15th day of May 1888, being the date of payment within mentioned, to the 15th day of May 1893, and coupons for interest at the rate of 4½ per centum per annum have been delivered to the said m/c trustees of Mr and Mrs John Bruce of Sumburgh, for the interest to become due at and prior to the date of payment hereby agreed on."

† The coupon was in the following terms:—"No. 1. The Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, (£42, 10s.),—will pay to the bearer at the office of the Royal Bank of Scotland, Edinburgh or London, on surrender of this coupon, the sum of forty-two pounds ten shillings stg., on the 11th day of November 1888, for interest due at that date on debenture No. 2711. R. & E. SCOTT, Secretaries."

No. 14. tended that it should be in the same position (except as regarded the payment of an agreement stamp upon the minute of renewal) as if the extended period had been specified in the original debenture. So, too, in the case of the coupons. They were by implication issued with the original debenture. The new security was formed by the old debenture taken along with the agreement of renewal. The exemption, therefore, applied to renewal coupons. The original debenture in reality expired, and was re-issued and revived by the minute of renewal. Coupon meant something that was to be cut off; the essence was that it should be issued along with the obligation.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Australasian
Mortgage and Agency Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Argued for the respondents;—Coupons were bills of exchange; this was clear from the terms of the Stamp Act, 1870. The debenture was the security; and admittedly the coupons issued with it were not subject to duty. The minute of renewal contained no new obligation to repay. It was only a minute of agreement, and the security was the original debenture. The new coupons were not "issued with" the security; they were re-issued, and therefore fell to be stamped with the 1d. stamp exigible upon bills of exchange payable on demand.

At advising,—

LORD SHAND.—The question for determination in this case is whether a coupon or interest warrant for £42, 10s., issued by the Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, on 14th May last, and payable on the 11th of the present month, is liable to the duty of 1d., as the Commissioners have held it to be, or is exempt from duty, as maintained by the company.

There is no doubt that the document is a bill of exchange within the meaning of that term as defined by section 48 of the Stamp Act of 1870, and it is certainly liable in duty unless it falls under the 9th exemption in that part of the schedule of the Act which deals with bills of exchange and specifies the duty to which they are liable. The exemption is thus expressed,—“Coupon or warrant for interest attached to and issued with any security.”

The Australasian Company, on 2d May 1883, issued a debenture for £2000, having a currency for five years, on which they undertook to pay interest half-yearly at 5 per cent. This document was impressed with a stamp for £2, 10s., being the stamp appropriate to a debenture for the amount of the loan, and attached to and issued with the document or security there were coupons or interest warrants for the ten half-yearly payments of interest to become due before the loan became repayable. These coupons were clearly exempt from all stamp-duty under the words of the exemption already quoted.

Immediately before the debenture became due it was arranged between the company and the creditors that in place of repayment of the money being made, the period of endurance of the loan should be extended for other five years, that the rate of interest for this extended time should be  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and that coupons for interest at that rate should be issued, payable half-yearly as before. Accordingly a minute embodying this arrangement was indorsed on the debenture, having affixed to it an agreement stamp of 6d., and a new set of coupons was attached to the debenture “by being pasted thereto, and both debenture and coupons were thereupon delivered” to the creditors.

The appellants maintain that these coupons were exempt from duty under the statute, because they were attached to and issued with the security, but I am of opinion with the Commissioners that this contention is unsound, because though the coupons were attached to the security, they were not issued with it as the first set of coupons was, and it is a condition of the exemption allowed No. 14.

by the statute that the coupons shall be issued with the security.

When the debenture came to maturity the parties might have arranged that it should be given up and cancelled, and the money should be again lent to the company under the new arrangement on a new debenture, issued with its appropriate coupons attached to it. In that case there must have been a payment of a stamp, as for a new debenture, of £2, 10s., or the proper ad valorem amount, and of course the coupons issued with and attached to this debenture would have been exempt from duty.

Nov. 9, 1888.

Australasian
Mortgage and Agency Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

But that was not the course which the parties took. The debenture was never given up by the creditors. On the contrary, by the arrangement made the obligation of the company under the terms of that document still subsists, with this alteration on these terms, that the period of the loan is extended and the rate of interest reduced. On the assumption that the transaction is not to be regarded as a new debenture, the document embodying the arrangement has been impressed with an agreement stamp of 6d. only. The form and scheme of this transaction is not, according to the view of the parties, a new loan and a new security or document of debt granted for it, but an extension of an existing loan on somewhat altered terms. The agreement expressly bears that "the term of payment of this debenture shall be extended," and each coupon bears that the payment is made for interest due "on debenture No. 2711," being the debenture due at Whitsunday 1888, the term of payment of which had been extended.

This being so, I think it follows that the coupon in question, though attached to the debenture by the company, was not issued with that document or security. The debenture was issued in May 1883. Nor can it be said that there was a second issue or re-issue of the debenture. That document was never given up to the company, for that would only have been done on repayment of the amount, or in exchange for a new debenture, and so it could not be issued a second time. The debenture in its terms bore that the money should be repaid at Whitsunday 1888, or at such date as might "be mutually agreed on by minute to be indorsed hereon," but this stipulation seems to be of no account in the present question. An agreement to extend the period of payment would be of equal effect though the debenture had no such clause, and would be equally effectual though written not on the debenture but on a separate paper.

It is not easy to understand why a coupon or warrant for interest which is by statute held to be a bill of exchange, and which in practice serves also as a receipt or discharge for money, should in any circumstances be free from stamp-duty, while a receipt for interest on a heritable security must bear a stamp. But the exemption given is not universal but limited. The coupon must be "attached to and issued with any security." The only explanation of this limitation which occurs to one is that the privilege or exemption is only to be given where the coupons are issued with the original debenture, which has paid debenture duty, and not to be given where, as here, no such duty has been paid, but the transaction stands on the debenture as originally issued,—modified only in its terms by an agreement bearing an agreement stamp only.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The document in question is

No. 14.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Australasian
Mortgage and Agency Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

an ordinary coupon, and there is no doubt that a coupon is just a bill of exchange, and that under the Stamp Act of 1870 it is liable to the duty of 1d. unless it can be shewn that it belongs to one of the class of documents dealt with in the clause of exemptions appended to that statute. This, then, becomes the question which we have to deal with—Does this coupon fall under the clause of exemption? And the answer must depend upon the language of the clause, which is, “coupon or warrant for interest attached to and issued with any security.” Can it be said that this coupon was “attached to and issued with any security”? Now, the only two documents which have any bearing upon this question are the debenture and the minute of renewal. The only security for the £2000 is the debenture, and it is the existing security. It is in the words of the schedule to the Act under the heading “mortgage,” “the only or principal or primary security” for this money. The minute of renewal contains no obligation to repay, but only an extension of the time within which the £2000 is to be repaid. That brings us then to the further question, Was this coupon “attached to and issued with” the security? It certainly was attached to the security by a process of pasting, but it was not issued with it. For that purpose the debenture would require to have been given up to the company, and a new one would require to have been issued. It is clear, therefore, that this coupon was not “issued with” the security, and it is equally clear that under the Act of 1870, not being under the clause of exemptions, it must pay the stamp-duty of 1d.

What may be the reason of the exemption under the statute I do not know. But the point which has been raised is positivi juris, for reasons which I have not been able to discover, and that being so, I can only say that in terms of the Act the exemption does not cover the case of a re-issue of coupons upon the same security.

LORD MURE.—Under the statute of 1870 the only case in which coupons are to escape the duty of 1d. payable on bills of exchange is when, under the clause of exemptions, they are “attached to and issued with any security.” It cannot be said in the present case that the coupons in question were “issued with” this debenture. It was issued in 1883, but the coupons were not then in existence. They were not therefore issued with the security, in the sense in which I read the statute, but under an agreement to prolong the loan. If it had been the intention of the Legislature that coupons of the class now before us should escape the duty of 1d. payable on bills of exchange, the words of the clause of exemption would, I think, have been different. They might have been “Coupon attached to and issued with any security or on any renewal thereof.” But there are here no such expressions; and in the absence of any such words I agree with your Lordships in thinking that this coupon does not fall under the clause of exemption.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

MENZIES, COVENTRY, & BLACK, W.S.—THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

THE TEXAS LAND AND CATTLE COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—Balfour No. 15.
—J. C. Lorimer.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Robertson Nov. 9, 1888.
—A. J. Young. Texas Land and Cattle Co., Limited, v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Stamp—Revenue—Transfer of debenture—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888 (Act 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 8), sec. 13—Stamp Act, 1870 (Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 2—Marketable security.—By the Stamp Act, 1870, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, a marketable security is defined as meaning “a security of such a description as to be capable of being sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom.”

Held that debentures of a land and cattle company incorporated under the Companies Acts fell within that definition, and that transfers on sale thereof were therefore liable, under the 13th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, to a stamp-duty of 10s. per cent on the price as conveyances on sale.

On 16th May 1887 the Texas Land and Cattle Company, Limited, issued a bond or debenture, No. 895, for £200 in favour of the Reverend John Gillies for three years at five per cent. The bond was issued in terms of the company's articles of association. 1ST DIVISION.
M.

On 30th May 1888 a transfer of the bond was executed by Mr Gillies's testamentary trustees in favour of Miss Ellen Parkin.

On 11th June following the transfer was sent to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, whose opinion was asked as to the stamp-duty with which it was chargeable. The Commissioners were of opinion that the debenture was a “marketable security” under the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97, and that under the Act 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 8, section 13, the transfer was chargeable with ad valorem conveyance on sale duty.* They accordingly assessed the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty of £1 upon the transfer

---

* The Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97, sec. 2, defines, “. . . Marketable security means a security of such a description as to be capable of being sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom. . . .”

By the schedule of that Act there are charged the following stamp-duties:—“Mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant, warrant of attorney to confess and enter up judgment, and foreign security of any kind,—(1) Being the only or principal or primary security for the payment or repayment of money not exceeding £25, 8d., . . . exceeding £50, not exceeding £100, 2s. 6d. . . . (3) Transfer, assignment, disposition, or assignation of any mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant, or foreign security, or of any money or stock secured by any such instrument, or by any warrant of attorney to enter up judgment, or by any judgment. For every £100, and also for any fractional part of £100 of the amount transferred, assigned, or disposed, 6d.”

By the schedule of that Act there are also charged the following stamp-duties, viz.:—“Conveyance or transfer on sale of any property (except such stock or debenture stock, or funded debt as aforesaid), where the amount or value of the consideration for the sale does not exceed £5, 6d.,” and so on.

The Act 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 8, sec. 13, provided,—“(1) There shall be charged upon a transfer, assignment, disposition, or assignation, otherwise than on mortgage, of any mortgage, bond, debenture, or covenant (being a marketable security), or of any security for money by or on behalf of any foreign or colonial state, government, municipal body, corporation, or company (being a marketable security), the following duties:—That is to say, where the transfer, assignment, disposition, or assignation is on sale, the same ad valorem duties as are now charged under the Stamp Act, 1870, upon a conveyance or transfer on sale of any property by relation to the amount or value of the consideration for the sale. . . .”

By sec. 10 the part of the Act relating to stamps is to be construed as one with the Stamp Act, 1870.

No. 15.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Texas Land
and Cattle Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

in respect of the consideration of £200, and the instrument being already stamped with the duty of 1s., they required payment of the further sum of 19s.

The company thereupon paid the 19s., and the instrument was stamped accordingly, but being dissatisfied with the determination of the Commissioners, "on the ground that the bond and debenture transferred by the instrument in question was not a 'marketable security,' and that therefore the transfer was not chargeable under the Act 51 Vict. cap. 8, with ad valorem conveyance on sale duty, but was chargeable under the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97 with the duty of 6d. per £100, or fraction thereof, of the amount in the bond or debenture transferred," they demanded a case.

The question for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether the said instrument is liable to be assessed and charged with the said ad valorem conveyance on sale stamp-duty charged under the Stamp Act, 1870, or with the said ad valorem duty of 6d. per £100, or fraction thereof?”

The appellants argued;—The debenture was nothing more than an acknowledgment of indebtedness and an obligation to repay in three years to the lender. There was nothing to enable the Court to say that this was a marketable security. If it were so, the provision might equally cover I O U's and personal bonds. The words must therefore have a restricted meaning, and the Legislature must have contemplated that there were many securities which were not capable of being sold upon the Stock Exchange, for the terms “stock market” and “stock exchange” were synonymous. Besides, “any” stock market meant “all” stock markets. The security must have a universal and not a local currency. Further, the words “capable of being sold” were probably construed by the Commissioners without any reference to the rules or constitution of the different exchanges. But a taxing Act fell to be strictly construed, and a subject was entitled to demand the warrant for his being made liable to a tax. It was not stated in the case that this debenture stock was quoted or sold on any exchange. There were indications in the Stamp Act of 1870 itself and elsewhere that the kind of security contemplated as being “marketable” was one of a class or group—such as bank shares or stock which was numbered. Where the security was capable of being quoted on the Stock Exchange its value could be ascertained. Sec. 12 of the Act of 1870 shewed that it was a security having an average price that was intended, and sec. 124 shewed that policies of insurance were not to be deemed “marketable securities.” Other sections of the Acts where the words “marketable security” occurred, e.g., sec. 71 of the Act of 1870 and sec. 16 of the Act of 1888, did not throw light upon their meaning. The result of the Commissioners' finding here was very anomalous, for while the stamp upon the debenture still remained at 2s. 6d. per cent the transfer was said to require four times as high an amount, viz., 10s. per cent.

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—What was meant by the term “marketable security” was that it must be of a kind which was likely to be saleable. A debenture could not be assimilated to a personal bond, and debentures by an individual were unknown. The term as used throughout the Act of 1870 meant any security which was capable of being sold in a stock market and had a fluctuating value. Stock market did not necessarily mean stock exchange, and it was not necessary that securities should have a quotation to enable them to be sold on a stock market. There were dealings in the non-quoted stocks which would fall to be taxed just as much as in the others. It was for the appellants to say where a distinction was to be drawn.

At advising,—

No. 15.

LORD SHAND.—The question in this case is, whether the transfer of a debenture of the Texas Land and Cattle Company (Limited) is chargeable with the stamp-duty applicable to an ad valorem conveyance on sale under section 13 of the Act 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 8, or is only chargeable with a duty of 6d. for every £100 and for any fractional part of £100 of the amount transferred, as a transfer or assignment of a debenture under the Stamp Act of 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), and relative schedule under the head “Mortgage, Bond, Debenture,” &c., head 3? I am of opinion with the Commissioners that the instrument is chargeable with the higher duty under the Statute of 51 Victoria.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Texas Land
and Cattle Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

The decision of the question turns on the point whether the debenture in question is a “marketable security” within the meaning of the statutes. By the Act of 1870 a transfer of a debenture was liable only for the smaller duty of 6d. on each £100 or part of £100; but by the later Act it was provided (sec. 13) that in substitution of this duty there should be an ad valorem charge the same as is charged under the Act of 1870 on a transfer on sale of any property “by relation to the amount or value of the consideration for the sale” on a “transfer, assignment, disposition, or assignation, otherwise than on mortgage, of any mortgage, bond, debenture, or covenant (being a marketable security), or of any security for money by or on behalf of any foreign or colonial state, government, municipal body, corporation, or company (being a marketable security).” If then the debenture in question be a “marketable security” within the meaning of the statute, then the transfer of it on a sale is liable to ad valorem duty.

Now, the Statute of 1870, sec. 2, assigns to the words “marketable security” a particular meaning. The words of the provision are—“Marketable security means a security of such a description as to be capable of being sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom.” If the debenture assigned by the transfer in question falls within this definition or description of a marketable security, then the ad valorem duty is chargeable on the instrument of transfer.

The debenture is printed, and forms part of the case. The company registered as a limited company under the Companies Acts has power under its articles of association to issue debentures under certain specified conditions, one of these being that a register of debentures shall be kept, in which entries shall be made of every debenture issued, and of all transfers of debentures, and another that the total amount shall not exceed the unpaid capital of the company, and the debenture itself, which bears to be No. 895, is in the terms in which such such documents are frequently expressed. As authorised by the articles of association it contains an obligation by the company for the repayment of the sum of £200 lent, and periodical interest, and embodies a reference to the articles of association conferring a right on the debenture-holders to a proportional part with each other of the securities and assets of the company, and the free proceeds of the lands of the company in the event of these being sold.

The Commissioners, in the case stated under the appeal, have given no statement beyond a narration of the articles of association and of the terms of the debenture and transfer, and no information as to whether the debentures of this company are de facto in use to be sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom. Their judgment is rested on the view that the debenture in question is a marketable security “under the definition above quoted.”

No. 15.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Texas Land
and Cattle Co.,
Limited, v.
Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

For the appellants it was maintained that in order to be a marketable security within the meaning of the statutes (which are to be read as one statute) the security must either be one which has a quotation on the stock exchanges or stock markets, or at least must be one of a mass issued by a company as distinguished from a single deed or instrument such as the debenture in question, which might be the only debenture issued by the company.

It is clear that the term "marketable security" is used to designate a class or kind of securities. The words of the clause of definition are "a security of such a description." The words defining what the description embraces immediately follow, and the test provided by the statute is this—Does the instrument fall within the description? What then is the description? Such a description "as to be capable of being sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom." It must be observed on these words that it is not made the test of a security as being marketable (1) that it is a debenture, bond, or covenant of a company whose debentures, bonds, or covenants are in point of fact sold in a stock market, nor (2) that it is a debenture forming one of a class or series issued by a company. If the security be one of that general class of securities which is capable of being sold in stock markets, it is then a marketable security within the meaning of the statute. The test is whether the security is capable of being so sold. Now, in one sense every security might be included under this description, for I suppose any kind of security, if of value, may find a purchaser in the stock markets through the medium of agents or brokers. But it seems to be clear that the language of the statute is not to be interpreted so as to have this wide signification, for so to read it would be to include all securities of a class having any value, whereas the statute by the expression used professes and intends to include only securities of a particular description, viz., such as are "capable of being sold in any stock market."

It seems to me that the true interpretation of the clause must be to include as marketable securities all securities of such a description as to be capable, according to the use and practice of stock markets, of being there sold and bought. This will, on the one hand, exclude such securities as mortgages on land or proper heritable bonds, but, on the other hand, will include debentures of companies. If a holder of such a security as a debenture of a public company, which is the description of the security here in question, desire to sell it during its currency, while no doubt he might be able at times to procure a purchaser otherwise, he would, in the general case, resort to an agent or broker who transacts business on the stock markets, and so find a purchaser, and it is notorious that railway bonds and debentures are dealt in on the stock markets, for the quotations for many of these are daily published in the stock lists appearing in the newspapers. This is enough to shew that a debenture of a company is not only in a wide but in a proper sense a security of such a description as to be capable of being sold in a stock market.

It may be noticed that in section 69 of the Statute of 1870, and the schedule under the head "Contract-Note," the term "marketable security" is used with reference to the subject of a broker's or an agent's transactions, and it cannot, I should think, be doubted that debentures of railway or other companies bought or sold by a broker would be entered in his contract-note in the same way as debenture stock or shares of a company. It may further be observed that if the provision of section 13 of the Act 51 Victoria is not to include such a debenture as is here in question as a marketable security by or on behalf of a corporation or company, it is not easy to give the words of the statute any practical effect, for by other provisions of the statutes the transfer of all shares and stocks of companies have been otherwise expressly made liable to ad valorem duties. No. 15.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners is right, and should be affirmed, and that the transfer in question is liable to be assessed and charged with ad valorem conveyance on sale stamp-duty charged under the Stamp Act, 1870. Nov. 9, 1888. Texas Land and Cattle Co. Limited, v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

LORD ADAM.—The materials for the decision of this question are contained within a very narrow compass. The security transferred was a debenture of the Texas Land Company, and what we have to decide is, whether such an instrument is a “marketable security” within the meaning of the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97. If it is, the stamp-duty chargeable is 10s. per cent, if it is not, then the transfer escapes with a duty of 6d. per £100.

The Act supplies us with a definition of the words “marketable security.” It is defined as meaning “a security of such a description as to be capable of being sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom,” and the question comes to be whether the transfer of this debenture bond was a security “capable of being sold in any stock market of the United Kingdom.” Now, I can hardly imagine more comprehensive words. There must be some limitation contemplated by the Legislature, but I do not know where it is to be found. As regards the present case, however, there can be no doubt that this is a security which is saleable in a stock market. The transfer is of a bond numbered 895 of a series of such bonds, and it appears to me that a stock market is just the place to take such a security in order to sell it. The words of the clause “capable of being sold” point to a kind or description of security, and it certainly appears to me that the transfer of a debenture bond is a security which is capable of being sold in a stock market. I therefore think that this security falls to be dealt with under the Act 51 and 52 Vict. cap. 8, and is liable to the same duty as is charged on a conveyance on sale.

LORD MURE concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

ANDREW YUILE MACFARLANE AND OTHERS (Pattison's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.—Boyd.

No. 16.

THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH, Claimants.—Lee.

MRS MARGARET MACGREGOR AND OTHERS, Claimants.—R. V. Campbell.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, Claimants.—C. J. Guthrie.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS, Claimants.—Strachan.

MRS ROBINA RITCHIE OR GIDDINGS, Claimant.—Strachan.

RODERICK URQUHART AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Low—Baxter—Kennedy—Crole.

Nov. 9, 1888.*
Pattison's
Trustees v.
University of Edinburgh.

Writ—Testament—Deletions—Marginal additions.—Per Lord M'Laren, Ordinary.—(1) If a will or codicil is found with the signature cancelled, or lines drawn through the dispositive or other essential clause of the instrument, then

No. 16.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Pattison's
Trustees v.
University of Edinburgh.

on proof that the cancellation was done by the testator himself, or by his order, with the intention of revoking the will, the will is to be held as revoked; otherwise it is to be treated as a subsisting will. (2) If a will or codicil is found with one or more of the legacies or particular provisions scored out, that raises no case for inquiry as to the testator's intention to revoke the instrument in whole; a question is raised only as to his intention to revoke the particular provision, which will not be held to have been revoked unless upon evidence that the scoring was done by the testator himself or by his direction with the intention of revoking the clause, and the authentication of the deletion by the testator's initials is sufficient evidence of such intention. (3) Marginal or interlineal additions, apparently in the testator's handwriting, will not be held part of the instrument unless authenticated by his signature or initials, for until such authentication he cannot be supposed to have finally resolved to make the addition. (4) When a will or codicil contains words scored out and others inserted in their place the cancellation is conditional on the substituted words taking effect, so that if the substituted words are rejected for want of authentication the will is to be read as if there had been no deletion.

OUTER-HOUSE
Lord M'Laren.

THE trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement, with relative codicils, of the late Dr Thomas Hill Pattison, brought this action of multiplepinding for the distribution of his estate. Claims were lodged by the University of Edinburgh, and other public bodies and individuals, raising various questions regarding the construction of the settlement, and also certain questions relating to the authentication of alterations in portions of the writings. The latter questions, which alone form the subject of this report, depended on the following considerations, appearing ex facie of the writings as produced or by admission of the parties.

On the margin of the trust-disposition and settlement (which was dated 12th April 1876) there was written in pencil,* opposite to a legacy (numbered "decimo quarto") of £100 left to Mrs Robina Ritchie or Giddings, the letters "Pd." There was no evidence or admission that these letters were holograph of the testator. It was not disputed that Mrs Giddings had not received £100 from the testator.

On the margin of the same deed, opposite to the beginning of the last purpose (being a bequest of the residue to the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh), were the words (admittedly holograph of the testator) "Delete—T. H. Pattison," and on the margin at the end of the same purpose these words (also holograph) were repeated.

At the end of the trust-disposition and settlement were two short codicils, dated respectively 19th August 1880 and 10th July 1882. They were both deleted by the pen being drawn across them, and at the end of the last was this note, admittedly in the writing of the deceased, and referring to both codicils, "The last eleven lines (11) are hereby delete. T. H. Pattison."

At the end of the words just quoted was another codicil, dated 10th March 1885, which was held to be proved in a petition to the Court under the Conveyancing Act, 1874.

There were also two codicils on separate sheets of paper.

In the first, which was dated 12th August 1880, certain bequests in favour of the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, in supplement of the residuary bequest in the trust-disposition, were deleted, but the deletions were not authenticated by signatures or initials, nor were there any marginal additions opposite to them. There was also this bequest, as (apparently) written originally,—“If any of the family of Mr Joseph M'Gregor, accountant, Edinburgh, are alive, I would like them to receive Two thousand pounds sterling." In the codicil as produced the word "Two" No. 16. was deleted and the word "One" written on the margin opposite with a caret prefixed. There were also certain marks across the word "Two," Nov. 9, 1888. Pattison's Trustees v. University of Edinburgh. which the trustees in their print of the will interpreted to be the initials of the testator, thus,—<sup>T.</sup> "Two," but which the Lord Ordinary, from an <sup>H. P.</sup> inspection of a photographic copy of the deed deciphered to mean / 2, being a stroke of deletion and a caret mark with a cipher above it. This codicil was tested, and was admittedly probative under the Conveyancing Act, 1874.

* All the other alterations after mentioned were in ink.

The other separate codicil, dated 22d May 1881, was a holograph deed, by which, inter alia, all the bequests to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary were revoked.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 11th August 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, Finds that the will of the deceased Dr Thomas Hill Pattison consists of the following writings—(1) Trust-disposition and settlement dated 12th April 1876; (2) codicil dated 12th August 1880; (3) codicil dated 22d May 1881; and (4) codicil dated 10th March 1885: Finds, with respect to the contents of the said trust-disposition and settlement, that no effect is to be given to the marginal note 'Pd.' written opposite to legacy 'decimo quarto,' and that it is unnecessary to treat the residuary clause of said deed as cancelled by the marginal inscription written opposite to it, in respect that the said residuary clause is formally revoked by the codicil dated 22d May 1881: Finds, with respect to the contents of the codicil dated 12th August 1880, that the word 'Two,' part of a legacy of £2000, in the fourth line counting from the foot of the first page, is deleted, and the word 'One' written in the margin substituted therefor by the usual marks of deletion and induction; but that these alterations, not being authenticated by the testator's subscription or initials, have no testamentary effect, and the codicil is to be read as containing a legacy of £2000 in favour of the family of Mr Joseph Macgregor: Finds further that the other words deleted in said codicil are to be read as part thereof, notwithstanding such deletion, reserving the effect of subsequent variation of the purposes of the codicil under these heads: Appoints the case to be further heard on the question of the interpretation or construction of said testamentary writings, and grants leave to reclaim."* * "OPINION.—In this action of multiplepointing there are really two cases, or causes, a case of probate, and a case of interpretation.

---

"In introducing a new term into the vocabulary of the law of Scotland (which, as a contributor to the literature of this subject, I may be permitted to do), I must begin by defining its meaning. By 'probate' I, of course, do not mean a copy of the will and codicils on stamped vellum. Nor do I use the term in any sense having relation to the practice or procedure of the division of the High Court of Justice, which takes cognisance of questions of probate in England. I mean by probate simply the proof or ascertainment in law and fact of what are the words and writings which constitute the will of the deceased person whose estate is under administration. This is a question which necessarily takes precedence of questions of interpretation; because the meaning of a particular clause or provision may be different, according as the deed containing it is to stand by itself, or to be controlled by some other deed or writing under the testator's hand (which may or may not be entitled to testamentary effect). In the present action, it appears to me to be impossible to come to a satisfactory determination of the questions of interpretation which have been argued, until it is first settled what are the actual terms of the testator's will

No. 16.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Pattison's
Trustees v.
University of Edinburgh.

and codicils. To avoid the confusion which is likely to result from trying to do two things at once, I have, in this interlocutor, confined my decision to the question of probate, in the belief that if the parties wish this question to be considered by a higher Court, they will find it advantageous to have this part of the case reviewed at the present stage, after which the questions as to the effect to be given to cumulative provisions in favour of certain legatees can be more conveniently considered.

"I. The writings which have been laid before the Court consist of a regularly attested will and five codicils. Three of the codicils are written on the last page of the will, and there is a separate paper containing two codicils. In regard to the first of these, and also as to the will itself, a question arises as to the effect to be given to deletions and alterations, which are not, except in one instance, authenticated by the testator's subscription.

"(1) As to the will, which is dated 12th April 1876, the only question is that of the effect to be given to the deletions. This point will be afterwards considered.

"(2 and 3) At the end of the will the testator had written two codicils, apparently holograph, dated respectively 19th August 1880 and 10th July 1882. These have been cancelled, apparently by the testator himself, by drawing the pen across the lines, and writing these words below them, 'The last eleven lines (11) are hereby delete. T. H. PATTISON.' It is admitted that this docquet is holograph of the testator, whence it results that the codicils of 19th August 1880 and 10th July 1882 do not form part of Dr Pattison's will.

"(4) The first of the two codicils, which are written on a separate paper, is dated 12th August 1880, and is signed by Dr Pattison, in presence of witnesses who append their designations to their signatures. This codicil is accordingly a probative writ under the provisions of the Conveyancing Scotland Act, 1874; and the only question to be considered at the present stage is the effect to be given to deletions.

"(5) The second of the two codicils which are written on the separate paper is admitted to be holograph. It is therefore a part of Dr Pattison's will.

"(6) The codicil of 10th March 1885, written on the last page of the will, has been proved under a petition to the Court, as set forth in condescendence 20 for the trustee.

"II. I pass to the consideration of the effect to be given to the deletions and alterations which have been put upon the will and the codicil of 12th August 1880. Although the questions which have arisen are not altogether new, I cannot find that the subject has been systematically considered, in previous decisions, and it appears to me to be eminently desirable that rules should be laid down of general application to such cases. My view on this subject may be stated in four propositions, all of which appear to be necessary for the decision of the case before me:—

"(1) If a will or codicil is found with the signature cancelled, or with lines drawn through the dispositive or other essential clauses of the instrument, then, on proof that the cancellation was done by the testator himself, or by his order, with the intention of revoking the will, the will is to be held revoked; otherwise it is to be treated as a subsisting will. So much appears to be established by the decisions, amongst which the older decisions of the English Courts may be referred to in illustration of what I conceive to be a principle common to the systems of law of England and Scotland.

"(2) If a will or codicil is found with one or more of the legacies or particular provisions scored out, I should hold that this raises no case for inquiry as to the testator's intention to revoke the instrument in whole, but that a question is raised as to the intention to revoke the particular provision; and I should not hold the provision revoked unless upon evidence that the scoring was done by the testator himself or by his direction with the intention of revoking the clause. If the deletion were authenticated by the testator's initials, recognisable as his handwriting, I should hold this to be sufficient proof that the deletion was the act of the testator, the full signature being only necessary to an act of posifive disposition or bequest. It is hardly necessary to give reasons for denying effect to unauthenticated and unproved deletions, because to hold the contrary would be equivalent to saying that anyone who could get access to a will might increase the interest of the residuary legatees by drawing his pen through the legacy clauses.

No. 16.

Nov. 9, 1888.

Pattison's
Trustees v.
University of Edinburgh.

"(3) If a will or codicil is found with marginal or interlineal additions, apparently in the testator's handwriting, I should not hold these to be part of the instrument, except in so far as they are authenticated by the signature or initials of the testator. My reason is that our law does not give any effect to unsigned writings even when holograph. This may be right or may be wrong. I think it right; but the principle is that until the signature is adhibited the trust is supposed not to have declared his intention to be in the terms written down. Now, I cannot see that there is or ought to be any difference of principle in regard to the necessity of subscription between the case of a codicil written at the end of a will or on a separate paper, and the case of a marginal or interlineal addition, which if written after the execution of the instrument can only receive effect as a codicil. Having regard to previous decisions, I think that in the case of marginal additions or interlineations the authentication may be by initials; on the ground that the subscription at the end of the writing covers everything, and that the initial letters of the grantor's name suffice to authenticate the new matter as part of the instrument.

"(4) When the will or codicil contains words scored out and others inserted in their place, I think that the cancellation of the words in the original writing is conditional on the substituted words taking effect. Accordingly, if the substituted words are rejected on the ground that they are unsigned, the deletion is also to be rejected, and the will ought to be read in its original form.

"Having explained my views as to how deletions and additions made after the execution of a will or codicil ought to be treated, I shall now, without farther comment, apply the rules above set forth to the points of the case.

"(1) In the will or trust-disposition, appendix, p. 50, opposite the legacy of £100 to Mrs Robina Giddings, someone (apparently the testator) has written the abbreviation 'Pd.' It is averred by the legatee, p. 45, and her statement is not disputed, that she did not in fact receive a gift of £100 from the deceased. This case offers an excellent illustration of the justice of the rule contained in my third proposition, that no effect should be given to unsigned marginal additions. Doubtless Dr Pattison intended to make a gift of the £100 to Mrs Giddings in his lifetime, and he wrote the word 'Pd.' on the margin to remind himself that on this being done the legacy might be cancelled. But he did not put his initials to the docquet, and that being so, I find that there is no cancellation of this legacy.

"(2) On the margin of the same deed, appendix, p. 60, opposite the beginning and the end of a bequest of the residue of his estate to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary the testator has written 'Delete. T. H. Pattison.' It is not necessary to make a formal finding to the effect that the residuary clause is cancelled, because by the holograph codicil of 22d May 1881 the testator revoked all gifts to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary. But had the revocation depended on the signed marginal note alone, I should have held this to be an effectual revocation.

"(3) In the codicil of 12th August 1880, two provisions in favour of the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary are scored. As already stated there is a valid revocation by codicil of all bequests to that institution. It is, therefore, unnecessary to inquire whether these two lines were scored by the testator with the intention of cancelling the bequests.

"(4) In the same codicil, in a bequest to the family of Mr Joseph Macgregor, there is an alteration which raises the whole question as above considered. The print (p. 63 D), does not, in my judgment, accurately represent the alteration, and I accordingly refer to the photographic copy, p. 1, line 4 from foot of page.

"The legacy in question is a legacy of £2000 to the family of Mr Joseph Macgregor, accountant, Edinburgh. The word 'Two' is delete, and the word

No. 16.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Pattison's
Trustees v.
University of Edinburgh.

'one' is written in the margin with a mark of induction or 'caret' prefixed to it. The theory of the trustee, by whom the print of the deeds is furnished, is that the marks written across the word 'Two' are the initials of the testator's name, and it is so printed (p. 63 D). To my eyes the mark appears to be this, /  $\frac{2}{\Delta}$ , a vertical stroke obliterating the first letter of the word 'Two,' and a caret with a cypher over it to indicate that the word written in the margin is to be taken in at this place. If I could recognise these marks as a possible representation of the testator's initials, then, in accordance with my third proposition, I should hold the alteration to be the equivalent of a codicil substituting a legacy of £1000 in place of the original legacy of £2000. But not only do I fail to recognise the testator's initials in these markings, but I do not believe that they were put there as a symbolical representation of the testator's name. I believe they are what I have stated, a combined deletion and induction mark. That being so, I consider that this is an unauthenticated alteration, and that in accordance with my fourth proposition no effect ought to be attributed either to the marginal addition or to the deletion of the word 'Two,' which deletion I conceive to be conditioned on the valid substitution of the word 'One' written in the margin."

This interlocutor was not reclaimed against.

ROBERTSON & WALLACE, S.S.C.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—JAMES ROBERTSON, Solicitor—PETER DOUGLAS, S.S.C.—GORDON, PRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co, W.S.—HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—WILLIAM HAMILTON, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 17.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Morley v.
Jackson.

AGNES MARY MORLEY, Pursuer (Respondent).—Strachan—J. Wilson.
JAMES ALLEN JACKSON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Murray.

Jurisdiction—Arrestments ad fund. jur.—Summons—Amendment—Status.—The daughter of A B deceased raised an action against the trustee under his deed of settlement, C B his widow, and his sister, concluding (1) for declarator of legitimacy; (2) for payment of legitim out of his estate; (3) for payment of aliment in the event of decree not being obtained under the first two conclusions. The pursuer averred that her mother had been regularly married to A B in ignorance of the fact that he was married to C B. None of the defenders were resident within the jurisdiction of the Court, but as regarded the trustee the pursuer averred that jurisdiction had been constituted against him by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem. The defenders pleaded that the arrestment did not found jurisdiction as the action raised a question of status, and that A B had been domiciled in England, and that the law of England did not recognise legitimacy by a putative marriage. At adjustment the pursuer amended the summons by deleting the averments as to C B's marriage to A B, and stating that A B's marriage to the pursuer's mother was a lawful marriage.

The Court dismissed the action, holding that it raised a question of status, and that jurisdiction could not in such an action be founded by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem.

Opinions, per Lord Shand and Lord Adam, that if a summons as served is bad for want of jurisdiction it cannot be made good by subsequent alterations.

Jurisdiction—Forum conveniens.—The child of a deceased person raised an action concluding (1) for declarator of legitimacy; (2) for payment of legitim out of his estate; (3) for payment of aliment in the event of decree not being obtained under the first two conclusions. The action was directed against the trustee of the deceased under his deed of settlement, his widow, and his sister, the two latter of whom were interested in respect of their pecuniary rights and interests in the estate of the deceased. All the defenders were in England, but the pursuer alleged that she had used arrestments to found jurisdiction against the trustee.

Opinions, per Lord Shand and Lord Adam, that in the absence of the widow and sister, who were the real parties interested in the action as defenders, the Court of Session was non forum conveniens to try the question with the trustee, No. 17. who was only interested as a holder of funds.

AGNES MARY MORLEY, residing with her mother, Mrs Agnes Newberry <sup>Nov. 9, 1888.</sup> or Morley, at 21 Salisbury Street, Edinburgh, raised this action against <sup>Morley v. Jackson.</sup> James Allen Jackson, of the burgh of Kingston-upon-Hull, as sole surviving trustee under the deed of settlement of the late Mr Thomas Morley, <sup>1st Division.</sup> and also against Catherine Anderson or Morley, "presently residing with <sup>Lord Lee.</sup> John Anderson, 26 Queen Street, Carlisle, widow of the said deceased Thomas Morley," and also against Mrs Mary Ann Morley or Jackson, <sup>B.</sup> Hull, sister of the deceased.

The pursuer concluded (1) for declarator that she was the lawful child of the deceased Thomas Morley, and as such entitled to all the rights and privileges of a child born in lawful wedlock as regards inheritance, succession, or otherwise. (2) For exhibition by Jackson of an account of his intromissions as trustee. (3) For decree ordaining him to pay her legitim out of the estate of the deceased. (4) For decree ordaining him to pay her an annual sum of £10 of aliment in the event of her not obtaining decrees under the first two conclusions of the summons.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "The late Mr Morley first married Helen Hunter, who belonged to Dumfries. She died without issue; and thereafter, in or about March 1868, he married the defender, Catherine Anderson. He lived with her in lodgings, first at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and afterwards at Carlisle, until about 1873, when owing to disagreements between them they separated. They never lived together again, and they had no communication thereafter with each other. No children were born of the marriage with the said Catherine Anderson. After the separation Mr Morley returned to Scotland." (Cond. 3) "Whilst living in Edinburgh in 1876 and the beginning of 1877 Mr Morley courted Agnes Newberry, daughter of William Newberry, fishing-rod maker, Canongate, Edinburgh, with a view to marriage. He fraudulently represented himself as being free to marry, telling her that he was a widower; and she, being in complete ignorance that he had then a living wife, relying upon his representations, and bona fide believing that no impediment existed, agreed to marry him. Accordingly, after due proclamation of banns, they were regularly married by the Reverend James Macnair, minister of the parish of Canongate, on 28th April 1877."

The pursuer further averred that her father and mother lived together as husband and wife in Edinburgh, and on 22d December 1877 she was born of the marriage, and that her father registered her birth as that of his lawful child. That her father and mother continued to live together as husband and wife at various places in Edinburgh till Mr Morley's death in 1887. "During all that time the said Agnes Newberry or Morley was kept in entire ignorance of the fact that there was a surviving wife of a previous marriage. She became aware of that circumstance only after Mr Morley's death."

None of the defenders were resident in Scotland, and there was no averment that jurisdiction had been constituted against Mrs Morley and Mrs Jackson. With regard to Jackson, however, the pursuer averred that she had used arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem against him, conform to execution thereof, attaching furniture and effects belonging to him as trustee foresaid.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction, in respect that, 1, no funds belonging to the defenders or any of them were attached by the arrestment; and 2, that an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem does not subject questions of status to the jurisdiction of the Court. (3) The deceased Mr Morley having been a domiciled Englishman, and the

No. 17. English law not recognising legitimacy by a putative marriage, the pursuer cannot obtain decree of declarator as concluded for.
 Nov. 9, 1888. Morley v. Jackson.

The defenders averred that Thomas Morley was a domiciled Englishman.

At the adjustment of the record the pursuer amended her averments to the following effect :—(Cond. 2) “ The late Mr Morley first married Helen Hunter, who belonged to Dumfries. After the marriage they lived for many years in Dumfries in a house of their own. Helen Hunter died on or about 25th February 1870, without leaving issue. The statement in the answer that Mr Morley married Catherine Anderson is denied.” (Cond. 3) “ On 28th April 1877 Mr Morley married Agnes Newberry, daughter of William Newberry, fishing-rod maker, Canongate, Edinburgh. The ceremony of marriage was performed, after due proclamation of banns, by the Reverend James Macnair, minister of the parish of Canongate. Thereafter the parties lived together as husband and wife at 27 Elder Street, Edinburgh, and on 22d December 1877 the said Agnes Newberry or Morley gave birth to the pursuer there.” The pursuer then repeated the concluding averments in cond. 3 as originally framed. Articles 4 and 5 of the condescendence contained averments as to the articles and funds said to have been arrested to found jurisdiction against Jackson.

The defender Jackson in answer 2 averred that on the 15th March 1870 Mr Morley had married Catherine Anderson, and in answer 3 he averred that the marriage between Mr Morley and the pursuer's mother was bigamous, and that the latter was fully aware of this at the date of the marriage.

In his answers Jackson disputed the averments in conds. 4 and 5 for the pursuer, and further averred ;—“ Further, an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem does not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court a question of status. The defenders are domiciled in England, and are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts. Quoad ultra denied. Explained further that the pursuer, by means of altering the condescendence at adjustment, has attempted entirely to change the nature of the action. Reference is made to the condescendence as originally served with the summons. The summons as laid was a declarator of legitimacy upon the ground of a putative marriage, and the condescendence recognised and admitted the marriage of Catherine Anderson. The summons is now sought to be used as equivalent to a declarator of marriage, and the person vitally affected thereby, viz., Catherine Anderson, is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court.”

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer, as the only lawful child of the late Mr Morley, is entitled to a share of his moveable estate, and the defender, Mr Jackson, having intromitted therewith, is bound to account to her therefor. (3) In the event of the pursuer failing to obtain decree of count, reckoning, and payment as concluded for, she is entitled, as the child of the late Mr Morley, to aliment as concluded for. (4) Separatim, In the event of the defenders succeeding in establishing as valid the alleged marriage of the deceased with the defender, Catherine Anderson, decree of declarator of legitimacy ought to be pronounced as concluded for.

On 12th July the Lord Ordinary allowed the summons to be amended at the bar by the deletion of the words “ widow of the said deceased Thomas Morley.” Further, having heard counsel in the Procedure Roll, and considered the cause with the minute for the tutor ad litem, before further advising allowed to the pursuer and to the defender James Allen Jackson a proof of their respective averments in articles 4 and 5 of the condeascendence and answers thereto, so far as relating to the jurisdiction as against the said defender. No. 17.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—It was quite clear that the action as originally laid was a declarator of legitimacy upon the ground of a putative marriage. It involved therefore a question of status. There was admittedly no jurisdiction against Mrs Morley and Mrs Jackson, and there was also none in point of law against the other defender. Arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem had been used against him, but it was quite settled that such would not constitute jurisdiction in a question of status.<sup>1</sup> The Lord Ordinary had erred in allowing the amendment, the obvious purpose of which was to convert the action into a declarator of marriage. Even, however, as amended, the action was in its leading conclusion and in its character a declarator of legitimacy. The other conclusions were clearly ancillary, and decree could not be pronounced in them unless on the assumption of the first conclusion being given effect to. The de quo queritur was whether Catherine Anderson was married or not, and that question lay behind any pecuniary claim by the child. Even then as amended the plea of no jurisdiction as against Jackson fell to be given effect to. But assuming that jurisdiction had been properly constituted against him, this was not a forum conveniens to try the question, which was complicated with the interests of the other two defenders. The interest of the widow was to be before the world as Mr Morley's legal wife, and the interest of his sister was to get the fee of her brother's estate on the expiry of the liferent of the widow. These respective interests would be prejudiced if the pursuer succeeded in this action. They were admittedly not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, and as Jackson was only interested as a holder of funds the question could not be tried with him in their absence.<sup>2</sup>

Nov. 9, 1888.
Morley v.
Jackson.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action was now mainly a petitory one, and the arrestments used were quite sufficient to found jurisdiction as against Jackson in such an action.

At advising,—

LORD MURR.—The pursuer of this action sets forth in the summons that she is the daughter and only child of the deceased Thomas Morley, and concludes, first, for declarator of legitimacy; second, for count, reckoning, and payment; and, third, for payment of a sum as aliment in the event of the pursuer not obtaining decree in terms of the two first conclusions of the summons. The parties called are Mr Jackson, a trustee under two marriage-contracts of the pursuer's father in the English form, Mrs Catherine Anderson or Morley, designed in the summons as it was originally brought as "widow of the deceased Thomas Morley" (the pursuer's father), and Mrs Mary Ann Morley or Jackson. These parties are all resident in England, and this Court has plainly no jurisdiction against them, unless something has been done to create that jurisdiction. It is alleged that jurisdiction has been founded by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem against Mr Jackson, but there is no such allegation as to the other defenders. In these circumstances the defenders all plead "no jurisdiction." Their first plea in law is,—“No jurisdiction, in respect that (1) no funds belonging to the defenders, or any of them, were attached by the arrestment, and (2) that an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem does not subject questions of status to the jurisdiction of the Court.” Now, the first branch of this plea is

<sup>1</sup> Scruton v. Gray and Another, Dec. 1, 1772, M. 4822.

<sup>2</sup> Brown's Trustees v. Palmer, Dec. 17, 1830, 9 S. 224.

No. 17.
Nov. 9, 1888.
Morley v.
Jackson.

plainly good as regards the two defenders Mrs Morley and Mrs Jackson, as they are resident in England, and no arrestments have been used against them. In a question, then, with them the jurisdiction of this Court cannot be maintained, and they are entitled to have the action dismissed as regards them on that ground.

The case of Jackson is different. Certain funds have been arrested, and the pursuer says that she has thus constituted jurisdiction against him. It is with the view apparently of disposing of that question that the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the interlocutor reclaimed against, by which his Lordship "allows to the pursuer and to the defender James Allen Jackson a proof of their respective averments in articles 4 and 5 of the condescendence and answers thereto, so far as relating to the jurisdiction as against the said defender." This allowance applies solely to the question whether there had been arrestment of funds sufficient to constitute jurisdiction, and if we were dealing with a purely petitory action the course taken by the Lord Ordinary would have been the natural one to follow, having regard to the contradictory statements of the pursuer and defender as to the funds which have been arrested. This, however, is not an ordinary action of payment, but in substance and in its leading conclusion it is an action to constitute the status of legitimacy. That being the nature of the action, the defenders have brought the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary under review, on the ground that his Lordship was mistaken in allowing proof, because no jurisdiction could be founded by the arrestments, as the action was one for regulating status, and in such an action jurisdiction cannot be constituted by arrestment. We have heard parties on this plea, and have been referred to certain authorities, and in particular to the case of Scruton v. Gray, M. 4822, in support of the plea. Now, it appears to me that substantially the same question as that here raised was raised and decided in that action. The action was one for declarator not of legitimacy but of marriage, brought against a native of Ireland, who had been a student in Glasgow, and who was alleged to have entered into some engagement with the pursuer, and to have been married there. There was a conclusion for declarator of marriage, and a petitory conclusion for aliment in the event of the conclusion for declarator of marriage not being established. The objection was raised that jurisdiction could not be constituted by the arrestment of funds belonging to a foreigner when the action on which the arrestment was used raised a question of status, and the Court had that matter very deliberately brought under its consideration. The case was first argued before the Commissaries, who repelled the objection. There was then a hearing in presence, when their Lordships unanimously came to the conclusion that jurisdiction could not be founded by arrestment in order to try a question of status. There is, I think, nothing in the circumstances of the present case to take it out of the rule there laid down. That action was for declarator of marriage, and in the event of that declarator not being obtained, for aliment; this action is for declarator of legitimacy, and in the event of that not being obtained, for aliment. It therefore appears to me that there is no necessity for doing what the Lord Ordinary has done, and I think that, on the authority of the case I have mentioned, we ought to recall the interlocutor, and dismiss the action on the plea of no jurisdiction.

LORD SHAND.—I have had no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion. It was scarcely contended that the action as laid and originally brought into Court was one in which the Court had jurisdiction. At all events, I should No. 17.

 without difficulty decide against any such contention, because the pursuer set forth expressly that her purpose was to have it decided by decree of declarator that Nov. 9, 1888.
 she was legitimate, because of a putative marriage between Agnes Newberry, her Morley v.
 mother, and the deceased Mr Morley. The pursuer, on record, stated that at Jackson.
 the time of her mother's marriage to Morley in 1877, he had been previously married to a lady in England still living. In the summons we find this lady, the defender Catherine Anderson or Morley, designed as the "widow of the deceased Thomas Morley," and in the narrative of facts, it was stated by the pursuer that Mr Morley, her father, had in 1868 married Catherine Anderson, and had lived with her as her husband for five years.

Another defender is the sister of Mr Morley, who was represented as being interested in respect of her legal rights in her brother's estate, which she would lose in the event of the putative marriage, and alleged legitimacy of the pursuer being established.

In the case then as so presented, it is quite clear, in the first place, that this was an action for declarator in regard to status, and in the second place, that the proper defenders were not the defender Jackson, who is a mere holder of funds which belonged to the deceased Mr Morley, but the widow of the deceased and his sister. These latter were the parties really interested in the question of status raised, which, if decided in the pursuer's favour, would seriously affect their pecuniary rights and interests in Mr Morley's succession. It is not suggested that there was any ground of jurisdiction against these defenders. But farther, no jurisdiction was created even against Jackson, because arrestments of the funds of one not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court are of no avail to create jurisdiction in questions of status. It is therefore clear that the action as laid, served, and called was subject to the fatal plea that there was no jurisdiction.

But it is said that after the defenders had appeared and pleaded that the Court had no jurisdiction, the pursuer has got rid of the force of that plea by extensive alterations and amendments made on the summons and record, and made it a good action. No doubt an extensive power of amendment is allowed by the Court of Session Act of 1868. The Act enjoins the Court to allow such amendments as will enable the real question between the parties to be tried. It seems to me, however, that the extensive amendments here made have been designed to avoid the trial of the real question in controversy which is the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the pursuer. The pecuniary conclusion is now put in the foreground, and the declarator of legitimacy is said to be ancillary merely. Even in its altered state I do not think the true nature of the action has been changed. The true question is still one of status. If the pursuer were held to be a legitimate child her rights of succession would be clear. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that the Court has still no jurisdiction in the case as it is now presented.

But I am further of opinion that if an action is in all its conclusions bad, because there is no jurisdiction over the defenders when it is served, it cannot be made good by subsequent alterations on the summons and record. It would indeed be an anomalous proceeding if in an action where the Court had at first no jurisdiction, it being truly a declarator of status, it were possible to introduce amendments which would convert it into a mere pecuniary claim, and thus create jurisdiction for the first time after the defenders had appeared in Court in an action which they were entitled to have at once dismissed.

No. 17.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Morley v.
Jackson.

I may add that even if there had been jurisdiction against Jackson, because of residence in this country, I should have had great difficulty in holding that the action could be allowed to proceed, looking to the fact that the real defenders are out of the jurisdiction. I should in that case have been disposed to hold that the action should be dismissed on the ground of forum non conveniens, as the proper and indeed the only parties to try the real question,—that of legitimacy,—are resident in England, and not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court.

LORD ADAM.—I am of opinion that no alteration on the conclusions of the action as originally brought can affect the question of jurisdiction. When it was served and called it was an action of declarator of legitimacy, and nothing else. The other conclusions were quite clearly ancillary to the leading conclusion. That was the time at which to consider the question of jurisdiction. It is obvious that if the Lord Ordinary had no jurisdiction then he had no power to write an interlocutor in the cause, except perhaps such as might be necessary to expiscate the question of jurisdiction. His only course was to dismiss the action. If he had not then jurisdiction, he had no power to allow amendments to be made on the summons, or to pronounce a binding order, and, therefore, the proper time to decide the question of jurisdiction was when the action was brought into Court. I am then of opinion that there was no jurisdiction in this case as the action was originally brought.

But if we are to take the action as now laid, I am still of opinion that there is no jurisdiction, because in its main conclusion, and in its real character, it is an action of declarator of legitimacy. That being so, on the authority of the case of Scruton v. Gray, M. 4822, as Lord Mure has pointed out, arrestments have no effect in founding jurisdiction in a question of status.

I also agree with Lord Shand that if we had jurisdiction against Jackson, we have no jurisdiction over the parties really interested as defenders, viz., the widow and sister of the deceased Thomas Morley; and I think that this is not a forum conveniens to try the case with a party alleged to be merely interested as a trustee.

LORD MURE.—I reserve my opinion on the question of forum non conveniens. I did not consider the question to have been raised, and I do not know what course the parties may take in the future.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and dismissed the action in respect of no jurisdiction.

ANDREW NEWLANDS, S.S.C.—JOHN CLEBK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 18.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Henderson v.
Henderson.

MRS ISABELLA MIDDLEBURY BURD OR HENDERSON, Pursuer.

ANDREW HENDERSON, Defender.

ANDREW HENDERSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—J. C. Thomson—Rhind.

MRS ISABELLA MIDDLEBURY BURD OR HENDERSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—

A. J. Young—Salvesen.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Wife's expenses—Separate estate.—A wife is not entitled to the expense of unsuccessfully defending an action of divorce if she is possessed of separate estate.

In cross actions of divorce for adultery the Lord Ordinary granted decree of divorce in both. The husband did not reclaim. The wife did, but was unsuccessful. She had saved £500 out of her earnings in business when living apart from her husband, he contributing nothing to her support. Held (diss. Lord Young) that she was possessed of separate estate in the sense of the above rule, and consequently that she was not entitled to the expenses of her defence. No. 18.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Henderson v.
Henderson.

ON 25th January 1888 Mrs Isabella Middler Burd or Henderson brought an action of divorce for adultery against her husband Andrew Henderson, and on 12th March he brought an action against her on the same ground. The actions were conjoined. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

On 22d June the Lord Ordinary (Lee) granted decrees of divorce in both actions, found the wife entitled to expenses in the action at her instance, and quoad ultra found neither party entitled to expenses.

Mrs Henderson reclaimed.

The Court having delivered opinions adhering on the merits, Mrs Henderson moved for expenses.

It was admitted that Henderson had left his wife, and did not contribute to her support; that she had since then maintained herself by carrying on business as a farmer and shopkeeper; and that out of her earnings she had saved a sum of £500.

Mrs Henderson argued;—A wife though guilty was entitled to defend an action of divorce at the expense of her husband if she had no separate estate,<sup>1</sup> and though the £500 here was in law separate estate it was not, looking to its origin and amount, sufficient to take the case out of the general rule. The expenses of a reclaiming note were on the same footing, unless the reclaiming note was utterly groundless, which could not be maintained here.

Henderson argued;—Mrs Henderson had £500 of separate estate, and that brought her within the well-settled exception.<sup>2</sup>

LORD YOUNG.—In my opinion the general rule is, as stated by Mr Young, that where a husband raises an action of divorce against his wife he must pay not only his own expenses but hers also, even although her defence has been unsuccessful. That is the general rule, and it was stated with some emphasis by the Lord President in a recent case which was cited to us, where a wife had unsuccessfully defended the action in the Outer-House, and had unsuccessfully reclaimed; and yet she was held entitled to get her whole expenses in both Courts, and that too although she alone had been the guilty party. I understand that an exception to this general rule is recognised where the wife has separate estate,—that is, where she is a person of independent means. I should be loth to bring within that exception, which the Court may or may not act upon in its discretion in the particular circumstances, the case of a deserted wife who has maintained herself by her own industry for many years, and has out of these earnings laid by some small savings, and to hold that because she has laid by these small savings she is a person possessed of separate estate, as a person of independent means. I am unable so to regard her. If out of these savings she were to pay her expenses in this action, it would leave her practically with nothing to live upon. I think that we should not take this case out of the general rule merely because the defender has a balance in the bank in her favour, the fruits of her own industry; and I cannot keep out of view the conduct of her husband, who has deserted her, who has not supported her, and to whose desertion and neglect of her it is due that she has been driven to earn

<sup>1</sup> Hoey v. Hoey, June 6, 1884, 11 R. 905.

<sup>2</sup> Fraser, Husband and Wife, pp. 1231 and 1235.

No. 18. her own livelihood, and to make these small savings, which now he seeks to take advantage of, in order to relieve him of a liability which otherwise the law would undoubtedly impose on him. I think he ought to be subjected to the whole expenses of this action.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Henderson v. Henderson.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—There is, I think, no doubt about the general rule. A wife, even although she is the guilty party, is entitled to her expenses in the Outer-House, and to her expenses in the Inner-House also if she has reasonable grounds for reclaiming. There is an exception to that general rule, where the wife has separate estate of her own. The question here is whether this case is within that exception. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that it was, for he did not find the wife entitled to expenses in the action at her husband's instance, in which she was unsuccessful, and it is now admitted that she has separate estate to the extent of £500. I am not disposed to hold that a wife, who has such estate of her own, and is guilty of adultery, is entitled to throw on her husband the whole expense of an action of divorce on account of that adultery. I therefore think we should affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as regards the Outer-House expenses, and of course it follows that the defender is not entitled to her expenses here.

LORD LEE.—I concur with Lord Rutherford Clark.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with the majority of your Lordships. I think that there is not much room for sympathy with either party. The wife has separate estate, she is in fault, and is therefore bound to pay her own expenses.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and as regarded the expenses of the reclaiming note, found neither party entitled to expenses.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 19. DAVID ROSS, Pursuer (Appellant).—Watt—Menzies.
WILLIAM KEITH, Defender (Respondent).—J. C. Thomson—Salvesen.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Ross v. Keith.

Reparation—Precautions for the safety of the public—Pond in private ground—Children.—A private road, about 25 yards long, led from a public road to a dwelling-house behind which was a pond. There was no gate at the entrance to the private road, but a fence separated the private road and the house from the pond. There was a gate in the fence close to the house.

Some children who had left the high road and gone along the private road, and through the gate (which was open), fell into the pond and were drowned.

In an action of damages by their father against the proprietor of the pond, held that the death of the children was not due to the fault of the defender.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen-
shire.

I.

DAVID ROSS, joiner, Pitmuxton, near Aberdeen, brought this action against William Keith, granite merchant, Aberdeen, for damages on account of the loss of two of his children, who were drowned in a pond at Pitmuxton, on the property of the defender.

The pursuer averred that his children were drowned in consequence of the carelessness and culpability of the defender, or of those for whom he was responsible, in allowing the pond, which was unsafe and dangerous, to remain unfenced and unprotected, and in giving unrestricted access thereto, without using effectual measures to protect young children.

The defender denied this averment, and stated that the ground was properly fenced; that it was his private property; and that it was not a place of public resort. No. 19.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's said children having been drowned through the negligence, carelessness, and inattention of the defender, or of those for whom he is responsible, in allowing the said hole to remain unfenced and unprotected, he is liable in damages and solatium to the pursuer as sued for. (3) The defender being in the knowledge that children were in the habit of frequenting the pond in question for amusement was bound to take effective means to prevent them from doing so, or to protect them from accidents. Nov. 9, 1888.
Ross v. Keith.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender having sufficiently enclosed the area containing the pond, and having used all other due and reasonable measures for excluding trespassers, and the children having been trespassing when the accident happened, no fault is attributable to the defender. (3) There being no right of access to or thoroughfare in the area containing the pond, the defender was not bound to fence the pond or use any further precautions than he did use to prevent accidents. (4) The pursuer's negligence in having permitted his children to stray without proper guardianship, and especially after he, or, at least, his wife, had become aware of the children having already found their way to the pond, having materially contributed to the accident, the defender is not liable in reparation to the pursuer.

A proof was allowed. It appeared from the evidence that the pond covered the area of a disused brick-work. It was about 25 yards off the Hardgate, a public road leading to Aberdeen. The line of the Deeside Railway bounded the field in which the pond was situated on the south; on the east it was separated from the public road by a considerable tract of cultivated ground; on the north there was a stone wall; and another stone wall separated it from the Hardgate on the west. In this second stone wall there was an opening, 15 feet wide, giving access from the Hardgate to a house belonging to the defender, which was built on ground overlooking the pond. From the opening in the wall to the house ran a railing which thus shut off from the pond the house and the area of ground on which it stood, as well as the road leading to it from the Hardgate. Originally the paling had been continuous, but the tenant of the house had for his convenience placed a gate in it, which thus gave direct access to the pond to persons from the house, and, consequently, also to persons leaving the public road and using the road to the house. This gate was 4½ feet wide, and was secured by a loop of rope which, after being fastened to it, was passed over an upright stob in the paling. The paling itself was partly four barred and partly three barred, and was in good condition. The ground was sometimes resorted to by children and by full-grown people, but whenever they were observed they were warned off by the defender's tenants, who had his instructions to do so.

On the day in question Mrs Ross, the wife of the pursuer, had gone into Aberdeen leaving her children at home. The eldest was a girl eight and a-half years old, and the youngest another girl of two and a-half. The children went along the Hardgate and passing through the opening in the wall, and thence through the gate in the paling, which was open, reached the pond. While playing on the bank, at its steepest point, which was in a direct line from the paling gate, one of the younger children fell in and was drowned; the eldest was also drowned in an attempt to save her sister. The water was about 5 feet deep.

On 28th April 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds in law that the defender is

No. 19. in fault, either personally or through the failure of his servants, in not shutting off the opening in the Hardgate from the public, and in allowing a gate to be placed in the said paling, and without providing appliances for its being kept shut when not in use: Finds, further, that contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer has not been established: Therefore finds the defender liable to the pursuer in damages: Assesses these at the sum of £100," &c.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Ross v. Keith.

On 23d May 1888 the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on appeal, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case sues for damages for the loss of his two children, who were drowned by falling into a pool of water in a dis-used clay-field belonging to the defender. There is a question whether this piece of ground with the pond in it was a place of public resort, or at least a place where the presence of the public was tolerated. I do not think that this was a place of public resort. It appears to me to be the effect of the evidence that the defender, both by himself and by his servants, did all that could reasonably be expected of him to prevent people from frequenting this ground. The import of that evidence is that people, and particularly children, were driven off by the defender's servants, and that even at the time when they most frequently came, namely, during frost, when people will trespass over any ground in order to get to a sheet of ice. No doubt people did come at times, children particularly, but so far as the evidence goes they came from all quarters, and over all obstacles that might be put in their way. There is evidence of this now in the case of the two poor children who were so unfortunately drowned. They had been seen only the day before clambering over a high stone wall to get to this very piece of water. I cannot hold that the proprietor or his tenant was bound to do more than use all reasonable endeavours to prevent children getting to the pond, and to shew that they did not intend to allow people to enter the ground. The question is, seeing that children did in fact come there sometimes, whether all reasonable care was taken to warn them not to do so, and by fencing off the dangerous locality to prevent them from straying into it.

I think it may be taken that the faults which the pursuer says are imputable to the defender in this matter are three in number. The first is that the fence separating this ground from the public road, which was a stone wall, had an opening in it which was not secured against the entrance of the public by any gate. In the second place, it is stated that the fence which enclosed the portion of the field containing the pond, as well as a house in the occupation of tenants of the proprietor—a stob and rail fence—had a gate in it which could easily be opened by anyone, even by a young child. Third, it is made matter of complaint that there was no special protection by fencing off the dangerous portion of the pond, where the bank was abrupt and the water deep.

As regards the first of these alleged faults, it appears that the opening was made in the stone wall so as to give an entrance to a house which had been <sup>1</sup> Balfour & Baird v. Brown, Dec. 5, 1857, 20 D. 238, 30 Scot. Jur. 124; Galloway v. King, June 11, 1872, 10 Macph. 788, 44 Scot. Jur. 449; Beveridge v. Kinnear, Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 387; Findlay v. Angus, Jan. 14, 1887, 14 R. 312; Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Jan. 24, 1888, 15 R. 323; M'Feat v. Rankin's Trustees, June 17, 1879, 6 R. 1043; Murray v. Lanarkshire Road Trustees, June 12, 1888, 15 R. 737; Clark v. Chambers, April 15, 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. Div. 327; Black v. Cadell, Feb. 20, 1812, 5 Pat. App. 567.

No. 19.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Ross v. Keith.

built on the ground inside the stone wall. It was an opening for the convenience of the inhabitants of that house, the tenants of the defender, and I think there was no obligation upon the defender to place, and that it would have been contrary to reason and practice to require him to place, any gate or fence at the wall to close this opening. It was just a cul de sac road, leading off the public road, for the benefit of the inhabitants of the house, and for nothing else. A private house standing in its own grounds may have a gate at the entrance to the avenue, but that is from a desire for privacy, and not from any regard to the safety of the public, and that there must be a gate across the entrance to the road leading to a house like that here in question is a proposition which in my opinion cannot be maintained. I am of course here assuming that there is no dangerous place along the road near the house, and accessible by the opening in the railing at the house, which is insufficiently fenced against members of the public who may happen to come in at the opening. That brings me to the second question.

That question relates to the fencing of the ground containing the pond. Now, there was a fence separating off that ground, and the question is whether this fence was not, unless disregarded, a sufficient protection of the ground fenced off on the assumption that it was dangerous. Originally it appears to have been a continuous fence, but one of the former tenants, who had a cabbage yard in the ground beyond the fence, inserted a small wicket gate into it—probably a hurdle gate—with a hinge of rope at one side, and on the other a loop passing over the nearest stob of the fence. Was that a sufficient fencing off of the dangerous piece of ground? In my opinion it was quite sufficient. I do not see what other fence could have been put up, unless it is contended that it was the duty of the defender to put up an impassable fence, that is to say, one which children could not get beyond either by climbing over or creeping between the bars. I cannot hold that it is the duty of the proprietor to make his ground practically impregnable to children. I am unable to hold that there is any duty on him to do more than indicate to the public when they are passing beyond what is intended for their use, and a stob and rail fence is in my opinion quite sufficient for that purpose. To hold that every piece of ground which contains some place or some thing that might be dangerous to children must be so fenced that children can enter only by what is practically a mode of siege would be to lay an intolerable burden on proprietors. That is my view of the case, on the footing that the fence had remained as it originally was, a continuous fence. Does the fact that a wicket gate was made in it make any difference? In my opinion it does not. I think children of eight, or even younger, can be instructed not to go through such gates leading to dangerous places, but even if they cannot be so instructed, it would in my opinion be to lay too heavy a burden on proprietors to hold that they must so fence that children cannot get in. It is hard no doubt upon poor people who cannot afford to hire persons to look after their children and to keep them out of danger, that their little ones are exposed to more risk than those of others, but I cannot see that the burden of protecting such children should on that account be laid on the neighbouring proprietors, and as my brother Lord Young remarked in the course of the discussion, it is wonderful how few children meet with accidents of this sort notwithstanding the absence of protection. I cannot hold that the existence of this gate, whether it was opened by these children themselves or was left open by other children who had gone in before them, is a ground for making the defender liable, as being in fault.

No. 19. That leaves only the third objection, that there was no special fence at the pond itself. If the opinion that I have already given that the fence was a sufficient warning to the public not to enter be sound, the proprietor was entitled to assume that the public would not disregard his warning, and consequently he was not bound to erect any special fence round the pond itself. No doubt there have been cases in which it has been held that the proprietors or tenants of dangerous places, such as quarries, are bound to erect fences, so that persons may not unwittingly fall into such a place, and so be injured or even killed. But then, I think, these cases proceed upon the principle that such places must be protected because persons in the exercise of their lawful calling, or in the use of the public highway, have to go so near that a slight deviation in the dark would lead them into the danger unless the spot is properly fenced. That, I think, is the principle of the case of Black, 5 Pat. Apps. 567, where there was a pit only some four yards from the public road, at a point where the road forked off in two directions, and there was no fence or anything to warn the public of the proximity of the danger. That is a very different case from the present. This hole into which these children fell is not a place of public resort; it is not on the road to any place, or dangerously near the road to any place, and as I have already said, the public were in the day-time sufficiently warned by the stob and rail fence not to go there, and there is no suggestion that people were in the habit of going near the pond at night. It is said, however, that such a place, because it is dangerous, must be child-proof, so that children should be unable to creep through or climb over, even although they can only get at it by passing fences. I cannot assent to such a doctrine. The question is whether the place was reasonably safe—whether such precautions were taken as are in accordance with the rules of common sense, and I think it would not be in accordance with the rules of common sense to require the approach to all places like this to be made child-proof.

There is another class of cases from which the present is easily distinguishable. I mean cases in which articles are left in such a position as to be a source of danger if interfered with, and so as to be a temptation to children or idle persons to interfere with them. If children by touching an article which is lying in a place they are in the habit of frequenting, and to which they have easy access, may bring down a heavy weight on their heads, or cause a dangerous explosion, it may well be that the proprietor should be held liable for having left this source of danger exposed. Similarly there is the sort of combination of circumstances which occurred in the case of Beveridge v. Kinnear, 11 R. 387, where the flap-door of one floor of a warehouse was knocked on to the street by a bale of goods which was being lowered into a cart from a higher floor, and killed a boy in the cart. There the Court held—and in my opinion most properly held—that it was the duty of the proprietor of the flat, from which the door fell, to have the door fastened in such a way as to meet all reasonable contingencies, of which the lowering of goods from the flat above was one, and that as he had failed in this duty he was liable in damages for the accident. Cases like these seem to me easily distinguishable from the present.

On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Sheriff is right, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and substantially upon the same grounds. This is not the case of a danger which people may come upon unawares and so receive injuries. The typical case of such a danger is that which your Lordship has put, of an unfenced pit in a field into which people might excusably step unawares and be injured ; in such a case it is, generally speaking, the duty of the proprietor to see that the source of danger is removed. There is nothing of that kind here. A pond of water is quite a different thing ; its dangers are manifest, just like those of the sea, or a loch, or a river, and the notion that anyone who has a picturesque loch or piece of river in his grounds is bound to put up a fence round to protect any children who may stray into his grounds is utterly extravagant. There is nothing that the public desires so much as free access to river banks, and they would resent bitterly any fencing which kept them from these banks, although no doubt children do sometimes get drowned when playing beside rivers.

No. 19.

Nov. 9, 1888.
Ross v. Keith.

The accident in this case occurred in broad daylight, and these children had not strayed unwittingly into the danger ; they went intending to overcome any obstacle in their way to this piece of water. Even if this piece of water had been in quite an open piece of ground, and the proprietor had invited or at least permitted the public to go there, I should for myself have doubted whether he thereby became responsible if children were drowned. The danger of going near the water is obvious, and if the parents permit their children to go to such places I am at a loss to see the ground on which it can be suggested that the proprietor is liable if the children are drowned. What about the lochs near Edinburgh ? Is St Margaret's fenced, or Dunsappie, or Duddingston ? and yet I think both children and grown-up people have been drowned there. Some people even trespass over a proprietor's grounds in order to get to some ornamental piece of water, but it could not be said that the proprietor of the ground over whose lands they thus trespassed was liable for any damage that happened to the trespassers. If my view of the law is right the pursuer's case is not stateable. If it be wrong, then we must hold that every piece of water, even the sea, must be fenced where children go to play, and where they might fall in and be drowned.

LORD LEE.—I think it well settled that the mere property of a subject from which damage arises is not sufficient by itself to render the proprietor responsible for the damage. There must be negligence on the part of the proprietor. He must have failed to perform some duty which the circumstances imposed upon him and the neglect of which led to the accident. If one digs a pit on his property close beside a public road he may be liable for the damage suffered by another who falls into it, on the ground that such use of his property in the circumstances imposed on him an obligation to use reasonable precautions against an obvious danger to the public using the road. But the mere existence upon a man's private property of a pit, a pond, or a precipice, will not create liability ; and I do not think that the case of Black v. Cadell, 5 Pat. App. 567, has ever been regarded as establishing any doctrine to the contrary. The question then here is, whether the defender was guilty of any negligence ? On that question (which is a question of fact) I concur in the opinion that the evidence does not shew that the accident to these poor children occurred through any fault of his. It does not shew that the place was insufficiently enclosed, or that the pursuer's children fell into the water through any neglect for which the defender is responsible. I think he cannot be held responsible on account of a gate having been left open by someone in the absence of proof that he is

No. 19. answerable for the negligence of the person who so left it. The case is essentially different both from the case of M'Martin v. Hannay, 10 Macph. 411, and Ross v. Keith, from that of M'Feat v. Rankin's Trustees, 6 R. 1043.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that on 13th July 1887, Dorothea Ann, and Violet, children of the pursuer, aged respectively eight and a-half and four and a-half years, were drowned in a pond on the defender's property at Pitmuxton, covering the area of a disused brickwork; (2) that the pond was not a place of public resort, and that it was sufficiently fenced off from the public road: Find in law that the death of the said children is not attributable to any fault on the part of the defender: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against," &c.

ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 20.

WILLIAM YOUNG (Young's Executor) AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—
M'Lennan.

Nov. 13, 1888.
Young.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Appointment of new trustee—Nobile Officium.—Where a bankrupt and the trustee in his sequestration had both died,—neither having been discharged,—and there remained, more than eighty years after the sequestration, certain funds for distribution, the Court, on the petition of the representatives of one of the commissioners, remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint a meeting of creditors to be held for the election of a new trustee.

1st Division.
B.

THE estates of Robert Murray were sequestrated in 1808 under the Act 33 George III. cap. 74, and Alexander Stronach was appointed trustee. The estate was in part distributed and certain dividends paid—a sum of £230 remaining in bank in 1826 to meet contingencies and a balance due to the trustee. The bankrupt, trustee, and commissioners being all dead, and neither bankrupt nor trustee having been discharged, the representatives of one of the commissioners, with concurrence of the trustee's testamentary trustees, now brought a petition for revival of the sequestration with a view to distribution of the balance of the estate, amounting to £1362, 10s., founding, inter alia, upon the 3d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and appealing to the nobile officium of the Court. The representatives of the bankrupt having stated that they had no interest to oppose the application, the Court pronounced this interlocutor<sup>1</sup>:—

"ORDER and direct that in future the proceedings in the process of sequestration of the estates of the late Robert Murray shall, from and after this date, be regulated by the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79, and Acts explaining and amending the same: Further, remit to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills to appoint a meeting of the creditors of the said Robert Murray to be held at such time and place as his Lordship may fix, to elect a trustee or trustees in succession and commissioners on the said sequestrated estates, with the whole powers conferred by the said statutes, and to appoint said meeting to be advertised in the Edinburgh Gazette, and with power to remit to the Sheriff of the sheriffdom of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn at Elgin to proceed further in said sequestration in manner mentioned in the statutes; and direct that the expense of this petition, and of the proceedings to follow thereon, shall form a final charge upon the funds of the estate."

<sup>1</sup> Authorities cited.—Thomson, Dec. 17, 1863, 2 Macph. 325; Gentles, Nov. 22, 1870, 9 Macph. 176.

THOMAS LIDDLE, S.S.C., Agent.

No. 20.

Nov. 13, 1888.
Young.

REVEREND HUGH MUNRO, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Murray—Shennan.
WILLIAM AND JAMES M'GEOGH, Defenders (Respondents).—H. Johnston.

No. 21.

Nov. 15, 1888.
Munro v.
M'Geogha.

Lease—Possession—Abatement of rent—Liquid and Illiquid.—In an action for payment of rent the defender alleged that the landlord had in the missives of lease bound himself to give possession of certain farm buildings in tenantable condition, and that he had failed to do so, and that the tenant was entitled to an abatement of rent. Held that the defence was relevant.

THE REVEREND HUGH MUNRO, of Barnaline, Argyllshire, sued William and James M'Geogh, joint tenants of the farm of Barnaline, for certain arrears of rent alleged to be due by them. The lease was for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1885, at a rent of £125, and stood upon missive letters passing between the pursuer's factor and the defenders.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

The defenders stated, inter alia;—"Admitted that the lease has not been signed by the defenders, inter alia, because it makes them accept as 'having been put into tenantable repair by the landlord' buildings which were so ruinous as to be untenable, which by the agreement contained in said missive-letters the pursuer was taken bound to put into good tenantable order, and which the pursuer has not up to the present date, in spite of constant demands by the defenders, both personally and through their agents, repaired." Their loss from the insufficiency of the buildings they estimated at £50 per annum. They further alleged that the pursuer had failed to supply timber as agreed on for repairing and making fences, and they put their loss on this head at £40 per annum.

They further stated;—"In respect of the pursuer's failure to implement his obligations under the agreement between him and the defenders, and to give them possession of the subjects contracted for, the defenders are entitled to abatement from their rent to the extent of said sums of £50 and £40, or £90 in all, per annum, for the years of their occupancy. The said sum considerably exceeds the sums retained by the defenders from their rent."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders' claim being merely one of damage, and illiquid, cannot be set off against the pursuer's claim for rent.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer having failed to implement his agreement with the defenders, to put the buildings of the farm in repair and supply wood for fencing, whereby the defenders were deprived of the beneficial use and enjoyment of the subjects let to an extent exceeding the sums retained by them from their rent and now sued for, the defenders are entitled to retain said sums, and are now entitled to be assoltized from the conclusions of the summons.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 26th July 1888, allowed a proof.*

* "NOTE.—The pursuer maintains that he is entitled to decree without inquiry into the disputed matters of fact, on the ground that a tenant is not entitled to retain rent on account of an illiquid claim of damages. But the defender is in possession under missives of lease by which it is stipulated that the barn, byre, and stable shall be handed over to him in tenantable repair. These

No. 21.

Nov. 15, 1888.
Munro v.
M'Geoghs.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—There was no relevant statement of defective possession.<sup>1</sup> Even if there were, the inquiry ought not to be a general one, but should be confined to the question of abatement only, and not extend to the damages.

The defenders were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not entertain the smallest doubt that there is a relevant defence set forth in this case against the landlord's demand for rent, on the ground that the tenant has not got possession of the entire subjects let, and is therefore entitled to an abatement of rent corresponding to the amount of the possession not delivered. That is a doctrine which has been recognised in a great number of cases, and it does not admit of doubt. The principle is very well stated by Lord Fullerton in the case of Graham v. Gordon, 5 D. 1211—“Rent is not liquid in the sense that a sum due by bond is. It is a matter of contract in consideration of something to be done. It is paid for possession of the subject let. If the tenant says he has not got entire possession, that is a good answer to the claim for rent.” This proposition has been affirmed over and over again; it was very emphatically affirmed in the case of Muir v. M'Intyre (14 R. 470), which was decided only last year, and where the claim for abatement was rested upon the ground of the accidental destruction by fire of a portion of the subjects let. The difficulty in that case was that there was no fault on either side, and the landlord accordingly maintained that as the fact that a portion of the subject had ceased to exist was due solely to accident, he was entitled to fulfilment of the entire contract. But we held that the destruction of a part of the subject let put the case in the same position as if part of the subject let had not been delivered, so that it is clear that the case of Muir was a fortiori of the present case, and of every case where part of the subject let has not been delivered. The Lord Ordinary has stated very clearly the ground of judgment, and I have no doubt of the soundness of it. But, as the parties have expressed their willingness to have a judicial reference regarding the matters at issue, I think the case should stand over in the meantime to admit of their taking the necessary steps to have this done, and in the first place, to allow them to agree upon a referee.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

The case having been again called upon November 20th, and it having been intimated by the parties that they were unable to agree upon a referee, the Court then pronounced this interlocutor :—

“RECALL said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary before buildings are portions of the subject let, and are indispensable for the beneficial occupation of the farm. If the defender's averments are true in fact, he has not received full possession, and it follows that the landlord's claim is not liquid, because he has not delivered the subjects in the state agreed upon. The case appears to me to be distinguishable from those in which it has been held that a liquid claim for rent cannot be met by an illiquid claim of damages for breach of a collateral obligation, and to fall within the rule laid down in Graham v. Gordon, 5 D. 1211, which has been followed in subsequent cases. The facts might probably be ascertained more economically than by a proof, but the pursuer declines in the meantime to consent to a reference or remit.”

<sup>1</sup> M'Rae v. M'Pherson, Nov. 19, 1843, 6 D. 302; Dods v. Fortune, Feb. 4, 1854, 16 D. 478-9.

answer to allow the defenders a proof of their averments in support of their claim for abatement of rent, and to allow the pursuer a conjunct probation: Find the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 21.

Nov. 15, 1888.
Munro v.
McGeogha.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—PETER ADAIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

GEORGE WHYTE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Gloag—Watt.

DAVID HILL MURRAY, Defender (Reclaimer).—Sol.-Gen. Darling—Sym.

THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Defenders.

No. 22.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Whyte v.
Murray.

Bankruptcy—Discharge of trustee—Radical right of bankrupt—Title to sue.—Where the trustee in a sequestration has been discharged, and no other trustee has been appointed, the bankrupt, although not reinvested, has in virtue of his radical right a good title to sue for behoof of his estate.

Marriage-Contract—Power of Appointment—Fee and Liferent.—By antenuptial marriage-contract the wife conveyed to herself in liferent, and failing her to her husband in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti, and in either case to the children of the marriage in fee, certain bank shares, subject to a power in the husband, and failing his exercising it, in the wife, to divide the provisions made for them among the children. There were three daughters and one son. By his settlement the husband conveyed his whole estate to trustees to pay certain special legacies to the daughters, and to hold "the whole residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, for behoof of my son," declaring that he had made this division in virtue of the powers in the marriage-contract. The husband predeceased the wife, who thereafter executed a transfer of the bank shares to herself in liferent alienably, and the children equally among them in fee. The son assigned in security to a creditor his whole interest "in the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate of the said deceased G. W." (his father), "and all my right and interest of whatever kind or description under the same." In a question between the son and the assignee—held that the latter had no right to the bank shares, these having formed no part of the father's estate, and the father's settlement not being an effectual exercise of the power.

MR GEORGE WHYTE was married to Miss Isabella Mess in 1843. Miss Mess was possessed of certain shares in the Commercial Bank of Scotland, and she, by antenuptial contract, in respect of certain obligations by her husband, disposed, inter alia, these shares "to herself in liferent, but exclusive of the jus mariti, and failing her by death, to the said George Whyte in liferent, and in either case to the children of the marriage equally among them, if more than one, in fee, subject to the powers of division and other conditions hereinafter mentioned."

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

The marriage-contract also contained these clauses,—“Notwithstanding the foresaid destination, the said Isabella Mess shall at all times have full power, with consent of the said George Whyte, as liferenter, or after his death, of his children, or their tutors and curators, as fiars, to sell the said subjects, and to uplift and discharge the said sums of money, she being bound, with consent foresaid, to reinvest the prices and sums received in the same line of destination: . . . And it is further declared, that in case there be more than one child of this marriage, the said George Whyte shall have the power, and failing his dying without exercising it, the said Isabella Mess shall have the power, while she remains his widow, at any time of his or her life, or on deathbed, to divide the provisions hereby made for children in such manner as he, and failing him she, may direct by any writing under hand, and failing any such division, the said provisions shall divide equally among the children, male and female, the issue of a child dying before receiving its provisions having right to the parent's share.”

No. 22.

Nov. 16, 1888.

Whyte v.
Murray.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mr Whyte in 1869. There were three daughters and one son of the marriage.

Mr Whyte left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and after making certain provisions in favour of his daughters, directed his trustees "to hold the whole residue and remainder of my heritable and moveable estate for behoof of my only son George Whyte and the heirs of his body.

... And I hereby declare that the provisions above written in favour of my said children shall be in full of all that they can ask or demand by and through my decease out of my real or personal estate, or out of ... my said wife's fortune which may be found standing in her name at the time of my death, in name of legitim, portion-natural, executry, or otherwise, or by virtue of my said contract of marriage; and I declare that I have made the division above written among my children in terms and in virtue of the powers conferred upon me by said contract of marriage."

By transfer dated May 1870, and registered in the books of the Commercial Bank, Mrs Whyte, in implement and corroboration of the transfer by her in the marriage-contract, assigned the shares in the bank to herself in liferent for her liferent use alienarly, and to the children of the marriage nominatim in fee, and the children accepted the transfer, but under the proviso that "the acceptance of this transfer is not to affect the rights and interests of the children of the said deceased George Whyte inter se under the said marriage settlement and the trust-disposition and deed of settlement of the said deceased George Whyte, bearing date," &c.

By bond and disposition and assignation in security, dated 10th February 1876, George Whyte, the son, in security of a loan of £2000 to him by James Robertson, bank-agent in Huntly, assigned, "All and Whole the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate of the said deceased George Whyte, provided to me by the said trust-disposition and deed of settlement, and all my right and interest of whatever kind or description under the same."

Mr David Hill Murray, S.S.C., Edinburgh, came to be in right of this bond.

On 7th June 1882, the estates of George Whyte junior were sequestrated, and Mr J. A. Robertson, C.A., Edinburgh, was appointed trustee.

On 18th March 1884 the bankrupt obtained a discharge without composition, and on 4th November 1887 Mr Robertson, as trustee, obtained a discharge.

Mrs Whyte, the bankrupt's mother, died in January 1887.

In December 1887 George Whyte junior raised an action against the Commercial Bank of Scotland, and against Murray for declarator (1) that the pursuer had right to one-fourth part of thirteen £100 shares of stock of the Commercial Bank, and (3) that the defender Murray had no right, title, or interest in the remaining three-fourth parts of these shares, reserving to the pursuer all claims competent to him to these remaining three-fourth parts.

The pursuer alleged that the shares formed part of his mother's estate, and that on her death he became sole owner of them in virtue of the contract of marriage, and the power of division exercised by his father in his trust-disposition and settlement, whereby the rights of the pursuer's three sisters in the shares were excluded by the provisions in their favour.

Defences were lodged for the bank (which need not be farther referred to), and also for Murray. Murray, in his defences, alleged that the shares in question formed part of the residue of the estate of the bankrupt's father, and that the bankrupt's interest in them had in consequence passed to him (Murray) as in right of the bond above mentioned.

No. 22.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Whyte v.
Murray.

The defender Murray also pleaded ;—(1) No title to sue.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor :—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the debate and whole cause, finds that the bank shares referred to in the summons formed no part of the estate of the deceased Mr George Whyte: Finds therefore that the assignation founded on by the defender Mr David Hill Murray is insufficient to support his claim to the said shares, and that he has no title to oppose the conclusions of the summons: Therefore repels the defences for the said David Hill Murray, and decerns and declares in terms of the first and third conclusions of the summons, but without prejudice to any claims upon said shares, so far as belonging to the pursuer, competent to the defenders the Commercial Bank, or to creditors upon the pursuer's sequestrated estate: Finds the defender David Hill Murray liable to the pursuer in the expenses of process, and remits," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had erred in considering not the title to sue, but the title to defend. The first question was whether the pursuer had any title to challenge the defender's right under the assignation. The defender might have to defend his right in a question with the pursuer's creditors, who were proceeding to revive the sequestration,* and he should not be called on to discuss it with the bankrupt, who had not been reinvested in his estate. (2) The bank stock fell within the residue conveyed to the pursuer under his father's settlement. A power of division might be exercised by implication in the settlement of the donee of the power.<sup>1</sup> Here, however, the testator, in terms, stated that he intended to exercise the power, so that he regarded as included in his estate, and consequently in the residue of it, not merely his own property but also the subjects of the power of division. In any view, the pursuer's right to the bank shares vested in him on his father's death, or at least, under the transfer of 1870, and so passed to the defender under the bond and disposition in security.

Argued for the pursuer ;—(1) The pursuer had a title to sue. No doubt he had not been retrocessed in his estates, and perhaps might yet have to give this estate up to his creditors, but in the meantime he had the only title to pursue the action. He had the radical right in his estate, and there was no trustee with an active title to protect it. A bankrupt in such a position was not bound to allow the estate which was radically his to be carried off by a person who had no right to it. That was the position of the defender, and the Lord Ordinary was right in considering whether the defender had any right to interfere with this estate. (2) The assignation could not carry these bank shares unless they were part of the residue of the pursuer's father's estate. They did not form part of the "residue and remainder of my estate" in the sense of the pursuer's father's will, because they had never at any time been the father's. They were his wife's, at least until she transferred them by the transfer of 1870. His professed exercise of the power of division made no difference, for a man could not by dividing an estate over which he had a power of division make it part of the residue of his own. The case of Smith v. Milne<sup>1</sup> was no authority for the defender. There the testatrix had nothing * See petition, reported infra, p. 100, which was presented to the First Division prior to the hearing on the present reclaiming note.

<sup>1</sup> Smith v. Milne, June 6, 1826, 4 S. 685; Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees, July 4, 1885, 12 R. 1230.

No. 22. whatever of her own, and the meaning of her settlement could only be that she was dividing an estate she had a power to divide. But the pursuer's father had means of his own which he had acquired during the marriage.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Whyte v.
Murray.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When Mr George Whyte senior and his wife were married the lady was possessed of some fortune, embracing certain shares in the Commercial Bank of Scotland. The form of marriage-contract which was entered into by the spouses was not a conveyance in trust, but was a direct conveyance whereby the lady, in respect of certain obligations by her husband, which are of no materiality, disposes, inter alia, these shares “to herself in liferent, but exclusive of the jus mariti, and failing her by death, to the said George Whyte in liferent, and in either case to the children of the marriage equally among them, if more than one, in fee, subject to the powers of division and other conditions hereinafter mentioned.” I think there is no doubt that the effect of that conveyance was to leave the fee of the bank shares in the lady herself, and to create a prospective right of liferent in the husband, and to settle them subject to that right of liferent upon the children of the marriage in fee. The fee of the shares remained in Mrs Whyte down to 1870, when she conveyed them to herself in liferent for her liferent use alienably, and to her then existing children in fee. Such is the history of the shares; there has been no change since that date, and the lady dying in 1887, the liferent then came to an end, and they now belong to the children in fee.

The defender Murray has now advanced a claim to the shares, and has intimated it to the Commercial Bank, and accordingly it has been thought necessary by the pursuer to raise an action to have it declared that Murray has no right to the shares.

The first objection which the defender takes is that the pursuer has no title to sue. I think that objection is ill founded, and I regret that the Lord Ordinary did not think fit to dispose of it. The pursuer's estates were no doubt sequestrated, and he has not been discharged on a composition or reinvested in his estates. They have been ingathered and divided so far as the trustee and creditors desired to do so, and the trustee has been discharged. It is now said that the pursuer's right may still be realised for the benefit of his creditors, and that is true; but at the same time it does not affect his title to sue. No one but the pursuer has at present a title to sue this action. His title is his radical right to the estate, which revives by the trustee's discharge. The discharge of the trustee puts an end to the adjudication in his favour, which transferred to him the estate of every description which belonged to the bankrupt. The trustee's title, then, being at an end, the only person having a right to sue such an action as the present is the bankrupt. No doubt the creditors have claims which are still unsatisfied, but their remedy is to revive the sequestration or proceed against the bankrupt in some other way to make these good. The bankrupt's right has revived and will avail as a title to the shares, except in so far as it may be subject to meet the still outstanding debts of creditors. Accordingly I am for repelling the objection to the pursuer's title to sue.

Upon the merits, although the case has at first sight an appearance of complication, I have not much difficulty in reaching the same result as the Lord Ordinary. The defender is in right of the subject of a security which is constituted by a deed granted in 1876, by which Mr George Whyte, the pursuer, acknowledged to have borrowed a sum of £2000, and granted, inter alia, in security No. 22.

 "the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate of the said deceased George Whyte"—who was his father,—“provided to me by the said <sup>Nov. 16, 1888.</sup> Whyte v. Murray.
 trust-disposition and deed of settlement, and all my right and interest of whatever kind or description in the same.” It appears to me that there can be only one construction of these words which I have read. What is conveyed in security by the borrower is his interest, whatever that was, in the residue and remainder of the estate belonging to his father. Of course that must mean the residue and remainder in so far as it was settled upon him, but that residue and remainder could not comprehend what was vested in another. It could not therefore comprehend the bank stock, of which Mrs Whyte, the pursuer's mother, was undivested owner. It would be doing violence to the terms of the settlement of Mr Whyte senior if the Court were to hold that it comprehended estate belonging to someone else.

It is vain to appeal to the authority of the cases of Smith, 4 S. 679, and of Mackie, 12 R. 1230. In the former case the old lady who was held to have exercised the power of division had no estate of her own, and could only exercise the power of division which was given to her by her husband's will. It was not possible for her to do anything else, for she had no estate to deal with, and when she made a will she could not be supposed to be doing anything else than exercising the power of division. That judgment proceeded upon reasonable and intelligible grounds, but where a person is engaged in disposing of his own estate by will, and is possessed of a power of dividing his wife's estate, he must exercise that power in a very different way than by leaving the residue and remainder of his estate in general terms to his son, as is done here. No doubt Mr Whyte senior says at the end of the deed that he has exercised the power which was given to him by his wife. The simple answer to that is that he has not exercised it, and that upon no reasonable construction of the deed can it be held that he has exercised such a power.

That being the foundation of Mr Murray's title, I do not think the bank stock is carried as part of the security held by him. I am of opinion, therefore, that his claim to the bank stock cannot be maintained, and that the defences should be repelled.

LORD MURK.—It is clear that under the assignation to the defender nothing was conveyed except the residue of the pursuer's father's estate. But that residue never included the bank shares. They belonged to the pursuer's mother, and remained with her after her husband's death. There is no ground therefore on which the defender can successfully maintain that he ever acquired any portion of those shares.

The only difficulty which occurred to me was that the Lord Ordinary had not disposed of the objection to the pursuer's title to sue. That however has been obviated by what your Lordship has suggested; and I think the plea that the pursuer has no title to sue ought to be repelled. The pursuer's right to the bank shares was no doubt carried to the trustee under his sequestration. But this trustee never claimed these shares, and the sequestration has now been brought to an end, and the trustee discharged. The radical right however to these shares remained with the pursuer during the sequestration, and now that the trustee is out of the way, I think that the pursuer is entitled to vindicate that right either for his creditors or for himself.

No. 22. LORD ADAM.—I confess that from the time that we were put in possession of the facts of this case I have thought it a simple one. The title of the reclamer, Mr David Hill Murray, rests upon an assignation to a bond and disposition by George Whyte, by which he conveyed in security of a sum of £2000 "the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate" as provided to him by the trust-settlement of his father. And the question is, whether the bank shares in question ever were part of the residue of Mr George Whyte senior's estate? I think not. I think they remained part of his wife's estate. And even if he had disposed of them in his trust-settlement, I do not think that would have been a good conveyance of them. Any intention so to do would have been of no avail unless it was shewn that the true character of them was other than I have stated. Accordingly, I do not think that the reclamer has by the assignation any title to these shares.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Whyte v.
Murray.

I also concur with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is defective, for his Lordship ought to have dealt also with the pursuer's title to sue. I have no doubt of that title. The only reason on which it is contended that he had no title is that the bank shares in question passed to the trustee upon the pursuer's sequestrated estates and to his creditors. If there had been an existing trustee he would have been here to vindicate his rights. But the trustee having been discharged the pursuer's radical right revives, and is a sufficient title to him to vindicate the right to these shares either for himself or for his creditors. Even if there had been a trustee, and he had declined to come forward, the bankrupt himself might have come forward to assert his right, and might have insisted—on certain terms as to caution—in pursuing an action of this kind.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT repelled the objection by the defender Murray to the pursuer's title to sue; quoad ultra adhered.

ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—MELVILLE & LINDERAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 23. NORTHERN HERITABLE SECURITIES INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.
GEORGE WHYTE, Respondent.—Gloag—Watt.

Nov. 21, 1888.
Northern
Heritable
Securities Investment Co.,
Limited, v.
Whyte.

Bankruptcy—Nobile officium—Discharge of both trustee and bankrupt—Appointment of new trustee—Abandonment of claim.—Certain creditors upon a sequestrated estate on which both the trustee and the bankrupt had been discharged, the latter without composition, presented a petition for a remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint a meeting of creditors for the election of a new trustee, averring that there were funds belonging to the sequestrated estate which had not been recovered, and that the petitioners had not been paid their debts in full. It was objected that all claim to these funds had been abandoned by the trustee. Objection repelled, and petition granted.

Observed, per the Lord President, that if there was a question whether there were funds falling under the sequestration or not, it was a matter for the trustee when he was appointed, and not for the Court to determine under such a petition.

Observed, also per the Lord President, that before there can be abandonment of a claim to a fund alleged to fall within a sequestration, it must be shewn that the claim in question came up definitely for consideration at a meeting of the creditors.

1ST DIVISION. B. THIS petition arose in the circumstances narrated in the immediately preceding report. It was a petition by the Northern Heritable Securities Company, Limited, and other creditors of Whyte, for a revival of the sequestration, and for a remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to order a meeting of the creditors for the election of a new trustee.

The petitioners stated that the whole estates of the bankrupt, so far as known at the time, or believed to fall under the sequestration, had been realised by the trustee prior to his discharge, that a dividend of 7½d. per pound had been paid, that since the death of the bankrupt's mother, Mrs Isabella Mess or Whyte, on 18th January 1887, and the subsequent discharge of the trustee, it appeared that Whyte had right to 3¼ shares in the Commercial Bank of Scotland, which right had vested in him prior to the death of his mother, and that the creditors were entitled thereto.

Whyte lodged answers.

On a construction of the deeds quoted in the preceding report, he maintained that the shares vested in him at his mother's death in January 1887, and never fell within the sequestration, he having been discharged on 18th March 1884.

He also averred,—“The trustee and creditors in said sequestration, who were well aware of the position of the said 3¼ shares, did not, betwixt the date of the death of the respondent's mother, and the termination of the sequestration on 4th November 1887, take any steps to have the 3¼ shares found to belong to them, and they accordingly abandoned all right (if any) which they may have had to them. They, however, renounced their pretended right to these shares by the trustee and commissioners having been parties to certain articles and conditions of roup, dated 18th September 1883, under which they were alleged to be sold to David Hill Murray, solicitor, Edinburgh, along with the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate of the bankrupt's deceased father, George Whyte of Meethill, in the county of Aberdeen. The assignation in favour of the said David Hill Murray, in implement of the said sale under said articles and conditions of roup, is dated 13th November 1883, and the said trustee and commissioners are parties to it.”

Argued for the petitioners;—(1) It was enough that there were prima facie grounds for believing that there was estate which fell under the sequestration. Here, however, there really was such estate. A claim of debt as against the mother vested in the children under the marriage-contract. Under that deed vesting took place at the dissolution of the marriage, subject to defeasance. Besides, the transfer, by which in 1870 Mrs Whyte transferred the bank stock to herself in liferent allenary and her children in fee, clearly created a vested interest in the children. It was not necessary to determine whether it had vested in Whyte before his mother's death or not. At anyrate, it vested at her death.

(2) Abandonment must be express abandonment on the part of the creditors and in favour of the bankrupt of an asset known and ascertained at the time.<sup>1</sup> There was nothing of that kind here.

Argued for the respondent;—1. The fact of the respondent's right to the bank stock was known to the trustee before his discharge as an available asset, and the existence of the right was brought to the knowledge of the creditors. The trustee and commissioners were parties to the articles of roup of the sale of the assignation to the residue of the late George Whyte's estate referred to in the answers. If the creditors or the trustee knew of the claim, they had abandoned it, and discharged the trustee, and they must suffer for that. The trustee was bound to make up his mind, and having failed to do so he must take the consequences. It was not correct to say that the Court had held in Walker's case<sup>1</sup> that

No. 23.

Nov. 21, 1888.
Northern
Heritable
Securities Investment Co.,
Limited, v.
Whyte.

<sup>1</sup> Fleming v. Walker's Trustees, Nov. 16, 1876, 4 R. 112.

No. 23. there must be express abandonment. When a sequestration was closed the Court would not open it up again where there had merely been a mistake in law. There was no case where a new trustee had been appointed when the estate which was said to come under the sequestration had been known to the first trustee prior to his discharge.<sup>1</sup>

Nov. 21, 1888.
Northern
Heritable
Securities Investment Co.,
Limited, v.
Whyte.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application to revive a sequestration in which both the bankrupt and the trustee have been discharged, and there is no doubt that it is an application which is properly addressed to the Court in the exercise of its nobile officium. We have followed the course which we are here asked to take and have granted the prayer of such petitions in a great many similar cases, beginning with that of Thomson (2 Macph. 325). All that is required to sustain such an application, in circumstances similar to the present, is that it shall be averred that there are funds belonging to the sequestrated estate; that the bankrupt has been discharged, not upon a composition, but only by reason of the efflux of time, or by the consent of creditors; and that the petitioners making the application shall be creditors who have not been paid in full.

The first objection stated to the present application is that there is no fund belonging to the bankrupt estate to be recovered. But it would be an awkward matter to establish as a precedent that a question of that kind must necessarily be determined in a petition like the present. Of course if it could be conclusively determined that there is nothing to be recovered, the petitioners would lose all interest to carry the matter further. But if it is a question whether there are funds or not, it would be very inconvenient to determine it in the present proceedings. It is rather a matter for the trustee when he comes to be appointed.

But in the present case I do not think there is much room for doubt that there is a fund which forms a part of the sequestrated estate. The Commercial Bank shares, which are said now to fall under the sequestration, were settled in the marriage-contract in this way. There was no trust. Mrs Whyte conveyed them directly to herself in liferent, and to her children in fee. Mrs Whyte, the original owner of the shares, was thus left an undivested fiar, and her children had no right in the shares other than a mere spes successionis. But after her husband's death she executed a transfer of the shares, and the whole question now is, what is the effect of that transfer. She transferred the shares to herself in liferent allenary, and to her children nominatim in fee. A complete change in the right of property in the shares was thus brought about, and the fee belonged to the children as soon as they accepted the transfer.

It is said that there is a clause in the deed of transfer which must receive some meaning, and is said to affect the right of fee which would otherwise be in the children. But I do not find anything which qualifies or diminishes the rights of the fiars. It is said in the deed of transfer,—and this is a stipulation in favour of the transferees themselves,—“that the acceptance hereof was not to affect the rights and interests of the children of the deceased George Whyte inter se under the said marriage-settlement, and the said trust-disposition and deed of settlement of the said deceased George Whyte.” But the trust-deed of their father, as we have already held,* does not carry the right to these shares. And the marriage-contract affects them only in so far as it provides that the shares of the children in the estate carried by it are to be equal. That affects the rights of the children inter se. There is a further provision in the marriage-contract giving a power to the father, and failing him to the mother, to divide the children's provisions in such manner as either of them might direct, "and failing any such division, the said provisions shall divide equally among the children, male and female, the issue of a child dying before receiving its provisions having right to the parent's share." If that is the clause which is intended to be referred to in the transfer, I confess that it does not appear to me to prevent vesting in each of the children to whom the fee is given nominatim in the deed of transfer. } No. 23. Nov. 21, 1888. Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co., Limited, v. Whyte.

<sup>1</sup> Thomson, Dec. 17, 1863, 2 Macph. 325, 36 Scot. Jur. 162; Taylor v. Charteris and Andrew, Nov. 1, 1879, 7 R. 128.

* Ante, p. 95.

Prima facie, so far as I can see the question which will fall to be determined in the revived sequestration, there seems to be no dispute or difference about it. The respondent had from and after 1870 a full right of fee in the shares in question, and that right of fee consequently formed part of his sequestrated estate at the date of his sequestration. If this be quite clear, it may be said that the trustee ought to have taken up that right, and made it available to the creditors. That is the first step in the consideration of the question of abandonment. But the evidence of abandonment in the present case is of a very peculiar kind. As regards the trustee, no doubt he was very naturally in a state of great perplexity; because Mr Hill Murray maintained that he had a right to the bank shares under a deed of assignation in his favour, conveying to him "the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate" of the deceased George Whyte, so far as falling to the respondent under his father's trust-disposition and settlement, and a serious question was raised between Murray and the respondent, which was only decided a few days ago. The trustee might therefore be in considerable difficulty as to whether this was or was not an asset of the bankrupt estate. The knowledge of the existence of this asset, and the intention to abandon it, are ascribed by the respondent to the trustee. But the trustee has no right to abandon an asset. That must be done by the creditors or by the trustee with consent of the creditors. I know of no case where the existence of such an asset has not been brought home to the creditors, and dealt with at their meetings, and then and there disposed of in one way or another.

But here it is not even averred that it was brought under their notice, or that it received any consideration from them. I therefore think that the notion of abandonment is excluded by that consideration alone. There must be an assent of the creditors to the abandonment. So that this second answer to the present petition fails altogether upon the facts. X

I think, therefore, that there are no grounds for departing from the course which has been taken in previous cases.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion, and that for the reasons so clearly expressed by your Lordship. If the right to the bank shares was in Whyte at the date of his sequestration there can be no doubt that it passed to his trustee, so that the shares would form an asset for division among the creditors. And what the petitioners propose is that the sequestration should be revived in order that this fund may be made available for distribution. This is opposed by the respondent on the grounds (1) that the bank shares were not carried to the trustee; and (2) that even if they had been, they were abandoned by the trustee before his discharge.

No. 23.

Nov. 21, 1888.
Northern
Heritable
Securities Investment
Co. Ltd.,
Whyte.

As regards the first of these objections, I agree with your Lordship that the shares vested in the children, including the respondent, under the deed of transfer executed by their mother in 1870 after their father's death. But I do not think that there is any evidence to shew that the trustee was aware of the terms of that deed, or that the fee of the shares had passed to the children; and that was, I think, the position of matters at the time when the bankrupt and the trustee were discharged.

In these circumstances I am unable to see that there is any evidence of anything having been done by the trustee and creditors which can be held to amount to an abandonment of this claim. It does not appear that before his discharge in 1887 the trustee had taken any steps to have this estate brought within the sequestration, or that he or any of the creditors knew what the position of that part of the estate was. In these circumstances it is impossible, I think, to hold that there has been any abandonment of this claim.

LORD FRASER concurred.

LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM were absent.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in ordinary form remitting to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, &c.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—ANDREW URQUHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 24.

BOYD, GILMOUR, & COMPANY AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—

Asher—Murray.

THE GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Railway Co.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 71—A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3—Omission to lodge prints in time.—In an appeal in vacation from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints within fourteen days after the Clerk of Court had received the process, and to box them on the first box-day thereafter, as required by sec. 3, subsec. 2, of A. S., March 10, 1870. An objection having been taken to the competency of the appeal, the Second Division, after consulting with the Judges of the First Division, held (1) that the Court have a discretion as to whether they will enforce the penal provisions of the Act of Sederunt; and (2) that as in the present case the omission was unintentional, and had caused no inconvenience or delay, the objection should be overruled.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.
1.

In an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Kilmarnock at the instance of Boyd, Gilmour, & Company and others against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, the Sheriff-substitute (Hall), on 29th June 1887, decerned in favour of the pursuers.

On 25th July the defenders appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

On 15th March 1888 the Second Division, to which the case had been transferred, remitted the cause, with instructions to allow the parties a proof.

The Sheriff-substitute, after a proof, on the 18th July 1888 decerned against the defenders.

On 25th July 1888 the defenders appealed to the First Division, and the appeal was noted as received by the acting-depute-clerk of the First Division on 26th July.

The note of appeal, record, proof, and interlocutors ought, under the Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870,* to have been printed, and a print deposited with the Clerk of Court within fourteen days (9th August), and boxed on the first box-day in vacation, viz., on the 16th August.

The appellants failed to do this, or to move for reponing. They however borrowed the process, with the result that the Clerk of Court was unable to retransmit the process as abandoned to the Sheriff Court Clerk.† It was not till the 4th September that they deposited the print with the Clerk, and not till the 13th September, the second box-day, that the print was boxed to the Court.

When the appeal was called in the Single Bills in the First Division the respondents took objection to the competency of its proceeding in respect of the above facts. The case having been transferred to the Second Division, they renewed their objection.

Argued for the respondents;—As the prints were not lodged in time, the appellants must, in terms of the 2d subsection of section 3 of the Act of Sederunt, be held “to have abandoned” their appeal. They had also failed to move for reponing. They had no right to borrow the process, and had they not done this the Clerk of Court would, in terms of the 5th subsection of section 3, have retransmitted the process to the Sheriff Court Clerk. Indeed, the question must be considered as if this had actually been done by him. If it had been, the judgment would have been “final,” and the Court could not have directed the Sheriff Court Clerk to send it back.<sup>1</sup> The case of Walker v. Reid (4 R. 714) had no application to the present case. The informality there was due to a misapprehension on the agent's part owing to the fourteen days running partly in session and partly in vacation. In Young v. Brown (2 R. 456) there was only failure to lodge a part of the process.

* A. of S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3,—“That the course of proceeding prescribed by the 71st section of the said statute [the Court of Session Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100] shall be altered to the following extent and effect:— . . .

(2) The appellant shall, during vacation, within fourteen days after the process has been received by the Clerk of Court, deposit with the said Clerk a print of the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof, if any, . . . and the appellant shall, upon the box-day or sederunt-day next following the deposit of such print with the Clerk, box copies of the same to the Court, . . . and if the appellant shall fail, within the said period of fourteen days, to deposit with the Clerk of Court as aforesaid a print of the papers required, . . . or to box or furnish the same as aforesaid on the box-day or sederunt-day next thereafter, he shall be held to have abandoned his appeal, and shall not be entitled to insist therein, except upon being reponed as hereinafter provided.”

Subsec. 3,—“It shall be lawful for the appellant, within eight days after the appeal has been held to be abandoned as aforesaid, to move the Court during session, or the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills during vacation, to repone him, to the effect of entitling him to insist in the appeal; which motion shall not be granted by the Court or the Lord Ordinary except upon cause shewn, and upon such conditions as to printing and payment of expenses to the respondent, or otherwise, as to the Court or the Lord Ordinary shall seem just.”

† A. of S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3, subsec. 5,—“On the expiry of the said period of eight days after the appeal has been held to be abandoned as aforesaid, if the appellant shall not have been reponed, and if the respondent does not insist in the appeal, the judgment or judgments complained of shall become final, and shall be treated in all respects as if no appeal had been taken against the same, and the Clerk of Court shall forthwith retransmit the process to the Clerk of the inferior Court.”

<sup>1</sup> Park v. Weir, Oct. 15, 1874, 12 S. L. R. 11.

No. 24.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Railway Co.

Argued for the appellants;—The failure to lodge the prints timeously was due to oversight or inadvertence. The appellants' agents heard nothing of it from the Clerks of the First Division. Had it been marked, as it should have been, to the Second Division, who had ordered the proof to which the appeal referred, the Clerks of that Division would have communicated with them, and the matter would have been attended to. No damage would be done to the respondents, as this appeal formed part of a test case which the parties had agreed should go to the House of Lords. In the circumstances the appellants were entitled to be reponed.<sup>1</sup>

The Court consulted with their Lordships of the First Division.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The respondents in this appeal, who hold a judgment in their favour by the Sheriff-substitute of Ayrshire, object to the competency of the Court taking up and disposing of the appeal on its merits, maintaining that under the clauses of the Act of Sederunt of 1870, regulating the preliminary procedure in such appeals, this appeal has fallen, and cannot be now considered by the Court of Session.

The facts are that the defenders on 25th July noted the appeal, and the process was transmitted on 26th July to the Clerk of Session. According to the Act of Sederunt the appellants should have lodged the print on 9th August, and boxed it on 16th August. This they did not do. They had it in their power within eight days to apply to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and to shew cause why they should still be allowed to box the papers. This also was not done. The papers were boxed on the 13th of September, being the second box-day, having been lodged with the clerk on 4th September. When the eight days had expired, the next step in ordinary course would have been for the Clerk of the Court of Session to mark the process with a note that the appeal had fallen, and to retransmit it to the Sheriff Court. This was not done either. Accordingly the appeal, which was to the First Division of the Court, came up there for hearing, when the respondents took objection to the competency of proceeding with it in respect of the facts I have stated. The First Division transferred the case to this Division, and the question on the competency is again raised.

As regards the cause of the omission, I think it must be taken to be the fact that the failure in this case to lodge and box the print within the time prescribed was due to inadvertence—and to inadvertence only,—although I cannot help saying that the circumstances suggested by the defenders as accounting for the mistake seem to me to be of the most shadowy description, the only suggestion being that the appeal was marked to the First Division, although the proof to which the appeal referred had been taken on remit from this Division. How that fact should have made any difference in the conduct of the detail business of lodging papers I have not been able to see. I presume it must have been from some practice of communication between the officials in the office and the clerks of agents, but this is by no means clear. The real question, however, is whether the penalty for the inadvertent omission must be the loss of the right to prosecute the appeal, with the result that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is stamped with finality.

<sup>1</sup> Walker v. Reid, May 12, 1877, 4 R. 714; Young v. Brown, Feb. 19, 1875, 2 R. 456; Lattimer v. Anderson and Wight, Dec. 20, 1881, 9 R. 370; Robertson v. Barclay, Nov. 27, 1877, 5 R. 257.

The pursuers maintain that this must be the result. I think Mr Asher pressed his contention so far as to argue that on the day after the expiry of the reponing days the power of the Court to take up and consider the appeal absolutely ceased, and that whether the process had been transmitted back to the Sheriff-clerk or not it was no longer before and could not be dealt with in any way by the Court of Session.

No. 24.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Railway Co.

I do not think that, in view of what has already been done by the Court in previous cases, any such contention can be given effect to. For in numerous cases the question has been considered on the merits, with the result that in some of them the appeal has been allowed to proceed, a result which could not have followed had the Court felt themselves compelled to hold that by the mere lapse of the time prescribed by the Act of Sederunt they had ceased to have any power over the process, and could not write upon it.

I cannot therefore give effect to the very broad and sweeping view which was pressed on us in debate that the lapse of the time fixed by the Act of Sederunt acts as a removal of the process out of the Court of Session, so that we are precluded from dealing with it whatever may be the circumstances of the case as regards the failure to box papers.

But then it is contended that the failure makes it imperative upon the Court to hold it incompetent to proceed to hear and dispose of the appeal upon the merits, and that the judgment of the Sheriff must be held to be final. At first sight there is great force in this objection when the words of the Act of Sederunt are considered, which are very distinct.

We have thought it advisable to consult the other Division of the Court, and the conclusion which I have to state is that at which we have arrived after consultation.

Had it been clear that the Court are bound to regard a provision of an Act of Sederunt as being equivalent to a statutory enactment, I should have been unable to hold otherwise than that the defenders' appeal had fallen, and that it was not in the power of the Court to replace them in the position of being able to prosecute that appeal now.

But this is not the view that has been taken in previous cases. The Court have invariably held that they were entitled to consider whether the circumstances of the case made it necessary to enforce the Act of Sederunt to the effect of precluding the party in default from proceeding with this appeal. They have thought themselves entitled to consider what was the intention in passing the Act of Sederunt, and having regard to that intention, whether there was in the particular case ground for enforcing its penal provisions. Thus the Lord President in Taylor or Young v. Brown, in which case there was a failure to box the note of appeal itself, says,—“According to the letter of the Act of Sederunt this is a good objection. But I confess to a reluctance to sustain so technical an objection if it is possible to get the better of it. Now, it is important to observe that the provision founded on occurs in the Act of Sederunt and not in the statute. The regulation is made in place of the 71st section of the statute, and it is important to observe that under section 71 this objection would not have been fatal. Therefore the objection stands on a regulation of a form of process made by the Court. When we are satisfied that under an Act of Sederunt only a formal and innocent omission has been made, we may allow the thing to be rectified.” And again in Lattimer v. Anderson and Wight, in which the agent had omitted to box the proof, his Lordship said,—“I think the case

No. 24.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Rail-
way Co.

falls within the principle of the case of Young v. Brown rather than of Robertson v. Barclay. In the latter case there was an entire failure to print, the appellant had not even attempted to take any steps to print and box the appeal, and it was held that he had no excuse. The only excuse that was offered was that there had been verbal and obviously useless attempts to settle the case, which certainly did not justify the omission to prepare the prints. In the case of Young v. Brown there was a failure to print a part of what is required by the Act of Sederunt, a part no doubt which is of less importance to the case than that which has been omitted here, but I do not know that that fact will make any difference in the question whether the Act of Sederunt has been violated or not. The Act requires equally both the note of appeal and the proof to be printed, and if the omission is to be held fatal it must apply equally to any part which the Act requires to be printed. The circumstance that one part is of more importance to the ultimate discussion of the case makes no difference, for both the note of appeal and the proof must be here before the Court can consider the case." It also very clearly appears from the cases already decided that the Court have held the intention of the Act of Sederunt to be to prevent the delay in procedure, which the failure to box papers in due time tends to cause, to the detriment either of the interests of the opposing litigant, or of the despatch of the business of the Court; in short, that its penal action is directed against dilatory tactics; or, to use the words of the Lord President in Robertson v. Barclay, against "trifling away the time and violating the whole spirit of the regulation."

Now, this being the manner in which cases of failure to box prints have been dealt with hitherto, what is the case here? It is not suggested that the defenders did not box papers because they desired delay, or that in point of fact any delay was or could have been caused by the failure to box. It was admittedly an entirely unintentional mistake, which did not delay by one day the business of the Court, or cause any inconvenience or hardship to the pursuers. The box-day was in August, the prints were lodged early in September, and the Court did not meet for business till the 15th of October. The spirit and intention of the Act of Sederunt, of which the Lord President spoke in the case of Robertson v. Barclay, were thus in no way violated by what occurred. What was done was not done in pursuance of offputting tactics, and did not cause any delay or inconvenience whatever.

The case therefore falls to be considered in the light of those decisions under which appeals have been allowed to proceed notwithstanding the failure to box prints of parts of the process required by the Act of Sederunt to be boxed. Now, in the case of Taylor or Young v. Brown the note of appeal, which is one of the things specified, was by inadvertence not boxed. Notwithstanding this, it was held that the Court could proceed to hear and dispose of the appeal, and that they were not compelled by the terms of the Act of Sederunt to hold that the appeal had lapsed. The only difference between that case and the present is that there the appellant was in default as regarded only one of the many things required by the Act of Sederunt. Does it make any difference that here the omission is not of one of the prescribed things, but of all? It does not appear to me that it makes any difference in principle. Equally in both cases the omission was a substantial omission, but equally in both it was unintentional, harmless to the interests of the opposite party, and had and could have no injurious effect upon the progress of the business of the Court. I am of opinion that in these circumstances the decisions already given by the Court are authorities for holding—(1) That it is not imperative on the Court to put in force the penal provisions of the Act of Sederunt; and (2) that the circumstances of this case do not call for an infliction of these penal provisions.

I am therefore in favour of repelling the objection to the competency of the appeal.

No. 24.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Rail-
way Co.

LORD YOUNG.—The objection taken to the competency of proceeding with this appeal is admittedly one of a most technical kind. Your Lordship has stated the whole of the facts relating to the objection, and I agree with the accuracy of that statement as well as with the result at which you have arrived. The objection really comes to this, that whereas according to the provisions of the Act of Sederunt of 1870, the prints in the present appeal, which is but a small part of the whole case, ought to have been deposited with the Clerk of Court on the 9th of August, and boxed for the Judges on the 16th, they were not in reality lodged till the 4th of September, and were not boxed till the 13th of that month. The contention of the respondents is that under the imperative provisions of the Act of Sederunt we must hold in these circumstances the appeal as abandoned, and therefore that the judgment of the Sheriff upon the merits, which is for about £800, but which might have been for as many thousands, is final—that however just we may think it that relief should be given in the interests of parties, and however clear we may be in our opinion that no more than justice will be done without harm sustained, we are precluded by our own Act of Sederunt from doing it. I must repeat what I have said more than once already, that I doubt greatly whether the Court,—be it the whole Court, or any Division of the Court, or even a single Judge,—is precluded by any Act of Sederunt from doing what it thinks according to justice and equity in any individual case before it. I do not know whether it would be conceded or suggested that the remedy for oppression and injury in any individual case is another Act of Sederunt granting the relief sought. That would only be a roundabout way of doing what the Court thought consistent with equity in the particular case. Take the idea of the Court making rules of practice and procedure, and announcing these rules for the information of practitioners as the rules according to which it will generally proceed in the absence of reasons to the contrary—like the Prætors of old. Is that idea to preclude the Court from doing what it thinks just in individual cases? I do not think that we are called upon to decide such a point conclusively here, although I may say that it is one on which I have a very strong impression.

I do not know how the case of Walker v. Reid does not rule the present as an authority. It seems to me exactly in point, and indeed on all-fours with the present case. The rubric runs thus :—"In an appeal from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints within fourteen days after the process had been received by the Clerk of Court, as required by sec. 3, subsec. 1, of A. S., March 10, 1870, the agent having by mistake, as the day for lodging fell in vacation, lodged them on the box-day instead." The agent's mistake was that he did not think the fourteen days ran in vacation in the same way as during session, or that he ought to lodge the papers at the termination of the fourteen days, although they occurred in vacation. He was in fact labouring under a mistaken impression that he would be in time if he lodged them on the first box-day. This mistake led to a violation of the Act of Sederunt—the prints

No. 24.
Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Rail-
way Co.

not being lodged within the time specified in the Act of Sederunt. Here the papers were not lodged with the clerk on the 9th August, but on the 4th September, and not boxed on the 16th August, but on the 13th September. In the former case there was a mistake, and in the present there has been a mere oversight. The Court, nevertheless, refused to hold it imperative that the appeal was abandoned,—indeed so to hold would have been manifestly contrary to the truth, for it had not been abandoned. Their Lordships were moved to hold that the strict terms of the Act of Sederunt must be departed from, and they therefore allowed the appeal to proceed. In that case, I was myself accidentally called in to make a quorum, and I read what I then said, because after a lapse of ten years I still remain of the same opinion:—"It must always be in the power of the Court to do justice in any case of this kind, and relieve a party of so severe a penalty, following on so critical a construction of what, after all, is only a rule of Court laid down by the Court for its own guidance, with notice to parties and practitioners. We may advantageously and wholesomely make stern regulations, in order to check appeals taken merely for delay or other improper purpose, but it is a strong thing to say, that, by any words of ours in an Act of Sederunt, we preclude ourselves from doing what we think justice in any particular case, and that the accidental and harmless delay, it may be of a day or an hour, will make a judgment final which is by the law of the land subject to review. The enactment that any delay, however considerable and unattended with harm or inconvenience, shall deprive a party of the review to which he is entitled by law, and without any power in the Court to grant him relief, is legislation as distinguished from a rule of Court to govern procedure."

Now, I should be myself prepared to read into every Act of Sederunt by implication, that, notwithstanding any of its provisions, it should be in the power of the whole Court, or any Division of the Court, or even of any single Judge in a case, to grant any relief in any individual case, which was thought to be according to justice and equity, and without prejudice to the opposite party. I am of that opinion here. Indeed it is indisputable that if we have the power to grant the relief asked, and to allow the appeal to proceed, it would be wise for us to exercise it. The only question therefore is whether we have the power. We certainly have, unless we have deprived ourselves of it, and I dispute the proposition that we have done so. This case again is taken as one of a set of test cases. The whole sum involved might have been here, and decree for it might have become final under this Act of Sederunt because of the delay in lodging the prints from a pure oversight, and from no design. Possibly a reduction might be brought, and justice done in that way, but I should more than doubt whether the party who had abandoned the appeal could bring a reduction of the judgment on the grounds on which he had appealed. But supposing it to be otherwise, what is the purpose of the Act of Sederunt? The Act was passed to prevent delay, and to expedite business and to promote economy in the carrying on of actions in the Court of Session; would it be in the interest of despatch, and I suppose of economy attending despatch, that we should be asked to try the case all over again? Even if this procedure were competent, it would only shew the necessity of the Court having the power of rendering it unnecessary. Suppose the respondent did not insist in this objection, are we to hold the Act of Sederunt so binding on us that we are in respect of the informalities to consider the appeal as abandoned?

I think too much weight has been given to Acts of Sederunt, and I am glad to have an opportunity of repeating my own opinion as to their proper character and function in regulating the course of our procedure.

No. 24.

Nov. 16, 1888.
Boyd, Gil-
mour, & Co.
v. Glasgow
and South-Western Railway Co.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—We have thought this question of such importance that we have consulted the other Division of the Court. It is the prevailing opinion that notwithstanding the terms of the Act of Sederunt the present appeal is competent, the mistake in the procedure having been made inadvertently. In deference to this opinion, I concur in the result arrived at, although if I had been left to my own unaided judgment I do not think I could have reached such a conclusion.

LORD LEE.—I am of opinion that an Act of Sederunt passed as this was, under statutory authority, is binding on the Court, and that the Court has no power to dispense with its provisions or to avoid the results which must come from them. I confess to a dislike to dispensing powers. I think they are apt to give rise to great abuse and discontent, although they are always exercised in the name of justice. But here, as your Lordships have arrived at the conclusion that, notwithstanding the express terms of the Act of Sederunt, the circumstances are such as entitle us to entertain the appeal, I by no means dissent from that conclusion. I do however dissent from some of the general principles which have been announced.

THE case was sent to the roll.

GORDON, PRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SON, W.S.—Agents.

SAMUEL WATSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—M'Nair.

No. 25.

CALLANDER COAL COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—C. S. Dickson.

Nov. 17, 1888.
Watson v.
Callander
Coal Co.

Poor's-roll.—Appeal from Sheriff Court and reporters divided in opinion.—A pursuer in a Sheriff Court action for damages for personal injury appealed to the Court of Session against a judgment of a Sheriff, affirming the judgment of his Substitute, and assailing the defenders. The pursuer applied for the benefit of the poor's-roll, and the reporters on the probabilis causa were equally divided in opinion. The Court refused the application.

Carr v. North British Railway Company, Nov. 1, 1885, 13 R. 113, followed.

SAMUEL WATSON, surfaceman, Falkirk, raised an action in the Sheriff Court there against the Callander Coal Company for damages for personal injury.

2<sup>d</sup> DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirlingshire.
I.

The Sheriff-substitute (Scott Moncrieff) assoilzied, and the Sheriff adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and applied for admission to the poor's-roll.

The Court remitted to the reporters on the probabilis causa, who reported that they were equally divided in opinion.

The pursuer moved the Court to admit.

The defenders, founding on Carr v. North British Railway,<sup>1</sup> decided by the First Division, opposed the motion, arguing that in that case the rule was laid down that where the reporters were equally divided in opinion, and both the Sheriffs were adverse to the applicant, the Court would not admit. It was different where the case was to originate in the Court of Session and no judicial opinion had been expressed on it.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 1, 1885, 13 R. 113.

<sup>2</sup> Marshall v. North British Railway, July 13, 1881, 8 R. 939.

No. 25. At advising,—

Nov. 17, 1888. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we must refuse this application.

Watson v.
Callander
Coal Co.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think we are bound to follow the judgment of the First Division in Carr's case, for the circumstances are precisely similar, unless we send the application to the whole Court, which I am not prepared to do.

LORD LEE concurred.

LORD YOUNG was present at the debate, but was absent at advising.

THE COURT refused the application.

J. D. TURNBULL, S.S.C.—J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 26.

THE SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, Pursuers and Real Raisers.

W. H. COHEN & COMPANY, Claimants (Respondents).—Salvesen.

Nov. 20, 1888.
Scottish Pro-
vident Institution v. Cohen
& Co.

GEORGE LOGAN BROOMFIELD (Walker's Trustee), Claimant (Reclaimer).—Readman.

Foreign—Right in security—Bankruptcy—Assignment—Loan—Life insurance.—A domiciled Scotsman obtained a loan in England from a domiciled Englishman, and in security therefor delivered to the latter a policy of insurance on his life with a Scottish company. The borrower died soon afterwards, and after his death the lender gave notice by letter to the Insurance Company that the policy had been assigned to him, and was in his possession. Thereafter the estates of the deceased were sequestrated, and a trustee appointed.

In a competition regarding the right to the contents of the policy between the holder of it and the trustee, held (1) that the transaction having taken place in England the rights of the holder fell to be determined by the law of that country, and (2) upon an admission by the parties as to the law of England, that the deposit of the policy and the intimation to the Insurance Company were effectual to confer a preference upon the holder of the policy.

Bankruptcy—Security—Prior debt—Act 1696, cap. 5—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 110.—Held that the securities which are struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5, and the 110th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, are securities created by some act or deed of the bankrupt or deceased debtor, and that these provisions do not apply where it is the creditor who has rendered the securities effectual.

1st Division.
Lord McLaren.
M.

IN March 1886, Messrs W. H. Cohen & Company, money-lenders in Newcastle-on-Tyne, received an application from Andrew Allan Walker, a domiciled Scotsman, for a loan of money, and after sundry negotiations it was agreed between them that they should lend him a sum of £100 on receiving from him a promissory-note for the amount, and on his depositing with them a policy of insurance for £200 granted by the Scottish Provident Institution in his favour. The transaction was concluded at a meeting which took place between Walker and a partner of the firm in their office at Newcastle on 10th April 1886.

Walker died intestate on 16th June 1887. By that date he had repaid part of the loan, but there was owing to Cohen & Company a sum of £87.

On 1st August 1887 Cohen & Company intimated by letter to the Scottish Provident Institution that Walker had assigned the insurance policy to them in security for the advance, and on 3d August following they sent a second letter stating that they had been in possession of the policy since 10th April 1886.

It subsequently appeared that Walker had been insolvent at the date of his death, and on 5th November 1887 a petition for sequestration of his estates was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills by some of his creditors. Sequestration was awarded on 19th December 1887, and George Logan Broomfield, writer, Lauder, was appointed trustee.

The Scottish Provident Institution thereafter brought a multiple-poining in order that it might be determined who had right to the proceeds of the policy.

No. 26.

Nov. 20, 1888.
Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen & Co.

Claims were lodged (1) for W. H. Cohen & Company, who pleaded;—
1. The claimants having a right of retention of said policy until payment of the said sum of £87 and interest and costs, are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim. 2. Separatim, The claimants' rights under the contract between them and the said Andrew Allan Walker fall to be determined by the law of England, and the claimants having by said law a valid lien over said policy for payment of the debt due to them, they are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

(2) For the trustee on Walker's sequestrated estates, who pleaded;—
The fund in medio being part of the sequestrated estates of the late Andrew Allan Walker, the claimant as trustee foressaid is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

Another alleged assignee of the policy and the representatives of the deceased were also called as defenders in the action, but did not lodge claims.

On 1st March 1888 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) delivered the opinion which is quoted below,* and on 3d March he pronounced an interlocutor * "OPINION.—This multiplepoining was instituted by the Scottish Provident Institution to determine which party is in right of the sum payable under a life policy issued by the institution. At the time when the action was raised, it appears that the company were ignorant of the fact that the assured had died insolvent; but they had been made aware of claims at the instance of two persons who founded upon assignments of the policy, and the action was brought to determine the question of preference as between these claimants. One of the parties, Broomfield, has not appeared. The other assignee, Mr Cohen, has appeared, and in response to an intimation made to the representatives of the assured, the trustee for his creditors has also appeared. The question now raised is between the trustee for the assured's creditors and Mr Cohen, founding on his assignment to the policy.

---

"It appears that, some considerable time before his death, Walker, the assured, had obtained a small advance—£100—from Mr Cohen, for which he gave his promissory-note, and at the same time deposited the policy of assurance as a collateral security. The assignment of the policy supposed to be effected in this way was not intimated at the time. . . . The question that arises first in order is whether a good assignment can be made of the creditor's right under the policy of assurance by deposit of the deed. . . . The next question would be (as between the trustee for creditors and the assignee), whether the criterion of preference is the date of assignment or the date of the intimation of the assignment; and I rather think that these are the only two questions necessary to be considered. I do not conceive that it lies within my jurisdiction to determine the validity of a security created by the deposit of a document under the law of England. But it is within the scope of my jurisdiction to find out by what legal system the rights of parties are to be determined. It appears to me to be reasonably clear that the validity of the assignment must be determined by the law of the country within which the assignment was made. Here the policy is issued by a company having its domicile in Scotland, and by the company's obligation a right of credit is created capable of assignment. We have nothing to consider under the law of Scotland, so far as I can see, except to see that a valid right of credit is created by the policy in the form recognised by our law. But that right of credit follows the domicile of the creditor wherever he goes, and is capable of being assigned or dealt with by him in any manner which the law recognises. The assignment of the right of credit in the policy is a new contract, distinct as regards its nature, mode of constitution, and the law that regulates it, from the contract constituted by the policy itself. And the validity of the assignment will, in general, be determined by the lex loci contractus—that is, according to the law of the country in which the transference is made or the security given.

No. 26. appointing "the claimants W. H. Cohen and Company to state in a minute . . . whether they desire to found their case solely on the

Nov. 20, 1888.

Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen & Co.

"In this case the policy was made over to a creditor in England, and it appears to me that the contract falls to be determined by the law of England. We should certainly not recognise an assignment to an English policy by way of deposit made in Scotland. That would not be recognised by us, because the assignment was not made in the way required by our law. And I think, conversely, where the assignment is made between parties dealing with reference to the law of England, that we ought to recognise the assignment, provided it is in accordance with the requirements of that law. Subject to any inquiry that may be demanded as to what is the law of England on the point, these considerations will dispose of the first question.

"But the question that arises in bankruptcy depends upon different considerations. The authority of a trustee or creditors' representative in bankruptcy is in general recognised by foreign countries; but any question of competing right between the trustee and a creditor claiming upon a preferable security must apparently be determined by the law of the country in which the competition arises. Such at least was the opinion of Lord Deas in Donaldson v. Findlay, Bannatyne, and Company, 17 D. 1053. Now, if that criterion be applied to the present case, the facts are these:—The assignment—which in the present question I assume to be valid—was not intimated at the time, but was intimated after the death of Mr Walker, the assured party, and undoubtedly before his estate had been brought under the judicial administration of the sequestration. The question is, whether such intimation gave the creditor an effectual security. Reference was made to the Statute of 1696, and to the 110th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, which extends the provisions of that statute to estates of deceased debtors. But it appears to me that neither of these statutes has any application to a case like the present, because they deal only with securities which are considered to be objectionable on the ground of being originally granted in satisfaction or security of a prior debt. And where such is the character of the security given, it is necessary in the case of real property that the security should be completed sixty days before the grantor's insolvency. So the Statute of 1696 says in express terms, and the analogue of that provision with reference to such a subject as a policy would be that it ought to be intimated sixty days before the sequestration, or sixty days before the death of a deceased debtor. But where a security is originally granted, not for a prior debt, but for an immediate advance, no statutory provision of this or any other country, I should imagine, would cut down such a transaction. There would be an end to all mercantile dealings if a security for money instantly advanced were liable to be cut down by the operation of a retrospective law. Such a rule would be in the highest degree unjust, because it would ignore the fact that, while the bankrupt has given security, his estate has at the same time received the benefit of the advance.

"Now, in the present case, according to Mr Cohen's claim—which I assume for the purpose of the present judgment to be correct in its statement of facts—the assignment of the policy was for an immediate advance of £100, and therefore it does not come within the scope of the statutes referred to at all. No doubt, if it had not been perfected by intimation to the company before the bankruptcy, it would have been objectionable on another ground,—that is to say, there would have been no constitution of a real right in the assignee until after bankruptcy, and the creditor would only be entitled to claim his dividend. But we are not in that class of cases, because the intimation was made in August, and sequestration was not applied for till November.

"The result of the consideration of the various questions argued is, that, pro promissory-note mentioned in their claim, combined with the deposit of No. 26.

the life policy as a collateral security for repayment of their advance; and meantime continues the cause in the Procedure Roll.”

On 27th June following, a minute that they did so found their case having in the meantime been lodged, his Lordship directed a case to be submitted to English counsel for his opinion on the effect of the deposit of the policy of insurance with Cohen & Company.

Nov. 20, 1888.
Scottish Pro-
vident Institution v. Cohen
& Co.

The trustee, having obtained leave, reclaimed to the First Division.

On 18th July following, the Court of session continued the cause “in order that parties may have an opportunity of ascertaining and admitting the law of England applicable to the matter in dispute.”

A minute was subsequently lodged by the parties in which they admitted “that by the law of England—where the law of England applies—the deposit by the party insured of a policy of life insurance in security of a loan of money advanced on the faith of such deposit, operates as an equitable mortgage in favour of the lender, and if followed by notice to the insurance company prior to notice of the bankruptcy of the party insured to said company, confers upon the lender, while the policy remains in his hands, a preferable right to the contents of the policy to the extent of the unpaid portion of the loan in competition with the trustee in bankruptcy of the party insured.”

Argued for the trustee;—(1) The whole question here arose out of an application for a loan made in Scotland, and fell to be decided by the law of Scotland, where the transaction had its origin. Walker's domicile was in Scotland, and his estates were sequestrated in Scotland. The competition being between a creditor claiming on an alleged preferable security and the trustee upon the sequestrated estate of the debtor, the questions between them fell to be settled by the law of the country in which the competition arose.<sup>1</sup> (2) Besides, the contents of the policy were payable in Scotland, and according to the law of that country there must be an intimated and formal assignation to make the creditor's right effectual.<sup>2</sup> It did not matter that the parties to whom the policy had been delivered were resident in England. It had been held in a previous case, where the circumstances were very similar, that the rights of parties where that was the case fell to be determined by the law of Scotland.<sup>3</sup> (3) Further, this was a security which was granted in satisfaction of a prior debt. It was so because the security was not completed, as it was alleged it was by the intimation, until long after the date of the transaction, and subsequently to the death of the bankrupt. In order to make it effectual as against the trustee, it ought to have been intimated more than sixty days before the death of the bankrupt.<sup>4</sup>

Argued for W. H. Cohen & Company;—1. The minute which had been vided it can be established either that the mere deposit of the policy is a good security by the law of England when followed by intimation, or provided the terms of the relative letter can be proved and shewn to be a good security by the law of England, then that security being followed by timely intimation, entitles Mr Cohen to a preference over the trustee in bankruptcy.

“I think that is the only deliverance that I can give at this stage of the case.”

<sup>1</sup> Donaldson v. Ord, July 5, 1855, 17 D. 1053, 27 Scot. Jur. 625.

<sup>2</sup> Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 85, sec. 1, and schedules A and B; Act 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 144, sec. 5; United Kingdom Life Assurance Co. v. Dixon, July
1, 1838, 16 S. 1277.

<sup>3</sup> Strachan v. McDougle, June 19, 1835, 13 S. 954.

<sup>4</sup> Act 1696, cap. 5; Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap.
79), sec. 110.

No. 26. lodged shewed that in two respects the law of England upon this matter differed from that of Scotland. (1) The deposit of a policy of insurance in security of a debt operated as an equitable mortgage in favour of the lender, and (2) priority of notice gave a preferable claim. It had been decided in Scotland that by the law of England a mere letter, as here, was sufficient intimation of the assignation of a policy of insurance.<sup>1</sup> Here, therefore, there was an assignment which was valid by the law of England, and any question arising out of the debt which it secured must be settled by the law of the domicile of the person who was in right to demand its payment. It was therefore the lex loci contractus which must settle the validity of the transaction. The domicile neither of creditor nor of debtor affected the matter. 2. Assuming that the question of preferences fell to be decided by the law of Scotland, the security here was not reducible as being in satisfaction of a prior debt. The security fell to be looked at as at the date of the original transaction. "The completion of the security although after an interval of time, and after the term of constructive bankruptcy has begun, is not within the intent and meaning of the Act."<sup>2</sup> Further, the completion of the security here was an act of the creditor, it was in no way the act or deed of the debtor.

Nov. 20, 1888.
Scottish Pro-
vident Institution v. Cohen
& Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have in this case no judgment of the Lord Ordinary under review, but we have his Lordship's views expressed in a note explaining his interlocutor of the 3d March last. It appears to me that these views are very sound. When the case was last before the Court upon the reclaiming note, we found that the Lord Ordinary had directed a case to be submitted to English counsel for the purpose of ascertaining the law of England applicable to the matter, if the law of England applied. Since then, upon the suggestion of the Court, the parties have ascertained what the law of England is, and have made it matter of admission, so that the Court is now in a position to dispose of the case upon its merits.

The claimants, Cohen & Company, who are money-lenders in Newcastle-on-Tyne, made an advance of £100 to Mr Walker, who is now deceased, and in return they received not only his promissory-note, but also a policy of insurance for £200 upon his life by the company who are the real raisers here. The transaction took place in England, and the constitution of the creditors' right must be determined according to the law of the country where the transaction took place,—that is, the law of England. By that law, as now admitted, "the deposit by the party insured of a policy of life insurance in security of a loan of money advanced on the faith of such deposit, operates as an equitable mortgage in favour of the lender, and if followed by notice to the insurance company prior to notice of the bankruptcy of the party insured to said company, confers upon the lender, while the policy remains in his hands, a preferable right to the contents of the policy to the extent of the unpaid portion of the loan in competition with the trustee in bankruptcy of the party insured."

Applying that law to the present case, it is to be observed that Cohen & Company, the holders of the policy, made intimation to the insurance company on 1st August 1887, after the death of Mr Walker, the party insured. That notice was,—“We beg to give you notice that Mr Andrew Allan Walker of Westruther has assigned his policy (No. 47,293 in the Scottish Provident Association) over to us as security for an advance of £100. We understand that he has since died. Please note and oblige.—Yours truly, W. H. Cohen & Co.” On 3d August following they wrote again to the insurance company,—“In reply to your favour, we beg to say that we have this policy in our possession, and have had since the date of its assignment, viz., the 10th day of April 1886.—We are, yours truly, W. H. Cohen & Co.” The sequestration of Walker’s estate as a deceased debtor was awarded on 19th December following that notice.

<sup>1</sup> Wallace v. Davies, May 25, 1853, 15 D. 688.

<sup>2</sup> Bell's Comms. II. (7th edn.) 211; cf. Taylor v. Farrie, March 8, 1855, 17 D. 639, 27 Scot. Jur. 266; Miller's Trustee v. Shield, March 19, 1862, 24 D. 821, 34 Scot. Jur. 416; Ranton & Gray's Trustee v. Dickison, June 15, 1880, 7 R. 951.

No. 26.
Nov. 20, 1888.
Scottish Pro-
vident Institution v. Cohen
& Co.

The question comes to be, applying the law of England as now ascertained, whether that intimation of the right of the depositary of the policy is sufficient to operate a preference in his favour in competition with the trustee in the sequestration. I am of opinion that it must be so. The intimation put the holders of the contents of the policy, viz., the insurance company, in the same position as if a Scottish deed of assignation had been intimated on the same date. Seeing that the deposit of the policy by the transaction in England was fully equivalent to a deed of assignment executed in Scotland, the intimation completed the right and put the receiver of the intimation in the position of holding no longer for the original creditor, but for his assignees.

It has been maintained that the 110th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, applies to the case, and that this policy must be taken to be a security for a prior debt. But it is plain that the security contemplated by the 110th section is a security created by some act or deed of the bankrupt or deceased debtor. Here, the intimation was the act of the creditor, who thereby rendered effectual a security which was validly constituted before the death of the original holder of the policy.

I am of opinion that the Messrs Cohen are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

LORD MURK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM were absent.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, and ranked and preferred W. H. Cohen & Company preferably in respect of their claim.

ROMANES & SIMSON, W.S.—BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM MITCHELL AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Murray—Shaw.
RAWYARDS COAL COMPANY AND LIQUIDATOR, Respondents.—
D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.

No. 27.
Nov. 20, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Rawyards
Coal Co. and Liquidator.

Company—Winding-up—Supervision order—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), secs. 147, 149, and 150.—On 1st November 1888 a coal company (limited) went into voluntary liquidation, and on the same day the liquidator issued a circular to the shareholders intimating that it was proposed to form a new company, and to advertise the colliery for sale at the upset price of £3000, and requesting answers before 12th November.

On 3d November one of the shareholders presented a petition to have the liquidation put under the supervision of the Court, and to have an additional liquidator appointed, stating, inter alia, that coal was rising in value, and that the present was an unfavourable time to sell the colliery. On 12th November, no answers to the circular having been returned, the liquidator advertised the

No. 27. colliery for sale on 21st November at the upset price of £3000. The case was put out for hearing in the Summar Roll on 20th November. On 19th November a minute was lodged for the petitioner and certain concurring shareholders stating that the upset price was too low, that the notice of sale was too short, and that the liquidator was a relative of certain directors who had formed the design of starting a new company, and were anxious to acquire the colliery for an inadequate consideration.

The Court refused the supervision order.

2D DIVISION.
I.

THE RAWYARDS COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts on 19th August 1872, and thereafter continued to carry on the business of coalmasters. The capital was by the memorandum of association declared to be £30,000, divided into 3000 shares of £10 each. Of these 2644 were allotted and were fully paid up, making the shareholders' capital £26,440.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the company, held on 1st November 1888, it was resolved by a majority that the company could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business; that it was advisable to wind it up voluntarily; and that Gavin Black Motherwell, solicitor, be appointed liquidator.

On 3d November William Mitchell, Airdrie, a contributory holding ninety shares, presented a petition craving the Court to direct that the liquidation should be continued subject to the supervision of the Court, and further, that an additional liquidator be appointed.

The petitioner stated that he and certain other shareholders had opposed the resolutions to wind up and appoint a liquidator; that coal had risen and was rising in value, and the present was not a favourable time to sell the works; that various questions as to the management of the company and the disposal and realisation of its assets were expected to arise; that, as there might be difficulties as to the separate action of creditors, he was desirous of obtaining the benefit of a supervision order; and that an additional liquidator ought to be appointed.

On 15th November answers were lodged for the company and the liquidator stating that the whole assets of the company were worth from £10,000 to £12,000; that its indebtedness amounted to £21,693, of which £10,643, 9s. 9d. was due to the British Linen Company Bank; that in the spring and summer of 1888 repeated unsuccessful attempts had been made to sell the colliery, plant, &c., and that they had been more than once exposed for sale at an upset price, which, if obtained, would not nearly pay the company's debts; that they were, at the date of lodging the answers, advertised for sale at a further reduced upset price; that none of the creditors objected to voluntary liquidation or to the appointment of Mr Motherwell as liquidator.

On 16th November a minute was lodged for certain shareholders (to the amount of £3440) stating that they concurred in the petition.

The case was put out for hearing on 20th November.

On 19th November a minute (boxed 20th November) was lodged for the petitioner and for a Mr Laurie, one of the minuters under the previous minute. The material averments in this minute were as follows, viz.—The minuters stated that they, as directors of the company, were liable along with John Motherwell, William Motherwell, and Andrew Aitken, the other directors, to the British Linen Company Bank for £10,643, 9s. 9d.; that they were also liable, or alleged to be liable, for a sum of £4300 in a bond granted by them and by the company in favour of William Motherwell; that William Motherwell had charged each of them to pay five-sixths of the sum in that bond, and thereafter, the charge having expired without payment, had presented a petition for sequestration of their estates, which had been granted, but recalled by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Lee), against whose judgment a reclaiming note was then pending;* that the minuter Laurie was a creditor of the company for £150 (with interest) lent to the company in May 1884; that the claims of ordinary trade creditors of the company did not exceed £200 in value. "The liquidator, Mr Gavin Black Motherwell, is a son of William Motherwell, the chairman of the company, and a nephew of John Motherwell, one of the directors. Prior to the passing of the resolution to wind up, a company had been in course of formation by these gentlemen for the purpose of purchasing the business and plant of the present concern. It was objected by, inter alios, these minuters that such a sale could not be carried out without the consent of the shareholders. Thereafter the meeting of 1st November was held, at which the resolution to wind up was passed. The design of the Messrs Motherwell throughout has been to acquire for their own benefit, and for an altogether inadequate consideration, the business, plant, &c. of the Rawyards Coal Company, and in carrying out this design they have been greatly aided by the fact that Mr John Motherwell, one of the directors, is also proprietor of the coalfields leased by the company. The interests of the creditors and of the other shareholders will thus be sacrificed.

No. 27.

Nov. 20, 1888.

Mitchell v.

Rawyards

Coal Co. and

Liquidator.

"In pursuance of this design Mr Gavin Black Motherwell, the liquidator, issued on 1st November, the date of the resolution to wind up, a circular, a copy whereof is produced and referred to. In this circular it is stated that it is proposed to form a new company, and to advertise, inter alia, the colliery for sale at the upset price of £3000. A request is made for an answer on or before the 12th November. It is not known what reply was received, but it is believed that the Messrs Motherwell have agreed to the scheme, and have obtained the assistance of the names of several friends. On 12th November, being the last date stated for receiving replies, an advertisement appeared in the Glasgow Herald of the sale of the whole colliery at the upset price of £3000, the sale to take place on the 21st instant. Said advertisement and proposed sale are not bona fide, and, if allowed to be carried out, will be disastrous to the interests of the company and its creditors. The minuters have, and can have, no confidence in the administration of the said Gavin Black Motherwell, and the circumstances are such that, in the view of the minuters, it is absolutely necessary for their protection that the liquidation should proceed under the supervision of the Court, and that an additional liquidator should be appointed.

"The time thus given to intending purchasers to inspect the subjects is only nine days—a period of at least four or five weeks being necessary for the due examination of the pits, workings, books, and plant. The sum of £3000 named as the upset is ridiculously low, the items making up the lot thus exposed standing in the company's books, as is stated in said circular, at £46,218, 17s. 9d.

"Further, the affairs of the company ought to be investigated by a neutral man, and this object has been defeated by the appointment of Mr Gavin Black Motherwell to the office as liquidator. The company has, in fact, been under the control of the Messrs Motherwell for several years past, and it is necessary that an independent investigation should be made in the interests of the minuters and other creditors."

Argued for the minuters;—The application was one which they were in titulo to make. They were creditors of the company, and also contributors. There was no instance of the refusal by the Court of an application to place a liquidation under supervision, when presented by a quali-

* The proceedings in this case are reported infra, p. 122.

No. 27. Nov. 20, 1888. Mitchell v. Rawyards Coal Co. and Liquidator. Nov. 20, 1888. Mitchell v. Rawyards Coal Co. and Liquidator. fied person. The circumstances stated in the minute made the case a strong one for granting the order. There was no legitimate interest to oppose it. Even in a case in which the Court had declined to appoint an additional liquidator, the Court had, all parties concurring, placed the liquidation under supervision.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the respondents;—The company had already resolved on a particular mode of liquidation. There was a discretion in the Court to refuse the order, and the best reason for so exercising the discretion was that the majority of the contributors and creditors desired the voluntary liquidation to be proceeded with, and did not desire that it be placed under the supervision of the Court.<sup>2</sup> Heavy loss was being caused by delay in carrying through the sale. The only relevant allegations of the petitioners had not been made till too late. The sale was to take place on 21st November, and the Court could not be asked to stop it by an order pronounced the previous day at the instance of persons who had kept back their grounds of action till the very last. The sale would not suffer from the low upset price, for the colliery had been months in the market, and previous attempts to sell it had failed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The history of this mining company seems to have been much like that of a good many other companies during the last few years. It began with a paid-up capital of about £26,400, and there was money borrowed from different banks to a large amount, the total assets of the company being, I think, £40,500. A dividend of five per cent was paid in one year, but no dividend has been paid since 1878, and there is no doubt that the case of this company has been very lamentable for some considerable time. We are told, and it was not disputed, that it is being carried on with a practical loss of about £300 per month, and a sum of more than £10,000 has been borrowed from the British Linen Company, and the directors of the company in question, including the gentlemen who have brought this petition, granted a bond for £4300, for which sum they all became jointly and severally liable. Some of the directors were solvent and able to pay, and those who were so have charged those who failed to pay. The charge has now expired, and no suspension has been raised, and these gentlemen have therefore become notour bankrupt. Now, the company was informed before the beginning of this month, that a majority of the directors were in favour of the advisability of appointing a liquidator; and on the 1st of November a meeting was held. The vote for the appointment of a liquidator, and for the appointment of Mr Motherwell as liquidator, was carried by a majority of 573 against 53. As regards value, I think I am right in saying that the proportion was at least six to one in favour of the resolution. But a question here arises in consequence of a notice issued by the liquidator requiring any of the shareholders to communicate with him before the 12th of November, and stating a proposal to float a new company, and to advertise the colliery at an upset price of £3000. The petition was presented on 3d November. On the 12th of November none of the shareholders had made any reply to the intimation of the liquidator, and it was then resolved to advertise the colliery for sale, and the sale has been advertised for the 21st,—that is, to-morrow. In these circumstances the petitioners ask us for a supervision order, and that an additional liquidator be appointed. Their case is that the notice of the sale has been far too short, that the property is being thrown away, that there has been a rise in the market in coal, and they desire to prevent this sale from proceeding. On the other hand, the liquidator, and those who agree with him, say that this is by no means the first proposal or intimation of sale, that it was well known throughout what I may call the "colliery market," that this property was for sale; that it has been put up on several occasions at prices varying from £5000 to the present upset price of £3000, and that there have been various private offers, which, however, were not accepted, one of which was over £3000, and one of, I think, £2700.

<sup>1</sup> Brightwen v. City of Glasgow Bank, Nov. 27, 1878, 6 R. 244.

<sup>2</sup> Buckley on the Companies Acts, 5th ed., p. 316-317.

No. 27.

Nov. 20, 1888.
 Mitchell v.
 Rawyards
 Coal Co. and Liquidator.

In these circumstances, the question is whether we are to pronounce an order which will have the effect of stopping the sale to-morrow. That is really the practical question before us. For myself I may say that if the question had come before us purely as it ought to have done, I should have been inclined to hold that the notice of the sale was rather too short. But then, I am sorry to say that the position, this being the very day before the proposed sale, is much aggravated by the fact that these petitioners have succeeded in putting both us and the opposite party in this position, that up to last night no real statement of their case had been tabled. Now, in this new minute there seems to be a sort of suggestion of something like a "plot" in regard to the sale. I can hardly understand this, for I think there are no facts stated in the minute which, if facts they be, were not well known to the proponers of this minute long before it was prepared; and indeed in their petition they have indicated that something of the kind, which they have now much more fully stated, was in their minds. The petitioners come therefore before us, as I think, in a most unfavourable position. There is no doubt they have a very substantial interest, because, according to the price realised for this property their own obligation and risk will be lowered or increased, but I think their present proceeding is entitled to no favourable consideration.

On the whole matter I am for refusing the prayer of the petition. I think the petitioners should have presented to us a full statement of their case at a much earlier date than they have chosen to do.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This is a petition applying for a supervision order, and the appointment of an additional liquidator. I understand that it is necessary that we should to-day make an order. If we make no order to-day, then the evil complained of by the petitioners will be necessarily caused. The motion, therefore, and the only motion, before us is whether we should now and immediately make the order craved. I do not doubt the great interest which the petitioners have here, because on the amount of the price to be realised may depend the extent of their liability under the bond to the bank, but at the same time, they are opposed to a very large body of the shareholders, and also to the greater part of the guarantors under the bond.

The first point that is pressed on us is that the proposed sale is made without due notice. It certainly is rather rapid, but I cannot hold that per se as sufficient to enable me to pronounce an order which will suspend the present administration of the company. The colliery has been for a certain time in the market; those most interested in it desire that it should be sold now, and ask us not to pronounce the order craved on the very intelligible ground that the expense of keeping it up in a saleable condition is very heavy. I cannot see any way to pronouncing any order on this first ground. The next point is that the minutes charge the liquidator with acting in concert with certain of his

No. 27. friends and relations with the view of their acquiring the subjects at an unduly cheap price. I must say I do not think these allegations form a sufficient ground to warrant the desired order, when I consider that it was only last night that they were presented to the Court. I think we cannot proceed to make an immediate order, and I must say I think the petitioners are themselves to blame for not putting forward their allegations sooner.

Nov. 20, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Rawyards
Coal Co. and Liquidator.

I therefore concur entirely with your Lordships in refusing to make any order to-day for the supervision of this company. If the parties want any further investigation into these allegations, I suppose the petition might stand over, but if, as I apprehend, the petitioners' whole interest was to secure an immediate order to-day, we may probably be able at once to dismiss the petition.

LORD LEE.—I also am for refusing this petition. The question is whether cause has been shewn why the Court should interpose under the sections of the Companies Acts to which we were referred. The burden of shewing cause is on the petitioners; and I am clear that on the petition, as originally brought, no sufficient cause was shewn. As to this new minute, I think the allegations in it are not so stated that we should deal with them as relevant for inquiry. I think we must consider them in the light of the circumstances under which they have been brought forward. I do not think the petition should be allowed to stand over in any view, but that it should now be refused.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT refused the petition.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 28. WILLIAM MITCHELL, Petitioner (Respondent).—Murray—Shaw.
Nov. 22, 1888. WILLIAM MOTHERWELL, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson—Low.
Mitchell v. Motherwell. JOHN LAURIE, Petitioner (Respondent).—Murray—Shaw.
WILLIAM MOTHERWELL, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson—Low.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Recall—Affidavit—Specification of securities—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 22.—A advanced a sum of £4300, for the purpose of carrying on a limited company, and by bond he took the company and its six directors, of whom he was one, bound to repay the loan. Thereafter A charged B, one of the six co-obligants, to refund the £4300, under deduction of one-sixth part for which he (A) was liable, and the charge having expired without payment, A thereupon obtained sequestration of B's estates. A's affidavit, produced along with the petition for sequestration, set forth the amount (£3583, 6s. 8d.) of the debt and the names of the company and of the other five directors as co-obligants. It did not mention an inhibition which A had used against B, but which was admittedly valueless, and had attached nothing. A petition by B for recall of the sequestration was thereupon presented, founding upon the 22d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,* on the grounds (1) that the affidavit did not state that he himself was liable as a co-obligant for the whole debt; and (2) that it failed to specify a security held by A over the bankrupt estate. The Court repelled the first objection, and, as regarded the second, held that as the objection was one which did not appear ex facie of the proceedings, they had a discretion as to recalling the sequestration, and that in the present case there was no ground for recalling it.

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 22, provided—" . . . Such oath in the case of a creditor residing within the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall be taken by him before a Judge Ordinary, Magistrate, or Justice of the Peace, to the verity of the debt claimed by him, and he shall in such oath state what other persons, if any, are, besides the bankrupt, liable for the debt, or any part thereof, and specify any security which he holds over the estate of the bankrupt or of other obligants, and depone that he holds no other obligants or securities than those specified; and where he holds no other person than the bankrupt so bound, and no security, he shall depone to that effect."

No. 28.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

Observations on Ballantyne v. Barr, 5 Macph. 330.

By bond, dated 15th April and recorded 4th June 1884, the Rawyards Coal Company, Limited, and William Mitchell, William Motherwell, Andrew Aitken, John Motherwell, John Laurie, and George Walkinshaw, the directors of the company, bound and obliged the company, and themselves as individuals, and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all jointly and severally, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to repay to William Motherwell the principal sum of £4300 which they had borrowed from him, with interest and penalties thereon. The sum of £4300 contained in that bond bore to be the cumulo amount contained in three prior bonds for £2000, £1800, and £500 respectively, granted in favour of the same person by the company and its directors.

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Lee.
M.

On 18th July 1888 William Mitchell was charged at the instance of William Motherwell, under the bond above narrated, and warrant thereon, to pay the principal sum of £4300 therein contained, under deduction of the sum of £716, 13s. 4d., being the charger's one-sixth proportion thereof as co-obligant.

The charge having expired without payment, and Mitchell having been thereby rendered notour bankrupt, Motherwell presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills praying for sequestration of Mitchell's estate. He produced at same time an extract of the bond and an affidavit,* as provided for in the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Sequestration was awarded on 9th August 1888 by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Shand).

Mitchell thereafter presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber for recall of the sequestration, in which he stated that he was not insolvent, and had no creditors unless Motherwell was one. The petition further set forth;—"The petitioner avers that the oath made by the said William Motherwell in support of his application for the petitioner's sequestration does not comply with the statutory requisites prescribed in the 22d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, quoted above. In particular, it does not specify the securities which the said William Motherwell held over the estates of the petitioner and his co-obligants, and it does not specify all the co-obligants. The said William Motherwell at the date of the

* The affidavit bore that Mitchell was justly due and resting owing to the deponent the sum of £3583, 6s. 8d., being the balance, after deducting £716, 13s. 4d. (being the sixth part for which the deponent was liable), of the sum of £4300 contained in the bond above mentioned granted by the company and its directors.

The affidavit further bore;—"Depones, That no part of the said debt has been paid or compensated, and that the deponent, besides the said William Mitchell, holds the said Rawyards Coal Company, Limited, the said Andrew Aitken, John Motherwell, John Lawrie, and George Walkinshaw, liable for the said debt. Depones, That the deponent also holds as security to the extent of the said sum of £500, and interest and penalties corresponding thereto, the security created by the said bond and disposition in security over (first) All and Whole that piece of ground" [the subjects were described]. "Depones, That the deponent holds no other obligants or securities for the said debt than those above specified.—All which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God."

No. 28. said oath held, and still holds, the security of an inhibition, duly executed on 4th June 1888, over the estates of the petitioner, and he also holds the security of an inhibition, duly executed on or about the same date, over the estates of the said John Laurie, a co-obligant, and he does not in the said application for sequestration specify either of the said securities. The creditor is the said William Motherwell, and he is also debtor in the said bond of 15th April 1884 for the whole debt—the parties being liable singuli in solidum. The said William Motherwell, therefore, was not entitled to charge the petitioner for payment of the whole debt, under deduction only of the said William Motherwell's pro rata share. A pro rata share may not be the ultimate liability of the petitioner or the said William Motherwell.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

“Further, the said Rawyards Coal Company, Limited, is perfectly solvent, and thus quite able to pay its debts, and the said William Motherwell's remedy was to take payment from the real debtor.

“So far as regards the said William Motherwell's claim to recover the debt, it is extinguished confusione.”

Motherwell lodged answers to the petition, in which he, inter alia, admitted that he had served letters of inhibition against both Laurie and Mitchell, but he explained that no further security was thereby created, and no advantage was obtained therefrom. He admitted that Mitchell's other debts were of small amount, but stated that the company was insolvent. He stated the following plea in law;—The petition for sequestration, and the procedure therein, having been regular and proper, and in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts, and the warrants for the decree of sequestration having been those required by the said Acts, the petition should be refused.

Motherwell had also applied for and obtained under similar circumstances sequestration of the estates of John Laurie, another of the above-mentioned co-obligants in the £4300 bond, and a petition for recall of this sequestration was presented by Laurie, and heard at the same time as that at the instance of Mitchell. The averments and pleadings of the parties were in identical terms, with this exception, that it appeared that in May 1888 Laurie had executed a general trust-conveyance, and made over his whole effects to trustees for certain purposes, and that Motherwell averred that that conveyance had been granted in fraud of his rights and of those of Laurie's other creditors.

On 6th September 1888 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—“ . . . In respect that the affidavit of the petitioning creditor is not conform to the requirements of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, recalls the sequestration of the estates of the petitioner William Mitchell, awarded by the Lord Ordinary on 9th August 1888: Prohibits any further proceedings therein: Appoints the judgment of recall to be entered in the Register of Sequestrations, and marked on the margin of the Record of Inhibitions, and decerns; and, in the circumstances, finds no expenses due.”* * “OPINION.—Although the sequestration was competently awarded, seeing that notour bankruptcy was proved, and that the affidavit produced with the petition was prima facie sufficient, the objections urged in the petition for recall must be considered in the light of the documents now produced, and of the undisputed averments.

---

“So considered, it appears (1) that the respondent, besides being creditor in the bond, was one of the joint obligants for the debt of the Rawyards Coal Company along with the petitioner and four others; and (2) that the answers contain no denial of the allegation that the respondent (the petitioning creditor)

No. 28.

The interlocutor in Laurie's case was in similar terms.

The respondent Motherwell reclaimed in both cases.

Argued for him;—The objections taken to the oath by the petitioner were three in number—(1) It was said that it did not set forth that the petitioning creditor was himself "liable for the debt," and therefore that it did not state in terms of the 22d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, "what other persons are besides the bankrupt liable for the debt." (2) It was said that the oath did not specify an inhibition which had been used on the petitioner's estate, and that there had been a failure in this respect also to comply with the provisions of the 22d section of the Act. (3) It was further said that there was no debt.

The case of Gardner v. Woodside<sup>1</sup> was inapplicable to the facts of this case. Two rules had been established in regard to such objections as were here raised. In the first place, if some statutory requirement had been omitted ex facie of the oath, the sequestration fell to be recalled. In the second, if the proceedings were ex facie valid, but something had not been specified or produced which ought to have been, then the discretion of the Court came in, and the question was what was right in the interest of all parties concerned.<sup>2</sup> In regard to the first and third objections, which were ex facie of the oath, both held an inhibition which he had used on 4th June against the present petitioner and another of the joint obligants.

"It was incumbent on the respondent, under section 22 of the statute, to state in his oath 'what other persons, if any, are liable for the debt, or any part thereof,' and also to specify 'any security which he holds over the estate of the bankrupt, or of other obligants.' It appears to be settled that an inhibition is a security which ought to be specified.

"My opinion is that the affidavit in this case did not comply with the requirements of the statute. It is framed on the assumption, which I think erroneous, that the respondent's liability as one of the joint debtors was limited to one-sixth. It states that, for the amount which the bankrupt was charged to pay, the respondent held no other obligants than the Rawyards Coal Company and the four other obligants named. But he himself was an obligant exactly in the same position as all the others.

"I think that it was a mistake on the part of the respondent to assume that because he was the creditor in the bond, he was entitled to deal with himself as one of the joint and several obligants in any other way than he deals with the rest. He himself was an obligant for every part of the debt, just as much as the others. Yet this is not stated. In fact the oath by its terms leaves it to be understood that he was under no liability after deducting one-sixth.

"Further, the affidavit is defective in not specifying the inhibition, the use of which is not denied.

"These omissions in the affidavit are not mere technicalities. They give rise to a substantial objection. For, whether the Rawyards Coal Company is insolvent or not, it puts the petitioner in a very disadvantageous position to be forced to work out his rights of relief as a sequestrated bankrupt. It is admitted in the answers that his other debts are of small amount. The respondent may have been within his legal rights in giving the petitioner a charge to pay under the bond. But he has not satisfactorily explained either why he did not mention himself as liable for the whole debt, or why he did not proceed against the proper debtor, viz., the Rawyards Coal Company. To use the process of sequestration for the purpose of gaining an undue advantage over a co-obligant, is to abuse it; and there is sufficient authority to shew that the Court even where the proceedings are ex facie regular, can prevent this—(Gardner v. Woodside, 24 D. 1133)."

<sup>1</sup> Gardner v. Woodside, June 24, 1862, 24 D. 1133, 34 Scot. Jur. 564.

<sup>2</sup> Ballantyne v. Barr, Jan. 29, 1867, 5 Macph. 330.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

No. 28. Mitchell and Lawrie were co-obligants along with the petitioning creditor, and the whole history of the transaction was given in the oath. Nov. 22, 1888. Mitchell v. Motherwell. It was unnecessary for the petitioning creditor to say that he was liable to himself for the debt. He was entitled to demand the whole minus his own one-sixth part, and to leave the other co-obligants to work out their relief. The respondents said that the debt was extinguished confusione. That was admitted so far as his one-sixth share was concerned, and if it had not been so, he might have charged any one of the co-obligants for the whole debt. In regard to the second objection, although it was true that the inhibition had been used, and had not been specified in the oath, it had attached nothing. The respondents did not state that there was any heritable estate which it could have attached, and in point of fact there was none. Further, since the Titles to Land Act, 1868, sec. 157, inhibition did not cover acquirenda. That was enough to dispose of the objection.<sup>1</sup> The case of Hay<sup>2</sup> was different, because there the inhibition was worth something. Campbell's<sup>3</sup> case had no application, because there the sequestration was recalled, on the ground that the statements in the affidavit were negatived by the statements in the document of debt. In M'Ewan's case<sup>4</sup> there were securities of considerable value which had not been specified in the affidavit, and on that ground the sequestration was recalled. It was therefore different from the present case. Further, the objections now urged, in so far at least as they were ex facie of the oath, were such as ought to have been stated and disposed of when the sequestration was granted, and as matter of fact the reasons now adduced for recall had been urged, and repelled by the Lord Ordinary (Shand), when he pronounced the interlocutor awarding sequestration on 9th August 1888.

Argued for the two petitioners ;—There had been a failure to comply with the provisions of the 22d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, in two respects, both of which were grounds for recalling the sequestration. 1. Upon the face of the oath there was a misstatement as to the "other persons besides the bankrupt liable for the debt." The deponent ought to have stated that the persons liable were the co-obligants, and that he was himself liable along with them. 2. The inhibitions used by the deponent over the estates of both petitioners had not been specified. In the question of awarding and recalling sequestration, the Court were not called upon to exercise any discretion, as the reclaimer suggested, and all considerations of equity or expediency must be laid aside.<sup>5</sup> But if the question were one of discretion for the Court, one co-obligant in a debt of the kind in question ought not to be allowed to oppress another, which was the effect of the present proceedings. The view contended for by the reclaimer proceeded upon a misapprehension of Barr's case,<sup>6</sup> founded upon a dictum at the close of Lord Benholme's opinion in that case, which was not sound. In Barr's case the sequestration was recalled, because the claim of the petitioning creditor was not vouched, which was

<sup>1</sup> M'Kay v. M'Kay's Creditors, Nov. 19, 1864, 3 Macph. 74, 37 Scot. Jur. 38; Learmonth v. Patton, July 18, 1845, 7 D. 1094, 17 Scot. Jur. 564.

<sup>2</sup> Hay v. Durham, Feb. 5, 1850, 12 D. 676, at p. 683, 21 Scot. Jur. 583.

<sup>3</sup> Campbell v. Myles, May 27, 1853, 15 D. 685, 25 Scot. Jur. 413.

<sup>4</sup> M'Ewan v. Cleugh, Dec. 7, 1842, 5 D. 273, 15 Scot. Jur. 106.

<sup>5</sup> Joel v. Gill, June 10, 1859, 21 D. 929, L. J.-C. Inglis, p. 937; Campbell v. Myles, May 27, 1853, 15 D. 685, 25 Scot. Jur. 413; Kinnes v. Adam & Son, March 8, 1882, 9 R. 698; M'Ewan v. Cleugh, Dec. 7, 1842, 5 D. 273, 15 Scot. Jur. 106.

<sup>6</sup> Ballantyne v. Barr, 5 Macph. 330.

not a matter for the discretion of the Court. The distinction which ought to be drawn was between proceedings (1) where the statutory requisites had not been complied with; and (2) where there having been no failure of the statutory requirements the sequestration fell to be recalled upon other grounds, e.g., where there were competing sequestrations. The authorities upon questions which had arisen regarding the voting for trusteeships were equally good in a question relating to the construction of the oath of the petitioning creditor.<sup>1</sup> The objections in both cases were no doubt purely technical, but the statute said that they must be enforced, and the Lord Ordinary was therefore right in recalling this sequestration.

No. 28.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has recalled this sequestration upon two grounds, which require to be considered separately, for this among other reasons, that one of them is said to appear ex facie of the proceedings themselves, and the other depends upon a matter of fact which is not disclosed upon the proceedings.

As regards the first of these two grounds, the complaint is that the petitioning creditor has failed to comply with the provisions of the 22d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which requires that the oath of the petitioning creditor shall “state what other persons, if any, are besides the bankrupt liable” for the debt which the petitioning creditor claims as due to him; and accordingly the inquiry is whether, on the face of the affidavit, it appears that persons beyond those specified in the affidavit are liable to pay the debt claimed. The bond out of which the claim arises is a peculiar document, and requires careful consideration. The object of it was to raise money for the Rawyards Coal Company. The company had no credit, and its directors interposed their personal security to carry it on. The way in which this was done was that William Motherwell, one of the directors, advanced the money required, the amount being £4300, and the bond bears that the money was advanced by him, and the obligation is to repay it to him. William Motherwell became one of six co-obligants, who were directors of the company, and in a question with his co-obligants he is only liable in payment of one-sixth part of the debt, being £716, 13s. 4d., and accordingly the debt to which he makes affidavit is £3583, 6s. 8d. That is the debt which the petitioning creditor is bound to specify in his oath, as provided by the 22d section of the statute, and he is further required to state in the affidavit “what other persons, if any, are besides the bankrupt liable for the debt.”

I think that upon a true construction of the effect of the bond Motherwell is not liable for any part of the £3583, 6s. 8d. He cannot be held to be liable to himself for any part of it, and in a question with his co-obligants he is only liable for the £716, 13s. 4d., which forms no part of the sum claimed in the affidavit. Upon these grounds it is clear that there is no one liable for the debt which is claimed whose name is not mentioned in the affidavit. That disposes of the first objection, which, if it had been well founded in point of fact, would have been quite a relevant objection, and could not have been resisted, because a failure to comply with the provision of the statute that the names of the debtors shall be set forth in the affidavit,—a failure which would appear ex facie of the document,—would, I think, be fatal to it.

<sup>1</sup> Wright v. Corrie, Nov. 19, 1842, 5 D. 164; M'Ewan v. Cleugh, 5 D. 273.

No. 28.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

The second objection is of a different kind. It is that the petitioner fails to specify in his oath "a security which he holds over the estate of the bankrupt or of other obligants." In point of fact, it is said that he held a security which might be more or less valuable, but which it is admitted he used over the estate of the bankrupt, viz., an inhibition, of which there is no mention in the affidavit. In regard to this objection, it is not one which appears ex facie of the document. It requires to be averred as matter of separate and extrinsic allegation, and if necessary to be proved, and it therefore stands in a totally different position from the other, which I have already considered.

I should like to say at once that I hold the case of Barr v. Ballantyne to decide (and this does not depend upon an obiter dictum, but is of the essence of the judgment) that there are two classes of objections which may be taken to the validity of the affidavit which must accompany a petition for sequestration, and which if substantiated afford good reasons for recalling the sequestration. The first class appears ex facie of the proceedings, but the second requires to be established otherwise. In the first the decision in the case of Barr establishes that the Court is bound to recall the sequestration if the objection is verified, and there is shewn to have been a failure to comply with the statutory requisites, having regard only to the proceedings themselves. In the second the Court is called upon to exercise its discretion as to recall. The reason for this distinction is very obvious. In the latter case, although for example there has been a failure to specify in the oath some security which the petitioning creditor may hold over the estate of the bankrupt, or of some other obligant, it may turn out that that failure is of the very slightest importance, and that no one has been prejudiced thereby. In the former case, when the petition for sequestration has been presented, with the affidavit and vouchers of the petitioning or concurring creditor, which are ex facie perfectly good and sufficient, the other creditors are entitled to rely upon the sequestration being available to them. But if the proceedings are liable to be recalled because of some latent objection, there is no security for these other creditors who are standing by and going to avail themselves of the sequestration that it will go on. These other creditors are entitled to rely upon the sequestration being good, provided the proceedings are ex facie regular. I do not mean to say that it is not open to the bankrupt to object on the ground that the debt of the petitioning creditor is bad; but if such is the fact, the Court would recall the sequestration in the exercise of its discretion, and not because of a failure to comply with the statutory provisions. Here there has been no failure to comply with the statutory provisions. The oath bears to be quite in conformity with the requisites of the statute, and accordingly the case belongs to that class where the Court in the exercise of its discretion is entitled to look to the circumstances of the case, and to the merits of the objection, and where if they are satisfied that the objection is worthless, and that the bankrupt will not suffer prejudice, they are entitled to disregard it altogether.

The inhibition which has admittedly been used in the present case by the reclaimer is worth nothing, and has secured nothing; and it is not alleged that the bankrupt is in possession of anything which it could cover. Even if it had secured something that would not have led to a dismissal of the petition for sequestration, nor would the proceedings have necessarily been thereby invalidated. The matter would have been rectified in the course of the sequestration.

On these grounds, I do not think that in the exercise of the discretion which is vested in us, we can give effect to the second objection which has been urged.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion. Two objections have been urged in favour of the recall of this sequestration. The first has regard to the amount of the debt as deponed to by the respondent, who was the petitioning creditor, and is said to arise ex facie of the affidavit. But I am of opinion with your Lordship that this objection is not well founded, as there is, I think, a substantially correct disclosure in the affidavit, as your Lordship has explained, of the position in which the respondent stands under the bond towards the other parties who were obligants along with him.

No. 28.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

The second objection is that there was a failure to specify a security held by the respondent over the bankrupt estate, as required by the 22d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, and it is said that this failure consisted in an omission to specify an inhibition which was held over the estate. It is admitted that this inhibition was used, but it is said that it was not worth much, if anything, as a security. According to the strict interpretation of the words of the statute however, I am disposed to hold that it ought to have been mentioned in the oath. The decisions, I think, go that length, for an inhibition is a security in the sense of the statute, and I do not think the circumstance that it was of little value is sufficient to justify the omission. In one of the cases which have been mentioned,<sup>1</sup> the security, which was an inhibition, was valued at only £3, 16s. 1d., and yet the Court held it should have been specified in the affidavit. But while I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it ought not to have been omitted from the affidavit, I think it is a matter for the discretion of the Court, having regard to the decision in the case of Barr v. Ballantyne, whether the sequestration should on that account be recalled; and I agree with your Lordship that this omission is not of a description which makes it necessary for us to adopt that course.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with your Lordships.

It appears to me that the passage which occurs in the case of Barr v. Ballantyne at the close of Lord Benholme's opinion, 5 Macph. 334, supplies the rule to be applied in questions of this kind. His Lordship there says,—“I am anxious to state my view on this matter, that where there is no nullity ex facie of the proceedings, though nullity may be made out on investigation, the Court may exercise its discretion as to recalling or not recalling the sequestration; but where an objection founded on the statute appears ex facie of the proceedings the Court cannot exercise any discretion, but is bound to recall.” The provisions of the 29th and 30th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, which direct the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff to give sequestration, plainly indicate that the procedure is to be of a summary nature. If the petition is presented by the debtor himself, or with his consent, the Judge is “forthwith” to grant sequestration. If the petition is not presented with his consent, the bankrupt must on citation shew that sequestration cannot competently be granted, and if he fail to do so and does not pay the debt, the Judge is to grant sequestration, and by section 31 it is provided that the deliverance awarding sequestration shall not be subject to review. The statute does not contemplate or warrant the making up of records, or other detailed procedure as between persons seeking and opposing sequestration. In cases which raise such a question as whether the bankrupt is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, or whether notour bankruptcy has been constituted—there must be some sort of investigation. Beyond that, if <sup>1</sup> Hay v. Durham, 12 D. 683.

No. 28. the affidavit and the vouchers are ex facie in terms of the statute, and the debt in any view which can be presented by or for the debtor amounts to £50, it is not intended that the Judge should refuse to grant sequestration.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

Here it is not disputed that the affidavit was in all respects ex facie regular, subject only to this observation, that it is said the petitioner was a creditor of himself as well as of the other obligants, and that therefore he ought to have mentioned himself as one of the obligants whom he held liable to himself for the debt. The debt deponed to in the affidavit amounts to £3583, 6s. 8d. The affidavit bears that certain other persons named besides the bankrupt are obligants for the debt, and that the deponent holds no other obligants, and no securities for the debt beyond one heritable security, which is specified. Everything is ex facie regular, and sequestration was properly granted. Applying the dictum of Lord Benholme, we should refuse, I think, to recall the sequestration, unless indeed it can be shewn that in justice to the bankrupt or the other creditors it ought to be recalled.

The Lord Ordinary has thought that in justice to the bankrupt it ought to be recalled. That view, I think, has been shewn to be erroneous. The bankrupt, Laurie, has attempted to put away his means and effects, and for that reason it is proper that a trustee for creditors should have a title under the sequestration to reduce the deeds granted. But even apart from this specialty, I think there is nothing in the position of the bankrupt which would entitle him to say that the sequestration should be recalled. A creditor is entitled to use the diligence of sequestration against a debtor who cannot meet his debt.

It is said that the debt is overstated in the affidavit. But assuming that it may turn out to be overstated, or subject to deduction, or repetition of a part, because it may be eventually found that certain of the obligants cannot pay their shares, and that the creditor himself must bear a share of the deficiency, yet if it appears that in any view there is a debt of £50, that is sufficient to warrant sequestration, and I should regret if the practice to give effect to this rule were altered. In any possible view a large sum is due by the debtor, even supposing the other obligants could pay nothing. The two points pleaded are technical. First, it is said the creditor should have stated that he held himself liable for part of the debt. Apparently he held he was not so liable, and your Lordship has indicated an opinion favourable to that view. That is not, I think, clear. But really the affidavit discloses the whole facts on which the question turns, and the affidavit does not preclude the question being raised and properly determined in the sequestration, it may be in accordance with the bankrupt's contention.

It is further said that there has been an omission to make mention of a certain security held by the creditor, that an inhibition has been used, and that it ought to have been stated and valued in the affidavit. I am not prepared to say that a creditor is bound to mention a security of that kind where the debtor has no heritable property. It must be borne in mind that inhibition is no longer available against future acquisitions of estate. It is not ever now said that the debtor had any heritable property. If a creditor uses an arrestment and it attaches no funds, is he bound to specify the arrestment as a security? I think not. He has attempted to get a security but failed, and an inhibition which affects no heritage is not in my view a security. Supposing however, that the debtor has heritable property, the question comes to be whether the neglect to mention the use of an inhibition is a sufficient reason for recalling the sequestration. No prejudice to anyone has been done by the absence of notice of the inhibition, and none by the failure of the creditor to refer to his own obligation to share in a deficiency caused by any obligant failing ultimately to pay his share of the debt. No. 28.

Nov. 22, 1888.
Mitchell v.
Motherwell.

In the matter of recalling a sequestration, the Statute of 1856 has no provisions relative to the ground on which a sequestration should be recalled. I think the views expressed by the Judges in the case of Barr v. Ballantyne are sound, and I am for giving effect to them. If the debtor meant to contest his liability for the debt he should have brought a suspension of the charge, which he did not do. A sequestration once granted is very important in its effects from the date of the first deliverance under section 42 of the statute, and the provisions of section 107, and the following sections relating to diligence and prescription. Creditors may very reasonably rely on a sequestration duly obtained on an affidavit and claim in all respects ex facie regular and duly vouched, and indeed are in such circumstances, I think, precluded from having a second sequestration where one has been already granted. It would be an injustice to them to recall the sequestration on any technical grounds, or on any grounds which do not go to the root or substance of the petitioning creditor's claim, or which at least go the length of shewing that an injustice has been done to the bankrupt in awarding sequestration. That is certainly not the case. I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the petition refused.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors in both cases, and refused the petitions.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—DRUMMOND & REID, S.S.C.—Agents.

MISS MAGGIE SIMPSON, Poiniding Creditor (Appellant).—W. G. Miller. No. 29.
Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v.
Jack.
REV. JAMES C. JACK, Objector (Respondent).—Sir Charles Pearson—Law.
REV. JAMES C. JACK, Petitioner (Respondent).—Sir Charles Pearson—Law.

MISS MAGGIE SIMPSON, Compearer (Appellant).—W. G. Miller.

Poiniding—Cessio—Appeal—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 26.—A Sheriff having refused to a poiniding creditor a warrant to sell under sec. 26 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, on the ground that the debtor had applied for the benefit of cessio, the creditor appealed under sec. 65 of the Court of Session Act, 1868. Held that the creditor was entitled to a warrant of sale.

Process—Extract—Sheriff Court Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 32.—Sec. 32 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, provides that no extract of any interlocutor in the Sheriff Court "shall be issued before the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute who pronounced the same shall allow the extract to be sooner issued."

An interlocutor in a Sheriff Court allowed "extract of this decree to go out upon caution being found," and extract was taken on the day after the interlocutor was issued. An objection having been taken to the competency of an appeal against the Sheriff's interlocutor, held that the words quoted above could not have the effect of restricting the time for appealing, and could not mean more than that extract was not to go out until after the fourteen days, and then only upon caution being found.

Cessio—Minister's stipend—Assignment to creditors.—The emoluments of an assistant and successor to a parish minister amounted to £100 a-year. He applied for cessio, his debts being £1100. Held that he was entitled to the benefit of cessio on his assigning £20 a-year to his creditors.

Scott v. Macdonald, March 5, 1823, 1 Shaw's App. 363, followed.

No. 29. ON 31st May 1888 the Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire at Forfar (Robertson) granted decree in absence for £1000 in an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage at the instance of Miss Maggie Simpson against the Rev. James C. Jack, minister of Kingoldrum, near Kirriemuir.

Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v.
Jack.
1st Division.
Sheriff of For-
farshire.
M.

The defender having been charged upon 13th June following on the warrant contained in the decree, the pursuer thereafter on 23d June executed a poiding of the defender's goods (which was reported to the Sheriff on 27th June following), and applied for warrant to sell the poided effects.

On 6th July following Jack presented a petition for cessio in the Sheriff Court at Forfar, stating that owing to the expired charge on the above decree he was notour bankrupt, and the Sheriff-substitute on the same day pronounced an interlocutor granting a warrant to cite creditors.

Jack thereupon lodged a caveat in the poiding, and on 16th July the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced an interlocutor refusing in hoc statu the crave for a warrant to sell.*

On 31st July 1888 he pronounced this interlocutor in the cessio process:—"Having taken the deposition of the pursuer,† James Craig Jack . . . Finds him entitled to the benefit of the process of cessio bonorum, and he having taken the statutory deposition, grants the benefit of the process of cessio bonorum, and decerns, assigns, and adjudges the pursuer's moveable property to and in favour of James Forrest junior, solicitor, Kirriemuir, as trustee for behoof of the pursuer's whole creditors, without prejudice to the pursuer granting a disposition omnium bonorum if required," &c., "and allows extract of this decree to go out upon caution being found."‡

---

* "NOTE.—This poiding of the Rev. Mr Jack's effects was reported on the 27th June. A warrant to sell would have been granted thereafter as a matter of course, but since that date Mr Jack has been declared to be notour bankrupt, and has applied for cessio. This makes his estate litigious, and equalises all diligences within sixty days prior to the bankruptcy, and within four months thereafter. The trustee in the cessio will use diligence for behoof of all the creditors, so that the poiding creditor will gain nothing by selling the effects now. The trustee will sell to greater advantage, and with less expense to all concerned. I decided the same point a few years ago, and Lord Trayner, who was then Sheriff-principal, affirmed the judgment."

† From the state of affairs lodged by Jack it appeared that his assets in July 1888 were £73, 16s. 6d., and his liabilities, including his debt of £1009, 12s. to Simpson, were £1114, 12s. His salary as assistant and successor to the minister of Kingoldrum was £91 per annum. He lived in the manse, and the glebe and cottages were worth £14 a-year.

At Jack's examination no other creditor but Simpson appeared. Jack stated in his deposition that he expected to receive the whole emoluments of the parish whenever the present incumbent ceased to have anything to do with it. The stipend of the parish was £172, 12s. 5d.

‡ "NOTE.—I was asked to make it a condition of cessio being granted that the reverend petitioner should hand over a certain proportion of his stipend to his creditors. I can see no authority for this in the Cessio Acts. Mr Goudy, in his book on Bankruptcy, page 451, seems to think that there is no way of recovering such estate for the benefit of creditors in cessios under the Debtors Act, and I certainly was not referred to any case where this had been done.

"Under the older bankruptcy law there is a case where a clergyman's stipend was conveyed to his creditors after leaving him £95, 6s. 1d. as beneficium competentie, 3 Shaw, 195, A B v. Sloan; and possibly, if I were to convert this cessio into a sequestration under the 11th section of 44 and 45 Vict. c. 22, the trustee might attach part of the reverend petitioner's salary.

Caution was found on 1st August, the day following, and the decree No. 29. was immediately extracted.

Simpson appealed in both cases—in the latter upon 3d August—and the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), on 4th October, dismissed the appeals.*

Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v.
Jack.

She then appealed in both cases to the Court of Session.

Argued for her;—1. In the poinding—The appeal was competent.<sup>1</sup> Under the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, section 26, the Sheriff was bound to have given a warrant to sell the poinded goods, unless “lawful cause” was shewn to the contrary. “Lawful cause” referred to such questions as the regularity of the proceedings, and the applicant’s right to a warrant.<sup>2</sup> If warrant of sale were not granted here, there would be a dead-lock. The appellant was the only poinding creditor, and the only person interested in the diligence. As matter of fact the respondent had become notour bankrupt on the expiry of the charge on the extracted decree on 20th June 1888, and not as the Sheriff seemed to hold when he presented the petition for cessio. 2. In the cessio—(1) The appeal was not incompetent. The words “allows extract to go out upon caution being found” were mere surplusage, and were not intended to override the statutory provision contained in the 32d section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876. They did not mean that extract was to be allowed before the expiration of fourteen days; if that had been so, the Sheriff would have specified the number of days within which extract was to be permitted. Great injustice would result from the construction put upon the words by the respondent, and the effect would be that appeal would be altogether barred, which could never have been contemplated by the Legislature.<sup>3</sup> (2) Upon the merits, the recent

This step would entail considerable expense to the creditors, and might not avail them after all, for in the case Barron v. Mitchell, 8 R. 933, it is evident, from a perusal of the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, that they would be met with a difficulty, and, looking to the small sum, if any, that would be left after leaving the petitioner a competent livelihood, I am unwilling to take this step. For if the Court in 1824 thought a clergyman could not live decently under £95, 6s. 1d. a-year, probably now that the expense of living has increased, a larger sum would be allowed. If so, there would be little or nothing over for the creditors. The petitioner is only an assistant and successor in the parish, and his whole present means are required to keep him decently in his clerical position. Should he apply for his discharge hereafter, it will be open for his creditors to object.”

* The note to the interlocutor in the poinding case was,—“NOTE.—I express no opinion as to the effects of a decree of cessio in equalising diligences. The question raised here is within the discretion of the Sheriff, and he does not seem to be entirely deprived of the power of exercising that discretion by the terms of the 26th section of the Personal Diligence Act. The only interest opposed to the course which has been followed is that of the poinder, who has a completed diligence. But his rights, including his claim for expenses, are sufficiently secured by the provisions of the statutes.”

The note to the interlocutor in the cessio case was,—“NOTE.—I am of opinion that it is not competent at this stage of process of cessio to entertain the proposal that as a condition of granting the benefit of that process, the petitioner should hand over a certain proportion of his stipend to his creditors. I do not say whether his refusal to do so may be a good ground for refusing or delaying his discharge.”

<sup>1</sup> Clark, &c., v. Hinde, Milne, & Co., Dec. 18, 1884, 12 R. 347 (Lord Shand, 354).

<sup>2</sup> Mackay’s Practice, ii. 211; Bell’s Comms. ii., 596 (7th edn. 485); Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22), sec. 11.

<sup>3</sup> Act of Sederunt, Dec. 22, 1882, sec. 3.

No. 29. Cessio Acts had not affected the conveyance of the property of the debtor. A cessio imported a dispositio omnium bonorum just as much now as under the old law.<sup>1</sup> Ministers' stipends had been held to be subject to arrestment, and in the case of Macdonald a minister had been found bound to assign half of his salary as a condition of his receiving the benefit of cessio.<sup>2</sup> So, too, a half-pay officer had had to give up the half of his pension as a condition of his obtaining cessio.<sup>3</sup> Here the respondent had a stipend of £106 a-year and a manse, and in these circumstances the cessio ought either to be refused or to be granted only conditionally on the respondent assigning a portion of his stipend to his creditors.

Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v.
Jack.

Argued for the respondent;—1. In the poiding—The duty of the Sheriff-substitute in carrying through the poiding was merely ministerial<sup>4</sup> and his interlocutor of 16th July refusing the warrant to sell was not subject to review. There was really no process, but if there was, the judgment was not a final one, and was not appealable. Before the application for cessio, the debtor was notour bankrupt, and all his creditors were then entitled to come in and share in the benefit of the existing diligence.<sup>5</sup> The object of a cessio was to give a debtor immunity from diligence. 2. In the cessio—(1) The appeal was incompetent, because as matter of fact caution was found and the decree extracted before the appeal was taken. The appellant ought to have availed herself of her opportunity to appeal sooner.<sup>6</sup> (2) On the merits, the Court ought to take into account the fact that the respondent was only assistant and successor to the parish minister, and that the expenses of living were much increased since the date of the authorities which had been cited on the other side.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Taking the appeal in the poiding first, the diligence proceeded upon an extract decree for the sum of £1000. The charge following thereon was given upon 13th June, and it expired on the 20th of the same month, and Mr Jack, the defender, accordingly on that day became notour bankrupt. His creditor then proceeded to execute a poiding, and a certificate of execution was returned to the Sheriff in common form, and was reported, by the Sheriff-officer who executed it, on 27th June. Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute appointed parties' procurators to be heard on a motion for a warrant to sell, which was the next step which would follow as a matter of course, unless any reason was adduced for suspending that warrant. After hearing the creditor and the debtor, the Sheriff-substitute in hoc statu refused a warrant to sell, and the reason he assigned for doing so is put by him thus,—“A warrant to sell would have been granted thereafter as a matter of course, but since that date Mr Jack has been declared to be notour bankrupt, and has applied for cessio. This makes his estate litigious, and equalises all diligences within sixty days prior to the bankruptcy, and within four months thereafter. The trustee in

<sup>1</sup> Debtors Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 7; Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22); Bell's Comms. ii. 5th edn. 594.

<sup>2</sup> Connell on Tithes, ii. 99; Dove Wilson's Sheriff Court Practice, 673; Scott v. Macdonald, Jan. 1715, 1 Shaw's Appa. 362; Learmonth v. Paterson, Jan. 21, 1858, 20 D. 418.

<sup>3</sup> Davidson, March 11, 1818, F. C.; cf. also Shand's Practice, 820.

<sup>4</sup> Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 26.

<sup>5</sup> Debtors Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 9, subsec. 5.

<sup>6</sup> Sheriff Court Act, 1876, secs. 26 (subsec. 4), 32, and 33; Adam v. Kinnes, Feb. 27, 1883, 10 R. 670; Tennant v. Romanes, June 22, 1881, 8 R. 824.

the cessio will use diligence for behoof of all the creditors, so that the pouncing creditor will gain nothing by selling the effects now." No. 29.

I think that that judgment proceeded upon a mistake as to the effect of a decree of cessio, and of the transfer of a bankrupt's estate by a dispositio omnium bonorum. It is very true that a debtor who applies for cessio must have been previously made notour bankrupt, and that this has the effect, which the Sheriff-substitute very properly states, of equalising diligence done within sixty days prior to the bankruptcy, and within four months thereafter. But I do not understand what the Sheriff-substitute means when he says, "the trustee in the cessio will use diligence for behoof of all the creditors." All that the trustee in a cessio has to do is to realise the estate and to distribute it. His position is not the same as that of a trustee in a sequestration. The latter is a pouncing and arresting creditor, and his diligence of pouncing and arrestment is universal, and extends to everything in the bankrupt's possession, and to the whole of what may be due to him, in the same way as if he had used pouncing and arrestment. A cessio has not the effect of a universal diligence in favour of the trustee in the cessio, and there is nothing in that appointment which to my mind can in any way prevent a pouncing creditor from going on with his diligence. It is possible that the effect of notour bankruptcy may be that other creditors will come in and share in the sale of the pointed effects. But that takes place apart from the process of cessio, and the trustee has nothing to do with the sale, although, of course, it is always subject to the effect of section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which equalises diligences in the way which I have explained. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute had no ground whatever for refusing this warrant to sell.

It is seen now, by the expiry of the four months, that apparently no other creditor is going to claim to share with the pouncing creditor in the proceeds of the sale, and in that case the effect, of course, must be that the pouncing creditor will obtain payment of her debt so far as the proceeds of the sale will go in extinction of it. I think therefore that the interlocutor refusing in hoc statu a warrant of sale is not justified by anything which has occurred.

I am just as little disposed to agree in the view of the Sheriff, who says,— "The question raised here is within the discretion of the Sheriff, and he does not seem to be entirely deprived of the power of exercising that discretion by the terms of the 26th section of the Personal Diligence Act." I do not think he is, and if any good cause could have been shewn for stopping the issue of this warrant of sale, of course it was in the discretion and in the power either of the Sheriff-substitute or of the Sheriff so to act. But there is no reason of this kind suggested; there is nothing, in short, to debar this pouncing creditor from going on in the exercise of her undoubted right, and from bringing the pointed goods to a sale.

As to the process of cessio there are two questions for consideration. The first is, whether any appeal was competent from the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 31st July 1888? The respondent says that the appeal to the Sheriff was incompetent, because the Sheriff-substitute's decree had been extracted prior to the taking of the appeal to the Sheriff.

The question therefore comes to be, was this extract justified by the terms of the interlocutor, and particularly by the part of it which deals with the extracting of the decree? The Sheriff-substitute appended these words to the end of his

Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v.
Jack.

No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v.
Jack.

interlocutor—"And allows extract of this decree to go out upon caution being found." Now, the respondent construes these words as meaning that the moment caution is found extract may be obtained, whereas, if the cause had been allowed to take its ordinary course, there could have been no extract for fourteen days. And the respondent rested this contention upon sec. 32 of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876 which provides that extract (and extracts in cessios are regulated by the same rule) shall not issue for fourteen days unless the Sheriff-substitute "shall allow the extract to be sooner issued." Now it appears to me that what that section contemplated was that if for any special cause the Sheriff shall think it right to shorten the period, and allow extract to go out at any time within fourteen days, he shall specify what that time is to be in his interlocutor. What is left to the Sheriff is to say how short the time is to be, and what are to be the number of days before which extract shall not go out. Sir Charles Pearson contended that this was not a novelty in this statute, and it is quite well known that there might be very important reasons for shortening the period before extract, and accordingly power has always been given to the Sheriff in certain cases so to shorten it.

But has the Sheriff in this case exercised the power given to him by the 32d section? In considering whether he has one cannot help looking at the effect of adopting the construction contended for by the respondent. It means, "If you find caution to-day you may extract to-day, therefore an appeal shall not be competent to-morrow." That is a somewhat startling suggestion, and it is a construction which is unknown in practice, where in the ordinary case fourteen days are allowed for appeal. The bond of caution might be ready to be lodged when the interlocutor was issued, and to adopt such a reading would undoubtedly result in injustice. But I do not think that this was the Sheriff-substitute's intention, and I have mentioned the effect of it in order to shew that it was not very likely that this was his intention. Nor do I think that the words of this interlocutor, fairly construed, bear the meaning that extract is to go out within any less time than an extract usually does; but only that the Sheriff intended to affirm emphatically that there was to be no extract until caution was found. I do not construe these words as meaning that extract is to be allowed to go out the moment caution is found. In the present case extract was taken on the 1st August, the day after the interlocutor bears to be signed, and it appears to me that that extract was in the circumstances altogether unjustifiable.

That being so, there is nothing now left in this cessio except to determine how much, if any, of the pursuer's stipend as assistant and successor in the parish of Kingoldrum ought to be assigned to his creditors as the condition of his obtaining cessio. Now, his emoluments are very small. I do not think that they can be taken as being more than £100, and certainly that sum does not leave him much room for assigning anything to his creditors consistently with his living at all in the manner becoming a parish minister.

Looking to what has been done in previous cases, both in cessios and in sequestrations, I do not think that we can call upon him to assign more than £20 out of the £100, leaving £80 at his own disposal. I think therefore that we should remit to the Sheriff in order that he may give effect to this, and find the petitioner entitled to the benefit of cessio on his assigning to his creditors £20 of his salary. Nor do I see any reason for saying that this is a proceeding in any way incompetent in a process of cessio. There is direct and clear authority in the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Scott v. Macdonald, 1 Sh. App. 362, and there are other authorities of an analogous kind which have been cited, all of which go to shew that though a person's means are derived from the emoluments of an office, or from an annuity, he is not thereby exempt from the claims of his creditors, but that some reasonable proportion of his means must be assigned to them as the condition of his obtaining the benefit of cessio. No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1888.
Simpson v. Jack.

That was what the Court did in the case of Scott, and we shall in the present case adopt the course which was there followed. The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute seem to think that the recent Cessio Acts have displaced the rule of law laid down in Scott's case, but I can only say that I have not heard anything cited from these Acts which can in any way bear out the suggestion. They are perfectly silent in regard to this matter, and therefore the common law is left to regulate the matter as it did before.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship. With regard to the pointing, I think that the pointing creditor was entitled to have a warrant to sell. Even if other creditors had appeared, I do not see that that would have made any difference, as creditors comparing are entitled to be conjoined with the first pointer.

Upon the competency of the appeal in the cessio case, I also adopt your Lordship's view. The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is no doubt rather vague as to the matter of the extract; but I do not think we are forced to put a construction upon its terms which would put it in the power of a Sheriff-substitute to stop the ends of justice by preventing appeals.

Upon the merits of the case, I am of opinion, having regard to the authority of the case of Scott v. Macdonald, that £20 is a fair sum for the respondent to be called upon to assign to his creditors as the condition of his obtaining the benefit of cessio.

LORD SHAND.—My opinion is the same in both cases.

Upon the 16th July when the Sheriff-substitute sisted the pointing, the present appellant had presented a report of the execution of the pointing which had followed upon a decree of the Court containing a warrant to point. She then craved a warrant of sale, and this the Sheriff-substitute refused, on the ground that since the date of the pointing the respondent had been "declared to be notour bankrupt," and had "applied for cessio." But in such cases the debtor is always notour bankrupt, because the fact of the expired charge, and of the pointing following upon it, makes a debtor notour bankrupt under the 7th section of the Bankruptcy Act, and even expiry of the days of charge without payment has this effect under the Act of 1880. It is out of the question to say that because the debtor is notour bankrupt, the pointing is to be stopped in order that it may be seen whether any other creditor will come forward. The pointing creditor is entitled to proceed with his diligence unless it can be shewn by the debtor, or by someone interested in the property about to be sold, that there is some good reason against it, unless for instance there is some inherent defect or impropriety in the proceedings, or it may be that the sale is being unduly hurried, so that the effects will be sacrificed. Nothing of that kind is alleged here. The fact of notour bankruptcy gives certain rights to the creditors under section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, but these rights remain whether the

No. 29. sale goes on or not. The proceeds of the pointing must be divided amongst the different creditors having and claiming their rights in terms of the statute.

Nov. 23, 1888.

Simpson v.

Jack.

The fact of notour bankruptcy does not affect the matter, and if the additional fact that the debtor has applied for cessio be added, it will make no difference. When the Sheriff-substitute refused the appellant's application for a warrant to sell, and stopped the diligence, there was only an application for cessio. Decree had not been granted. But assuming that it had been granted, it did not put the other creditors in possession of a completed diligence. If it had done that, the case might have been different, but I doubt whether even in that case there would have been ground for stopping the pointing. By the decree of cessio, the bankrupt merely conveyed the estate as it existed in himself, and subject to any preferential rights acquired by creditors, to a trustee for behoof of his creditors. The statute contains no such provisions vesting the bankrupt estate in the trustee as are contained in the Bankrupt Act of 1856. So that there appears to me to be no reason for stopping the present appellant in the pursuit of her diligence. I cannot agree with the Sheriff-substitute that the fact of the application for cessio makes "the estate litigious, and equalises all diligences within sixty days prior to the bankruptcy, and within four months thereafter," to the effect of preventing a creditor having existing diligence from carrying it out.

Nor do I agree with the Sheriff, who says, in the note to his interlocutor of the 4th October,—“The question raised here is within the discretion of the Sheriff, and he does not seem to be entirely deprived of the power of exercising that discretion by the terms of the 26th section of the Personal Diligence Act.” The 26th section of that Act provides that “on the execution of the pointing being reported, the Sheriff shall, if necessary, give orders for the security of the moveables, and if they be of a perishable nature, for the immediate disposal thereof, under such precautions as to him shall seem fit; and if not so disposed of, and if no lawful cause be shewn to the contrary, he shall, if required, grant warrant to sell them by public roup,” &c. The question therefore is,—“Is there good and lawful cause shewn for not granting the warrant of sale?” I do not think so. There is no competing diligence, nor are there other creditors in the field opposing the granting of the warrant, and having valid grounds of opposition.

In regard to the process of cessio we have first to construe the clause at the end of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 31st July, which “allows extract of the decree to go out upon caution being found.” The question is whether an appeal may be precluded in this way in the circumstances of this case. If a case should occur where for some special reason the days have been shortened, we shall have to deal with it. But I agree with what your Lordship has said, that an interlocutor allowing extract of the decree before the usual period must be rigidly construed, and I also agree with the interpretation which your Lordship has put upon this clause. I think that what the Sheriff-substitute really meant by these words was merely that caution was to be found before this decree was extracted. The interlocutor may fairly be read as implying the addition of the words “on the lapse of the usual time, caution always being found before extract.” What was meant was, that it should be a condition of extract that fourteen days should expire and caution be found.

I also agree with your Lordship in the next place as to the competency of dealing in a process of cessio with a salary or stipend or similar permanent income, and I think that £20 is a reasonable sum, such as we should ordain the respondent to assign to his creditors as a condition of his obtaining the benefit of cessio. I do not think that a gentleman in the position of the respondent should be left with an income utterly unsuitable for the office he holds, and I therefore think that at present, and looking to the amount of his emoluments, a larger sum should not be demanded from him. If, however, the respondent proceeds to ask for a discharge, another and a different question may arise, because he has prospects, and it may fairly be urged then, in view of his income being certainly increased in the event of his surviving the present incumbent, that on that event occurring a larger sum should be provided.

No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1888.

Simpson v.

Jack.

LORD ADAM was absent.

In the pointing, the Court recalled the interlocutors appealed against, and remitted to the Sheriff forthwith to grant warrant of sale of the pointed effects, and to proceed further as should be just.

In the action of cessio, the Court repelled the objections to the competency of the appeal, and found that, in addition to the dispositio omnium bonorum granted by the pursuer, he was bound, as a condition of his obtaining the benefit of cessio, to assign to the trustee his stipend to the extent of £20.

ROBERT D. KER, W.S.—REID & GUILD, W.S.—Agents.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Mackay—H. Johnston.

No. 30.

ARCHIBALD CAMERON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Appellants).—Watt.

Nov. 24, 1888.

Process—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), secs. 25, 27, 28—Decree conform.—When an order of the Crofters Commission is presented to a Sheriff, with a request for decree conform, the Sheriff, if satisfied that the order is in conformity with the statute, and has been duly recorded, should, without further procedure, grant decree conform.

Duke of Argyll v.
Cameron.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL brought a petition in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Oban against Archibald Cameron and others, crofters in Tiree, in which he set forth an order of the Crofters Commission, of date 6th October 1886, fixing the fair rent, &c. to be paid by the defenders, and concluded that the Sheriff should interpose his authority thereto, and pronounce decree conform. The petition was served upon the defenders, and the Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan), on 27th July 1888, allowed them to lodge defences.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
B.

The pursuer having appealed the Sheriff (Irvine) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor:—"Further, having considered the order of date 6th October 1887, pronounced by the Commissioners appointed for the administration of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, and being satisfied with the conformity of that order with the provisions of that Act, and that the order has been duly recorded, interpones authority to said order: Grants decree in terms thereof, and decerns."

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

The pursuer argued that the appeal was incompetent. The decision of the Crofters Commission was by the 25th section of the Crofters Act, 1886, declared to be final; and the Sheriff had pronounced decree conform in terms of the 28th section. The proceedings were summary, and there was nothing to appeal from.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Bone v. School Board of Sorn, March 16, 1888, 13 R. 768.

No. 30.

Nov. 24, 1888.
Duke of
Argyll v.
Cameron.

The appellants argued that they were entitled to lodge defences. The Act nowhere said that the proceedings were to be summary.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the appeal is incompetent, and that the subject-matter of it is such that we cannot entertain it, or look at it at all. The 25th section of the Crofters Act provides that “the decision of the Crofters Commission, in regard to any of the matters committed to their determination by this Act, shall be final.” That section of itself, it must be observed, creates a finality at a very early stage of the proceedings. The determination of the Crofters Commission is to be final. There is no appeal of any kind against it, but there is to be a registering of the determination in the Sheriff Court Books as provided by the 27th section of the Act. The 28th section provides that “any order of the Crofters Commission, or two of their number acting as herein-before provided, may be presented to the Sheriff, and the Sheriff, if satisfied that the order has been made in conformity with the provisions of this Act, and has been duly recorded, may pronounce decree in conformity with such order, on which execution and diligence shall proceed.” The object of the statute is plainly that the order of the Commission may be enforced by the ordinary diligence of the law where necessary. It is not imperative that the order shall be presented to the Sheriff; the words are “may be presented to the Sheriff”; and, as I understand it, the object of the 28th section is, by presenting the order to the Sheriff, to make it the foundation of diligence. The Sheriff is to pronounce decree conform, but he is to satisfy himself beforehand that the order has been made in conformity with the provisions of the Act. I do not understand these words to import that the Sheriff is to have a process before him or to hear parties; but he is to read the order for himself, and to see that it is in conformity with the statute, and then pronounce decree.

The notion that there is an appeal to this Court against a decree conform is quite out of the question. Such a thing was never heard of. The sole object of a decree conform is to make the order a basis for diligence, and if anything has gone wrong in the course of the proceedings, either before the Commissioners or in the deliverance of the Sheriff in pronouncing the decree as conform to the Act, that may be brought up either by way of suspension or reduction, but certainly it was not intended by the statute that there should be a process in the Sheriff Court. And there being no process in the Sheriff Court, there can be no judgment of the Sheriff which can form the subject of an appeal.

LORD MURE.—The deliverance of the Commissioners in a case of this description is final upon the merits under the 25th section of the Act; and, when duly recorded under the 27th section in the Sheriff-clerk’s office, it may be enforced under the provisions of the 28th section. That is to be done simply by presenting the order to the Sheriff, or, in other words, laying it before him for consideration, and he may pronounce decree conform in order to execution, if satisfied that the order has been made in conformity with the provisions of the Act. Now, the Sheriff appears to have been so satisfied, and has pronounced decree conform; and I am very clear, upon the ground stated by your Lordship, that this appeal is incompetent. The mistake, I think, was that the proceedings were taken under the Sheriff Court Act by formal process, which has no application to such matters as the present.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I think this appeal is incompetent because there is no process. The statute provides that the Sheriff may pronounce decree in conformity with the order of the Commissioners, and that having been done, there is an end of the matter. If there is anything wrong in the proceedings which can be made the subject of complaint, the remedy must be by way of suspension or reduction of proceedings which, though ex facie regular in terms of the statutes, have nevertheless been unwarranted or in violation of the statutory provisions.

No. 30.

Nov. 24, 1888.
Duke of
Argyll v.
Cameron.

I agree that there was an error in the Court below in attempting to make a process. But the Sheriff when the case was presented to him put that right. All that is required is that the applicant shall present the order of the Commissioners and evidence of its having been duly recorded to the Sheriff, with a request, which may be by a written minute indorsed on the order and signed by the applicant or his agent, or, I should say, even made verbally, for a decree of Court in conformity with the order. If the Sheriff is satisfied that the order has been made in conformity with the provisions of the Act and has been duly recorded, he will, without further procedure, grant decree conform.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

LINDSAY, HOWE, & Co., W.S.—CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

JANE HELEN TROTTER, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—C. N. Johnston.
GEORGE HOPPER OR HAPPER, Defender (Respondent).—Gunn.

No. 31.

Nov. 24, 1888.
Trotter v.
Happer.

Process—Jury Trial—Special Cause—Action of damages for seduction and for payment of aliment—Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 2.

—In an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage and seduction, in which there was also a conclusion for payment of the aliment of an illegitimate child, held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser, diss. Lord Shand) that no special cause had been shewn, in terms of the 2d section of the Evidence Act, 1866, why the case should not be tried by a jury.

JANE HELEN TROTTER, who was designed as a daughter of William Trotter, farmer, at Greenlaw, in the county of Berwick, brought an action of damages for breach of promise and seduction against George Hopper or Happer, a tailor and clothier in Greenlaw. There was also a conclusion for the aliment of an illegitimate child of the pursuer's, of which the defender was alleged to be the father.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 18th October 1888, allowed the parties a proof of their averments.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that no special cause had been shewn why the case should not be sent to a jury, as provided in the Evidence Act, 1866.<sup>1</sup>

The defender argued that he should be saved the expense of a jury trial in a case of this kind.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am afraid that we have no choice but to follow the provisions of the statute. The Judicature Act of 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 28, specially appropriates this class of cases for jury trial, and under that statute it was incompetent to try such cases in any other way. By the 49th sec.

<sup>1</sup> Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 28; Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 49; Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 2.

No. 31.

Nov. 24, 1888.
Trotter v.
Happer.

tion of the Court of Session Act of 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), that rule was relaxed as regarded certain of the enumerated causes in the Judicature Act, but actions of damages were specially excluded. The 2d section of the Evidence Act of 1866 granted a further relaxation, and provided that, "if both parties consent thereto, or if special cause be shewn, it shall be competent to the Lord Ordinary to take proof in the manner above provided in section 1st hereof in any cause which may be in dependence before him, notwithstanding of the provisions contained in" the above-mentioned statutes.

The cause shewn in the present case is that cases of this description are not suitable for jury trial. But that is not "special" cause; it is "general" cause, and constitutes an objection to the condition of the law as things stand. A "special" cause must be special to the case under consideration, and therefore I consider myself bound hand and foot by the statutes, and I am for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitting the case to him to adjust issues for trial by jury.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I have great difficulty in interfering with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. I quite agree that in the general case, an action of damages for seduction ought to be tried by a jury, and that it is not a good reason for taking a course different from that prescribed by the statute that a jury is too liable to act from feeling in place of judgment in favour of a pursuer suing an action of seduction. That is not "special cause" shewn.

But there are specialties in this case which, I think, warrant what the Lord Ordinary has done in determining as a matter of procedure the mode of inquiry. Besides being an action for damages for seduction, this is also an action of affiliation. There is a conclusion for payment of the aliment of an illegitimate child. The result of our sending this case to be tried by a jury will, I am afraid, be that, in the numerous actions of affiliation that are brought now in the Sheriff Court, we shall in future have a conclusion for damages for seduction in order that the pursuer may have her case tried in that way.

Here the pursuer is the daughter of a person in humble circumstances, "who rents eight or nine acres of land, and does carting work" in the district; and the defender is a tailor and clothier in the village of Greenlaw, which has a population of about 800. Had the case been one between farm servants, which ought to be tried in the Sheriff Court, though it might competently be raised in the Supreme Court, I should say it ought certainly not to be sent to a jury. This case seems to me also to be a proper one for the Sheriff Court, and for the Sheriff Court only, looking to the expense of litigation in the Court of Session, and the rank in life of the parties; and that being so, I think the Lord Ordinary was right in his view that it ought to be tried before himself without a jury, at the least expense. Therefore, upon the whole, I agree with his Lordship.

LORD ADAM.—If the question were open whether this was a case for a jury trial or not, I think perhaps it would be more appropriate for trial by a proof before the Lord Ordinary. But, as matter of right, the pursuer is entitled to have it tried before a jury, unless the defender is able to shew special cause why it should not be so tried. Two causes are alleged here. The first is that there may be a miscarriage of justice, owing to the jury being carried away by the eloquence and rhetoric of the pursuer's counsel. But that is a cause which applies to all cases. It is not a special cause, and is no reason for not sending the case to a jury. The second special cause is, that looking to the rank in life of the parties to the present action, it is undesirable and inexpedient on the ground of expense that the case should be sent to a jury. The pursuer is a daughter of a farmer at Greenlaw, and it is averred by her that "the defender is in good circumstances, and carries on a good business as a tailor and clothier, and has a number of men in his employment." Such is the description of the parties to the action; and holding, as I do, that the pursuer has a right to go before a jury, unless the defender can shew special cause why it should not, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that no such cause has been shewn here.

No. 31.

Nov. 24, 1888.
Trotter v.
Happer.

The COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to his Lordship to adjust issues for the trial of the cause.

ANDREW WALLACE, Solicitor—WHIGHAM & COWAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM KIRK DICKSON, Claimant (Appellant).—Crole.

No. 32.

JAMES MACDONALD, W.S., Objector (Respondent).—A. J. Young.

Nov. 26, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Dickson.

Election Law—Lodger.—Held that a son who was allowed by his father, without contract or payment of rent, the sole use of two rooms in the father's house of the requisite yearly value, was not entitled to be enrolled as a lodger.

WILLIAM KIRK DICKSON claimed to be entered on the roll of voters for the burgh of Edinburgh (West Division), as a lodger.

James Macdonald, W.S., a voter on the roll, objected on the ground that the claimant did not pay rent for his lodgings.

The Sheriff (Crichton) rejected the claim, and the claimant took a case.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Lord Mure.
Lord Lee.
Lord Kinnear.
Sheriff of the Lothians.

The Sheriff stated the facts thus:—"That the claimant has occupied for some years past two rooms at No. 38 York Place, of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of upwards of £10; that he has had the sole use of these rooms; that he has paid no rent for them, but has enjoyed them as a gift, and as part of his allowance from his father."

The question of law was:—"Whether, in order to constitute a lodger qualification, it is essential that the claimant should have paid rent for the rooms occupied by him, or whether enjoying the use of them as part of an allowance as a gift is sufficient?"

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.*

LORD MURE—I do not think it necessary to call upon the respondent here. It seems to me that the Sheriff has taken a sound view. The possession of two rooms in a father's house as a gift is no contract in any sense of the word. It was, as I understand it in this case, defeasible at any moment. In the case of Brown v. Martin, and the other cases reported with it, the sons actually paid a rent in money or money's worth, and were living continuously, and by contract, in the rooms occupied by them for the period of time required by the statute, but I know of no authority under the statute to give to a son occupying a room in his father's house, by permission of his father, a right to be enrolled in respect of that permission, which may be withdrawn at any time.

* Authorities cited by the claimant.—Brown v. Martins, &c., Nov. 6, 1885, 13 R. 159; Ferguson v. Kerr, Nov. 6, 1879, 7 R. 7; Parker v. Campion, Nov. 29, 1870, 1 Reg. and Land Act Irish App. 75.

No. 32.

Nov. 26, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Dickson.

LORD LEE.—I come to the same conclusion. I have no doubt whatever that a father may agree with his son to give him rooms on such terms, with or without payment, as to give him a right to claim as a lodger, but the question is whether there is anything of that kind set out in this case. I think there is not. There is no adverse claim to be regarded as sole tenant stateable by the son here as against his father.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The qualification is that the claimant shall have as a lodger, and as sole tenant, occupied lodgings of a certain yearly value. A person who occupies lodgings as sole tenant must occupy them under a contract of lease, and the admission in this case is that the claimant has not occupied under any contract whatever, but by the gift or tolerance of the owner or occupier of the house. Upon the admitted state of the facts it seems perfectly clear that the occupancy of the claimant might have been determined by the will of his father at any moment during the twelve months. I think that is not a right qualifying under the statute.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

WILLIAM BLACK, S.S.C.—JAMES MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 33.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Cheape v.
Kinmont.

GEORGE C. CHEAPE AND OTHERS, Appellants.—Chisholm.
WILLIAM G. KINMONT, Respondent.—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Inhabited house duties—Hunt-kennels—House Tax Act, 1808 (48 Geo. III. cap. 55), schedule B, rule 2—Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36), schedule.—The master and committee of subscribers to a pack of fox-hounds were tenants of premises used for the purposes of the hunt—viz., dwelling-houses for the huntsman and whips, stables for twenty horses, kennels for about fifty couples of hounds, and two or three acres of land for exercising, &c. The premises were all in one enclosure, and the cumulo rent was £40, but none of the houses was by itself of the annual value of £20. Held that the premises were liable for inhabited house duty at 9d. per £ under schedule B, rule 2, of the House Tax Act of 1808, and the schedule appended to the Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851.

Exchequer
Cause.
1st Division.
M.

AT a meeting of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the county of Edinburgh held on 2d April 1888, Captain Cheape, Master of the Linlithgow and Stirlingshire Foxhounds, on behalf of himself and the other members of the committee of subscribers to the hounds, appealed against an assessment of £1, 10s. made upon them for inhabited house duty for the year ending on 24th May 1888, at the rate of 9d. per pound on £40, the rent of premises occupied by the Committee at Golfhall, parish of Corstorphine, and belonging to Sir James R. Gibson Maitland, Bart.

The Commissioners refused the appeal, and a case was stated at the request of the appellants for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The assessment appealed against was levied in terms of the Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36), and the House Tax Act, 1808 (48 Geo. III. cap. 55).*

---

* The schedule annexed to the Act 14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36, provides,—“On every inhabited dwelling-house which, together with the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of twenty pounds or upwards by the year . . . And where any such dwelling-

The following facts were set forth in the case :—"The premises consist of,—(1) A two-storey dwelling-house of six apartments, occupied by James Beaven, the huntsman, of the probable annual value of £9. (2) A cottage of two apartments and a bed-closet, occupied by the first whip, worth probably £4 per annum. (3) A groom's house of three rooms, worth £4 per annum. (4) Stables, with harness room, and other accommodation for 20 horses. (5) A kennel capable of holding about 50 dog hounds, with exercising yard attached. (6) A kennel capable of holding 50 bitches, with exercising yard attached. (7) A small kennel with yard attached. (8) Two boiling-houses, and several other outhouses. (9) About three and a-quarter acres of land on the east side of the kennels, which is used chiefly as a training and exercising yard. These subjects are let at a cumulo rent of £40, with £9, 15s. 8d. as for interest on expenditure on the kennels some years ago. The interest is regarded by all parties as equal to the rent of the land, and it is assumed that the balance of £40 represents the annual value of the whole buildings."

No. 33.

Nov. 27, 1888.

Cheape v.
Kinmont.

Argued for the appellants ;—None of the houses mentioned in the case were of the annual value of £20, and therefore the case did not fall within the schedule of the Act of 1851. They had no internal communication with each other, and could not therefore be charged on the cumulo rent. The offices, &c., mentioned in schedule B of the Act of 1808, were offices attached to a gentleman's residence, and not houses such as these, which were totally unconnected with the residences of any of the committee. They more nearly resembled the houses occupied by miners and belonging to a mining company, which, though forming possibly a large village, were not assessable.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the respondent ;—The hunt committee occupied the huntsman's dwelling-house and the other houses by their servants, and the whole premises formed part of an enclosed subject entirely used for the purposes of the hunt. The subject must therefore be looked on as a whole, and assessed on the cumulo annual value.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Act which imposes the duty which is now laid on the appellant is that of 14 and 15 Vict. c. 36, and the schedule, which is the important part of that Act, authorises duties to be levied upon inhabited dwelling-houses according to the annual value thereof—that is to say, on "every inhabited dwelling-house which, together with the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of £20" a-year. There must be an inhabited dwelling-house in order to bring the subject of the assessment within the scope of the schedule, but that inhabited dwelling-house need not of itself be of the value of £20 if the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged make it up to house shall not be occupied and used for any such purpose, and in manner fore-said, [as a shop, licensed house, &c.] there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value thereof the sum of ninepence."

By section 2 of that Act certain of the powers and provisions of former Acts were continued, inter alia, those set forth in schedule B of 48 Geo. III. cap. 55.

Schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, provides (rule 2),—"Every coach-house, stable . . . and all other offices, and all yards, courts, and curtilages, and gardens, and pleasure grounds belonging to and occupied with any dwelling-house, shall in charging the said duties be valued together with such dwelling-house, provided no more than one acre of such gardens and pleasure grounds shall in any case be so valued."

<sup>1</sup> Douglas v. Young, Nov. 14, 1879, 7 R. 229, see Lord President, pp. 230-231, and Lord Deas, p. 232.

No. 33.

Nov. 27, 1888.
 Cheape v.
 Kinnmont.

that amount. And with regard to the different modes of occupation we have it provided in the schedule that where the dwelling-house is occupied by any person in trade who shall expose for sale and sell any goods in any shop or warehouse, being part of a dwelling-house, and also where a dwelling-house shall be occupied by any person who shall be duly licensed to sell beer, ale, wine, or other liquors, and also where any dwelling-house shall be a farm-house occupied by the tenant or farm-servants, and bona fide used for the purposes of husbandry only, the assessment is to be at the rate of 6d. per £. In all other cases, except these three, the assessment is to be at the rate of 9d. per £. But it is obvious that what is contemplated in all these cases is that the dwelling-house may be occupied by a person other than the person assessed, for there is given as one example a dwelling-house, being a farm-house, occupied by a farm servant, upon which nevertheless the owner or tenant may be assessed. Now, the schedule of the old Act of 48 Geo. III., to which this later statute refers us back, has this rule—"Every coach-house, stable, brew-house," and so forth "belonging to and occupied with any dwelling-house shall, in charging the said duties, be valued together with such dwelling-house," provided that no more than one acre of garden ground shall in any case be so valued. Then the question comes to be, have we in this case a dwelling-house to begin with? Undoubtedly we have; there is a dwelling-house of some importance. It is said not to be quite of the value of £20 in itself, but nevertheless it is a two-storeyed house with six rooms, and is occupied by the huntsman, who, of course, is the chief man in the premises. The other houses consist of stables and kennels, which are occupied along with the dwelling-house in this sense, that they are all occupied for the purposes of the hunt; they are all occupied for one and the same general purpose, and therefore they seem to me to fall within the description both of the schedule in the old Act and of the schedule in the new Act. Now, it is not pretended that these premises are under the value of £20; on the contrary, they are very much above it, and therefore it appears to me that the Acts of Parliament are directly applicable. Some reference was made to the fact of the different buildings constituting these premises having separate entrances and no internal communication, but that has no relevancy in regard to a subject of this kind. The second rule in the schedule of the Act of 48 Geo. III. makes no reference to internal communication or anything of the kind as being necessary; on the contrary, it is quite obvious that the sort of premises there in view are premises occupied in connection with the dwelling-house, but not by any means necessarily communicating with the dwelling-house in any way. And just as little is there any such idea to be found in the schedule of the more recent statute. I therefore think this duty is well laid on.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—It appears to me upon the statement of the case that we have here a dwelling-house and pertinents, such as are described in rule second of the Act of 48 Geo. III., in the occupation of the committee of the hunt, upon whom the assessment has been laid, and as these are to be regarded, as I think, as one subject, and are above the value which renders the subjects liable to assessment, I have no doubt the assessment has been well laid on.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

WILLIAM HENDERSON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—R. V. Campbell—Baxter. No. 34.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Defender (Respondent).—A. J. Young.

Public-house—Certificate—Early-closing licence—Remission of one-seventh of duty—Inland Revenue Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 20), sec. 44—Public-Houses Hours of Closing Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 38), sec. 4 (b).—The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, enacted, by schedule A, No. 2, a form for publicans' certificates in Scotland which fixed eleven P.M. as the hour for the closing of public-houses. By section 7 of the Licensing Act, 1874, extended to Scotland by section 44 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, it was enacted that where the applicant for a licence should apply to the Justices to insert in the licence a condition that he should close his premises "one hour earlier at night than that at which such premises would otherwise have to be closed," such condition should be inserted, and that the holder of such an early-closing licence should be entitled to obtain such licence on payment of six-sevenths of the duty which would have been payable by him had such condition not been inserted. Sec. 4 of the Public-Houses Early Closing Act, 1887 (which did not apply to towns and other populous places containing 50,000 inhabitants), enacted a new form of certificate under which publicans were debarred from keeping open their premises "after such hour at night of any day not earlier than ten and not later than eleven as the licensing authority may direct."

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

The licensing authority of Midlothian resolved that from and after Whitsunday 1888, and until the licensing authority shall otherwise determine, all licensed houses within the county "shall be closed at ten o'clock at night."

The holder of a certificate which, in terms of that resolution, fixed the hour for closing at ten P.M., raised an action against the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, concluding for repayment of one-seventh of the duty paid by him under protest for his certificate, in respect that the ordinary hour of closing being eleven o'clock he held an "early-closing certificate" within the meaning of section 7 of the Licensing Act, 1874, as extended to Scotland. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Fraser) that under the Licensing Act of 1887 there was no ordinary hour for closing within the district other than that fixed by the magistrates, and that ten o'clock being the hour so fixed, the pursuer was not entitled to the remission claimed.

WILLIAM HENDERSON, wine and spirit merchant, Straiton, Midlothian, on 20th June 1888, raised an action against the Lord Advocate, as representing the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, concluding for payment of £4, 5s. 9d., being one-seventh of the licence duty paid by him under protest for the year May 1888 to May 1889.

1st DIVISION.
Exchequer
Cause.
M.

The pursuer averred;—"The pursuer applied for his present certificate in the statutory form of application prescribed by 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, sec. 8 (1862). Upon this application he has obtained and taken out as his licence for the present year a licence containing conditions rendering such licences a six-day licence as well as an early-closing licence, inasmuch as he is forbidden to sell on Sunday, and is specially directed not to keep open house after ten P.M., being one hour earlier at night than that at which his premises would otherwise have to be closed. The pursuer has therefore, in terms of sections 7 and 8 of 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 49, as extended to Scotland by sec. 44 of the Inland Revenue Act of 1880,* claimed deduction of two-sevenths from the total licence duty as

* The Inland Revenue Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 20), sec. 44, enacts,—
"The provisions regarding six-days' licences and early-closing licences contained in section 49 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and sections 7 and 8 of the Licensing Act, 1874, shall be deemed to apply throughout the United Kingdom."

The Licensing Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 94), sec. 49, is quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note.

The Licensing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 49), section 7, enacts that when an application is made for a licence, and the applicant applies to the

No. 34. calculated upon his rental. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, while granting the former established deduction of one-seventh as for a six-day licence, have refused or delayed to grant to the pursuer deduction of one-seventh as for an early-closing licence, leaving it to the pursuer by agreement to try the question of his right to this further deduction in the present form. . . .” (Cond. 5) “The ordinary hour for closing licensed premises in Scotland had been, from the passing of the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, in 1862,* eleven o’clock P.M. This hour for closing remained and remains the statutory and ordinary hour for closing where no special regulation to the contrary is made under such special powers as have from time to time been conferred on the licensing authorities. Power to change the statutory certificates in certain localities so as to cause early closing was contained in section 2 of 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35. Further power in the same direction was conferred by 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 38, entitled ‘An Act to provide for the earlier closing of premises licensed for the Sale of Exciseable Liquors in Scotland.’† This last-

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

Justices to insert in the licence a condition “that he shall close the premises in respect of which such licence is or is to be granted one hour earlier at night than that at which such premises would otherwise have to be closed, the Justices shall insert the said condition in such licence. The holder of a licence in which such condition is inserted (in this Act referred to as an early-closing licence) shall close his premises at night one hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed, under the provisions of this Act. . . . The holder of an early-closing licence may obtain from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue any licence granted by such Commissioners, which he is entitled to obtain in pursuance of such early-closing licence upon payment of a sum representing six-sevenths of the duty which would otherwise be payable by him for a similar licence not limited to such early closing as aforesaid.”

Sec. 8 enacts that “a person who takes out a licence containing conditions rendering such licence a six-days’ licence, as well as an early-closing licence, shall be entitled to a remission of two-sevenths of the duty.”

* The Act of 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), sec. 2, enacts that the forms of certificate in schedule A shall be used. In schedule A the form of certificate for public-houses contains this condition,—“And do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquor before eight of the clock in the morning or after eleven of the clock at night of any day; . . . and do not open his house for the sale of any exciseable liquors, or permit or suffer any drinking therein, or on the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out the same or any other goods or commodities on Sunday.”

Sec. 2 contains this provision:—“Provided always that in any particular locality within any county or district or burgh requiring other hours for opening and closing . . . public-houses than those specified in the forms of certificates, . . . it shall be lawful for such Justices or Magistrates respectively to insert in such certificates such other hours, not being earlier than six of the clock or later than eight of the clock in the morning for opening, or earlier than nine of the clock or later than eleven of the clock in the evening for closing the same, as they shall think fit.”

† The Act of 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 38), sec. 4, enacts,—“(b) The form of certificate for public-houses set forth in schedule A of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, shall be amended as follows:—The words ‘and do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning or after eleven o’clock at night of any day,’ shall be omitted from the said certificate, and there shall be inserted in the said certificate in place thereof these words,—‘And do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or mentioned Act, which applies only to the country districts in Scotland, exclusive of the larger towns, does not by any general or imperative enactment introduce any new statutory hour for closing different from eleven P.M., but it gives power to Quarter Sessions in counties to direct the closing of licensed premises at any hour not earlier than ten P.M., nor later than eleven P.M. According to the form of certificate therein provided, the pursuer, or any other licence-holder in his position, would still be entitled to keep open until eleven P.M. in the absence of any special direction to the contrary by the licensing authority. The pursuer has, however, been under, as is assumed, the special powers of this new statute, directed to close at ten o'clock P.M. for the current year by the following special endorsement upon his current certificate, viz.—'The licensing authority, at a meeting held on 14th March 1888, resolved that from and after Whitsunday next, and until the licensing authority shall otherwise determine, all licensed houses within the county of Midlothian shall be closed at ten o'clock at night.' It is not the case that all licensed houses within the county of Midlothian are closed at ten P.M. In particular, and as one instance, the licensed premises at Granton, within the said county, known as the Granton Hotel, are open under the certificate granted by the licensing authority of the county until the ordinary statutory hour of eleven P.M. All licensed houses in Edinburgh, and also in Leith (including Newhaven), are within the county of Midlothian, and are also open till eleven P.M."

The defender answered,—“Admitted that the pursuer made application for his certificate in statutory form. Denied that he has obtained an early-closing licence. His licence does not oblige him to close at an hour earlier at night than that which applies generally to other licensed houses within the district, nor did he apply to the Licensing Justices to insert in his licence a condition that he should close one hour earlier than the general hour of closing fixed for the other licensed houses.” And with reference to cond. 5 he answered,—(Ans. 5) “The licensing authority has directed that all licensed houses within the county of Midlothian shall be closed at ten o'clock at night, and that is now the statutory hour for closing within that district. In the case of the Granton Hotel, the hotelkeeper on the 11th of July last presented a petition for leave to keep his premises open till eleven P.M., instead of closing at ten P.M., in terms of the general resolution of the licensing authority, and of that date the Licensing Justices authorised the petitioner to keep his hotel open till eleven P.M., and the petitioner's certificate was endorsed accordingly. Admitted that Edinburgh and also Leith (including Newhaven) are locally within the county of Midlothian, and explained that they are not within the Midlothian licensing district, and that Edinburgh is a county in itself. Quoad ultra denied.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer is, in law and within the meaning of the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, the holder of an early-closing licence for the current year, and he is therefore entitled to a deduction of one-seventh from the licence duty imposed by the said statute.

The defender pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the statutes applicable to the case, an early-closing licence means a licence for premises closed an hour earlier at night than other licensed premises in the same district. (2) The pursuer not being the holder of an early-closing sell or give out therefrom any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning, or after such hour at night of any day not earlier than ten and not later than eleven, as the licensing authority may direct.”

The Act does not apply to towns and other populous places containing 50,000 inhabitants.

No. 34.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

No. 34

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

licence, is not entitled to the deduction which he claims, and the defender ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 27th October 1888, pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defender from the conclusions of the summons.*

* * "OPINION.—The sum sued for in this action is only £4, 5s. 9d., but it is stated on the record that the action is brought by agreement, in order to settle an important point on the construction of the Revenue Laws as to publicans' licences. It is necessary, in disposing of the question raised, to consider not merely the statutes relative to public-houses applicable exclusively to Scotland, but also certain Inland Revenue Acts which are applicable to the United Kingdom.

"The first Statute (1872) requiring attention is the Act 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 94, which by the second section is declared not to extend to Scotland, but which in part, by a subsequent enactment, was so extended. The 49th section of this Act, dealing with Sunday trading, enacts as follows:—'Where on the occasion of an application for a new licence or transfer, or renewal of a licence which authorises the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises, the applicant at the time of his application applies to the Licensing Justices to insert in his licence a condition that he shall keep the premises in respect of which such licence is or is to be granted closed during the whole of Sunday, the Justices shall insert the said condition in such licence. The holder of a licence in which such condition is inserted (in this Act referred to as a six-day licence) shall keep his premises closed during the whole of Sunday, and the provisions of this Act with respect to the closing of licensed premises during certain hours on Sunday shall apply to the premises in respect of which a six-day licence is granted as if the whole of Sunday were mentioned in those provisions instead of certain hours only. The holder of a six-day licence may obtain from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue any licence granted by such Commissioners which he is entitled to obtain in pursuance of such six-day licence, upon payment of six-seventh parts of the duty which would otherwise be payable by him for a similar licence not limited to six days; and if he sell any intoxicating liquor on Sunday, he shall be deemed to be selling intoxicating liquor without a licence.'

"The next Statute (1874) is 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 49, which the defender says is not exclusively applicable to England, and there is no express declaration in the statute, as there is in the Act of 1872, that it is not to extend to Scotland. It is of no consequence to determine the point, because by a subsequent enactment the two sections bearing upon the present question have been made applicable to the United Kingdom. The 7th section of this statute enacts that when an application is made for a licence, and the applicant applies to the Justices to insert in the licence a condition 'that he shall close the premises in respect of which such licence is or is to be granted one hour earlier at night than that at which such premises would otherwise have to be closed, the Justices shall insert the said condition in such licence.' And then it is enacted that 'the holder of an early-closing licence in which such condition is inserted (in this Act referred to as an early-closing licence) shall close his premises at night one hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed under the provisions of this Act.' It is next enacted that the holder of such early-closing licence may obtain from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the licence granted by such Commissioners upon payment of six-sevenths of the duty which would otherwise be payable by him for a licence not limited to such early closing. And the 8th section enacts that 'a person who takes out a licence containing conditions rendering such licence a six-day licence, as well as an early-closing licence, shall be entitled to a remission of two-sevenths of the duty,' that is to say, an English publican who takes a licence with the condition that he shall not open his house on Sunday, and who agrees to shut it an hour earlier on other days of the week, gets a deduction of two-sevenths of the duty.

"These two statutes apparently were held to be applicable only to England,

The pursuer reclaimed.

No. 34.

LORD PRESIDENT.—By the Inland Revenue Act of 1880 it is enacted that Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

because by the Inland Revenue Act of 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 20), sec. 44, it is enacted 'that the provisions regarding six-day licences and early-closing licences, contained in section 49 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and sections 7 and 8 of the Licensing Act, 1874, shall be deemed to apply throughout the United Kingdom.'

"The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have recognised the right of the Scottish publican to a remission of duty by reason that he is by the Scots law restricted to a six-day licence in respect that he cannot open his premises on Sunday, but they have refused to recognise his right to demand remission of duty on account of his being restrained by the regulation of the Justices acting under the recent Public-Houses Hours of Closing (Scotland) Act, 1887, from carrying on his trade beyond ten o'clock at night. The pursuer contends that he is thus forced to an early closing, and is entitled in consequence to remission of another one-seventh of the duty.

"It is therefore necessary now to see what is the course of legislation in reference to this matter of early closing in Scotland. The English practice of the applicant applying to the Justices to insert in his licence from them (in Scotland called a certificate) a condition that he will close his premises one hour earlier than the ordinary hour for closing, is not in accordance with the Scottish practice. It is not necessary to have such an application in order to limit the publican's business hours. The certificate which he received from the Justices peremptorily stated, until the passing of the Act of 1887, hereafter mentioned, what is the hour of closing without the intervention of the applicant at all. It is unnecessary to refer to the earlier statutes, because this subject, until last year, was regulated by the Act of 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35). The 2d section of this Act enacts, that 'the forms of certificates contained in schedule A to this Act annexed shall come in place of the forms of certificates provided by the recited Acts, or either of them.' Now, schedule A contains a form of certificate for public-houses in which there is this enactment,—'And do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning or after eleven of the clock at night of any day; . . . and do not open his house for the sale of any exciseable liquors, or permit or suffer any drinking therein, or on the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out the same or any other goods or commodities on Sunday.' There is in the body of the statute itself no provision enacting any rule as to the hour of closing. It rests simply on this certificate. This clause in the certificate was a repetition of the form contained in the Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 67), called the Forbes Mackenzie Act, where it appears for the first time. In the Home Drummond Act (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58) the condition in the certificate is merely that the publican shall not suffer drinking in the premises 'during the hours of divine service on Sundays, or other days set aside for public worship by lawful authority, nor keep the same open at unseasonable hours.'

"A further step in the way of restriction, or in the power of restraining the publican, was taken in the Act of 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 38), which does not apply to any town, burgh, or other populous place containing 50,000 inhabitants. It is not disputed that it applies to the premises held by the pursuer. Now, the 4th section of this Act materially alters the terms of the certificate, for it enacts—'(b) The form of certificate for public-houses set forth in schedule A of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, shall be amended as follows:—The words "and do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning or after eleven o'clock at night of any day," shall be omitted from the said certificate, and there shall be inserted in the said certificate in place thereof these words "and do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belong-

N<sup>o</sup>. 34.
Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

"The provisions regarding six-day licences and early-closing licences, contained in section 49 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and sections 7 and 8 of the Licensing Act, 1874, shall be deemed to apply throughout the United Kingdom." Now, of course that means only that if there are cases in Scotland or Ireland of the same nature as those provided for in these previous statutes with regard to England, then the previous Acts shall apply to these cases. It becomes necessary therefore to consider what is the case of a six-day licence and what is the case of an early-closing licence, which entitles a party holding such licence to a deduction from the full amount of his licence duty.

ing thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning, or after such hour at night of any day not earlier than ten and not later than eleven, as the licensing authority may direct." Acting under the powers thus conferred upon them, the Justices of Midlothian, at a meeting held on the 14th of March 1888, resolved,—'That from and after Whitsunday next, and until the licensing authority shall otherwise determine, all licensed houses within the county of Midlothian shall be closed at ten o'clock at night.' The pursuer does not state that in defiance of this resolution of the Justices he has kept his premises open, and the remedy he seeks is a return of duty in consequence of the loss he sustains by the restriction of the hours of business. It was suggested that the Justices had no power to pass a general resolution applicable to the whole county of Midlothian, but that they must deal with each man's certificate by itself if they choose to restrict the business hours. The Lord Ordinary is not called upon in this process to deal with any such question. All that he has to determine is, whether there is a good claim in law here for the return of one-seventh of the duty in addition to the one-seventh at present allowed for the Sunday closing.

"The case of the pursuer is simply this, that the ordinary hour of closing was eleven o'clock, and if he must now close at ten, then his licence is an 'early-closing licence,' and he is entitled to a return of the duty. Now, the assumption here made is quite unfounded. Eleven o'clock no doubt was the hour mentioned in the form of certificate in the Act of 1853 and the Act of 1862, but it can be carried no further back, and it rests upon the condition inserted in the certificates granted under these statutes. Now, when the Act of 1887 expressly declares that the condition fixing the hour of closing at eleven o'clock shall be deleted from the certificate and another form of condition inserted, viz., an hour to be fixed by the Justices, the hour so fixed by them becomes the ordinary hour of closing for the district to which the resolution applies. Eleven o'clock is entirely blotted out of the regulations as to business hours, and a substitute put in its place. There is now no 'ordinary' hour for closing except the hour so fixed; and there is no early closing at an hour other than the ordinary one. The result consequently must be that this action fails.

"The pursuer complains that the Justices have extended the time to the Granton Hotel for closing. This they did in virtue of powers specially reserved to them by the Act of 1887, the 7th section of which enacts that 'nothing contained in this Act shall affect the provisions of the 6th section of the Act 25 and 26 Victoria, chapter 35, respecting the granting of special permissions.' Now, this 6th section of the Act of 1862 gives power to the Chief Magistrate and to the Justices of any county respectively to grant permission to extend the time for supplying liquors in regard to any public or special entertainment, or in any other place or premises during any particular time beyond the time prescribed by the certificate for closing. It was under this power that privilege was granted to the Granton Hotel. And it is further enacted by the Act of 1862 that it shall be lawful for the Justices or for the Magistrates 'to make such general regulations touching such permissions as they shall think fit, and such special permissions shall be subject to such general regulations.' The power, therefore, to pass general regulations by the Justices, as was done by the Justices of Midlothian in 1888, seems to be thus recognised."

Now, in the case of a six-day licence, the statute makes it very clear that the case contemplated is that of the party applying for a licence desiring to have inserted in his licence a condition that he shall close on Sunday, and that the Justices shall comply with that application, and insert the condition in the licence. In regard to the early-closing licence, the 7th section of the Licensing Act of 1874 provides that "Where, on the occasion of any application for a new licence, or the removal or renewal of a licence which authorises the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises, the applicant applies to the Licensing Justices to insert in his licence a condition that he shall close the premises in respect of which such licence is or is to be granted one hour earlier at night than that at which such premises would otherwise have to be closed, the Justices shall insert the said condition in such licence. The holder of an early-closing licence in which such condition is inserted (in this Act referred to as an early-closing licence) shall close his premises at night one hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed under the provisions of this Act." Now, these Licensing Statutes are clear in their provisions. I do not think they admit of any ambiguity. They both contemplate—both the Statute of 1872, regarding a six-day licence, and the Statute of 1874, regarding an early-closing licence—that the applicant for a licence shall desire to be put under a restriction, and if he does, then the restriction shall be quoted in the licence by the Justices, and he shall be obliged to keep it. In the case of the early-closing licence it is made very clear what is meant by early closing. It is closing at an hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed. Now, if after the passing of the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, this question had arisen, the condition of the law relating to the licensing of public-houses was such that a very nice and important question would have arisen as to whether the English Licensing Statutes were applicable, or could be made applicable, to the then existing state of the law. By the Act 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 67, and also by the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, the condition which the holder of a licence came under was, that he "do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom, any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning or after eleven of the clock at night of any day." Now, if in that state of the law the applicant for a certificate had inserted in his petition a prayer that he should be put under obligation by his certificate that he should close his premises at ten o'clock at night instead of eleven—eleven o'clock being then the ordinary hour of closing—it would have been difficult to say that the effect of the Act of 1880 would not have been to have given him the benefit of the 7th section of the Act of 1874. But I put this case also—Supposing the applicant for a certificate did not himself desire or apply to be put under that restriction, but that the Justices, in the exercise of the power committed to them by the existing Public-Houses Acts, had put his premises under the condition of closing at ten o'clock instead of eleven, would or would not the provisions of the English Licensing Acts, made applicable to Scotland by the Revenue Act of 1880, have applied? That might admit of a good deal of argument.

No. 34.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

But this case turns upon the more recent Act of 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 38), and the question which naturally arises under that statute is whether there is now any ordinary hour of closing at all. If there be none, I do not very well see how the 7th section of the Act of 1874

No. 34.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

can be applied, because there could only be a right to the deduction of one-seventh from the licence duty in the event of the licence-holder being put under the condition that he shall close an hour earlier than the ordinary hour of closing, or, in other words, that he shall close earlier than his neighbours generally; but the Act of 1887, while it professes in the preamble to meet a desire that an earlier hour than eleven o'clock at night should be fixed for the closing of premises licensed for the sale of exciseable liquors, does not by its enactments really carry out that object, because it does not by these enactments fix any hour at all; on the contrary, it leaves it to the Justices in Quarter Sessions—the licensing authority as they are called—to dispose of that question at their discretion. The form of certificate is to be altered from that contained in schedule A of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act 1862, and in place of the existing form this is to be inserted,—“And do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking or selling of any liquors before eight of the clock in the morning or after such hour at night of any day not earlier than ten and not later than eleven, as the licensing authority may direct.” Now, the statute does not thereby fix an hour; on the contrary, it leaves it to the licensing authority to fix the hour, and they may fix any hour between ten and eleven. I do not suppose it will be contended that under this provision it would not be competent for the Justices to fix half-past ten, or to fix a quarter-past ten, or a quarter to eleven; all that is within their discretion, and what they have done in this particular case is to come to a general resolution that ten o'clock in the county of Midlothian shall be the hour for closing—that is to say, the ordinary hour of closing. Now, that being so, how can it be said that the applicant here is under a condition or obligation to close his premises, in terms of the 7th section of the Act of 1874, “one hour earlier at night than that at which such premises would otherwise have to be closed,” or, as it is put in another part of the clause, “shall close his premises one hour earlier at night than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed.” Instead of being an hour earlier, the hour at which he closes his premises is the ordinary hour at which all other premises are closed, unless there is some special dispensation with regard to the particular locality. Therefore I come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, that the passing of the Act of 1887 made the clauses of the Act of 1874 inapplicable to any case within the county of Midlothian, or to any case to which the Act of 1887 applies, and therefore it is impossible to grant this relief to the applicant.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship. As I understand, this early-closing licence is given to a party who applies, under the English Acts, to the Magistrates or Justices to have his premises closed at an hour earlier than that fixed in the statute as the ordinary hour of closing, and if the Magistrates or Justices make an arrangement of this sort, and his licence is so fixed that he shall close his premises at ten o'clock instead of eleven, then that is an early-closing licence, and he is entitled to a reduction of licence duty. Now, that is the way in which the thing is done, as I understand, in the English cases. Before the passing of the later Acts the Magistrates or Justices in Scotland had no such power, but a six-day licence in Scotland was granted since the passing of the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, by which less duty was charged for the six-day licence than for the seven-day licence. Then in the English Act of 1874 the general hour for closing in certain districts, which had been eleven o'clock before, was fixed to be ten o'clock, but that did not make the parties who closed at ten entitled to an early-closing licence. If a person wished to have an early-closing licence under the general provision of the Act of 1880, he still required to go to the Justices and put himself under a further restriction in the matter of time than the Act itself did. He then put himself in the position of closing earlier than the ordinary hour fixed by the statute. He could still do that, and get his early-closing licence. So standing the matter, we come to the Act of 1887, which gives a discretionary power to the Licensing Justices as to the hour of closing. Now, under that Act of 1887, instead of eleven o'clock being taken as the general hour of closing, there are certain provisions by way of alteration of the certificate by which the general hour of closing is made different if the Magistrates choose to make it different. There is a power given them, and under that power the Licensing Justices in each district can fix a general hour instead of that being done by the Act of Parliament itself; and the Magistrates of Midlothian have, as I understand, fixed ten o'clock under the powers so given, and the certificate which was handed up to us bears that that is the hour. Now, the applicant's certificate binds him to close at ten o'clock, but he is not closing earlier than any other person in Midlothian holding such licences; they all close at ten o'clock. Therefore I agree with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

No. 34.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

LORD SHAND.—Notwithstanding the full and able argument which has been addressed to us on the part of the reclainer here, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is well founded. It appears to me that after the passing of the Inland Revenue Act of 1880, which was intended to give to publicans the benefit of the provisions regarding six-day licences and early-closing licences, which had been conceded to persons carrying on businesses of that kind in England and Ireland only, those who had obtained certificates or licences in this country would have had the benefit of these provisions. It is conceded that they did get the benefit of the provisions so far as the Sunday licence was concerned. They got a seventh off the licence duty, because practically they were holding six-day licences, and got the benefit in that way. But I further think that although there may have been some difficulty as to the form in which it was to be done, there can be no doubt that some form could have been arrived at by which they could also have got the benefit of the early-closing licence. Your Lordship has put one case. Supposing a person making an application in making it conforms literally with the provision of the statute by applying to have his licence limited so that he should close his premises an hour earlier than that at which his premises would otherwise have to be closed, then I cannot doubt that the Magistrates must have dealt with that application and acceded to his request; they would have marked it on his certificate, and he would have got the benefit of the provision. But we must further bear in mind that at that time, when the Statute of 1880 was passed, in virtue of section 2 of the Act of 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), while the certificate did contain the usual hour as at that time, viz, eleven o'clock, being the hour of closing, there was this provision—"Provided always that in any particular locality within any county or district or burgh requiring other hours for opening and closing . . . public-houses than those specified in the forms of certificates, . . . it shall be lawful for such Justices or Magistrates respectively to insert in such certificates such other hours, not being earlier than six of the clock or later

No. 34. than eight of the clock in the morning for opening, or earlier than nine of the clock or later than eleven of the clock in the evening for closing the same, as they shall think fit." And if Magistrates, in the exercise of that power in any particular district, said that certain persons holding certificates must now close at ten instead of eleven, which was the hour to which the statute authorised them to be open, speaking generally, then I take it there would be room for holding clearly that in that case also the publican would have had the benefit of the early-closing licence, which would give him a seventh off—at least I say there is a great deal to be said on the point. Matters remained in that position from 1880 to 1887.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

I concur in holding that all that has been changed by the Statute of 1887. What is the feature of the English Act which is sought to be applied to the Act of 1887? It is this, that the reduction of the sum paid upon the licence is to be given where the person holding the licence shall close his premises at night one hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed under the provisions of this Act. We must read these words as meaning that he is to close his premises one hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises would be closed under the statute we are now reading, viz, the Statute of 1887. Now, can it be shewn that the reclamer has to close his premises an hour earlier than the ordinary hour at which under this Act he would be entitled to keep his premises open? The answer to that is just what the Lord Ordinary has given,—there is no longer any fixed hour up to which he is entitled to keep open, so that he must be restricted in order to take away the right. The question here is, what is the ordinary hour of closing? The ordinary hour is not eleven o'clock, but such hour not earlier than ten and not later than eleven as the Magistrates may think fit to fix, and as the Magistrates have fixed ten, I do not think it can be said that the reclamer is a person who has to close his premises earlier than the hour which the statute sets forth as the ordinary hour of closing. Upon that ground I agree with all that your Lordships have said. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be adhered to.

LORD ADAM.—It appears to me that the provisions as to early closing, as they have been explained to us, are clear and intelligible in their native soil, and as applicable to the English system, but I confess that since they have been transplanted here, I see or would have seen great difficulties in reconciling them with our Scottish system, which was entirely different, and if this question had occurred prior to the passing of the Act of 1887, I should have participated in your Lordship's difficulties upon the case, and would have wished further time for consideration. But now, after the passing of the Act of 1887, I do not think this case is attended with difficulty. Every certificate, as has been pointed out, must now bear that the publican does not keep open house after such an hour at night of any day not earlier than ten and not later than eleven as the licensing authorities may direct. Therefore, now, as I read that the licensing authority must direct what the hour of closing is to be. The hour of ten is not fixed, and the hour of eleven is not fixed, and there is no hour between these two fixed by statute; there is no hour fixed, but the licensing authority shall say what the hour shall be. That is the position of matter under the Act of 1887. Now, that being so, the question comes to be, whether this publican, whose certificate ordains that he shall close at ten o'clock, has what is called an early-closing licence? Early closing implies that it must be earlier than something. Earlier than what? Now, that takes us back to the English statute, because it is the English statute which introduces this. It is said that the premises shall be closed at an hour earlier than that at which such premises would otherwise have to be closed. Otherwise than what? If we go a little further down the clause we find what it is; it is earlier than the ordinary hour at which such premises shall be closed under the provisions of the Act—that is to say, under the provisions of the Act we are now considering. But, as has been pointed out, there is no ordinary hour fixed by the Act of 1887 at all; that is to be fixed by the licensing authority. In this case the licensing authority have fixed ten o'clock as the hour of closing for the whole of Midlothian, and that is the ordinary hour, if there is any ordinary hour. Well, then, the question comes to be, as this gentleman's certificate declares that he shall close at ten o'clock, is that earlier than the ordinary hour fixed by the statute or by the Justices under the statute? I am totally unable to see that it is. Therefore, I am unable to see that this is an early-closing licence or certificate in the sense of the English Acts, and therefore I agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary.

No. 34.

Nov. 27, 1888.
Henderson v.
Lord Advocate.

THE COURT adhered.

WYLIE & ROBERTSON, W.S.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

MARTIN MACKAY AND OTHERS (Hubert Rossborough's Trustees), First Parties.—Ure. No. 35.

MRS ELIZABETH GIFFORD OR ROSSBOROUGH, Second Party.—J. G. Smith.
MRS SARAH J. SHERIDAN AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—R. V. Campbell.
Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

Husband and Wife—Terce and jus relictæ—Conversion.—A bondholder infert sold the security subjects under his bond, but died before granting a disposition. His widow maintained that the bond formed part of her husband's moveable estate at the date of his death, subject to jus relictæ.

Held that the bond had not been rendered moveable in a question between the executor and the widow.

Heritable and Moveable—Incidence of debts—Lease.—A testator in his trust settlement directed his trustees to pay the income of the residue of his estate to his sister and her children, and after her death, and when the youngest attained the age of twenty-five years, to divide the capital of the residue among them. He was tenant under lease of a music-hall, and when he died some years of the lease were still to run. His trustee failed to dispose of the lease or to sublet the premises. His widow claimed her legal rights.

Held that the loss occasioned by the lease of the music-hall fell to be charged (1) against the moveable estate in a question with the widow, and (2) against the fee of the residue of the estate in a question between the liferentrix and him under the settlement.

HUBERT THOMAS ROSSBOROUGH of "The Cottage," Mount Vernon, near 1st Division. Glasgow, died on 28th March 1887 leaving a widow but no children. B.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th June 1886, he conveyed to Martin Mackay, writer in Glasgow, and others, his trustees, his whole means and estate. After a provision to his widow, by the third purpose he directed that his property at Mount Vernon, called "The Cottage," should be kept up and occupied after his death by his sister, Mrs Sarah Jane Rossborough or Sheridan, of New York. By the fifth purpose

No. 35. he directed the trustees, after payment of certain legacies, to hold and invest the residue of his estate and to pay one-half of the free annual income arising therefrom to his sister Mrs Sheridan if she survived him, and the other half to her children. By the sixth purpose the trustees were directed after her death to divide and pay the income of the whole residue among her children, till the youngest reached the age of twenty-five years, when they were to realise the residue and divide it among the children.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

At the date of the truster's death Mrs Sheridan had two children.

The estate of the deceased consisted, inter alia, (1) of sums due in certain bonds and dispositions in security, amounting in all to the sum of £29,870, 5s.; (2) of moveables in the Britannia Music Hall amounting, per valuation, to the sum of £659, 7s. 6d.; (3) of the dwelling-house and grounds at Mount Vernon, the saleable value of which was estimated at about £3000.

Previous to his death the deceased had taken certain steps towards realising some of the bonds and dispositions in security, amounting in all to £7250. (1) With regard to a bond and disposition in security for £1800, he had served an intimation and requisition for payment. The period specified in the intimation had expired without payment, and no further steps had been taken for realising the security. (2) With regard to a bond for £1300, a requisition for payment had been served on the debtor. After the expiry of the period for payment the security subjects had been advertised but not exposed for sale, the truster having died without signing the articles of roup. (3) Under a bond for £1150, after the usual steps, the subjects had been twice exposed for sale but had not been sold. (4) Under a bond for £3000, the subjects, which were situated in College Street and High Street, Glasgow, after the usual steps, had been exposed for sale by public roup and sold; but the purchaser, not having implemented his bargain by paying the price, had not received a disposition to the subjects.

The truster at the date of his death was tenant of the Britannia Music Hall, Trongate, Glasgow, under a lease for twelve years, at a rent of £600 per annum for each of the last ten years of the lease. His business, which was that of a music-hall proprietor or manager, was profitably carried on in the music-hall under his personal management. After his death the trustees were unable to effect a sale of the lease for the period still to run or to sublet the subjects. They had wound up the affairs of the deceased and the subjects were now unoccupied and yielded no return to the estate.

The widow, Mrs Rossborough, claimed terce and jus relictæ.

Questions arose (1) as to the nature and amount of these rights in consequence of the steps taken by the deceased to realise the bonds and dispositions in security being uncompleted; (2) as to what part of the estate fell to be charged with the rent, taxes, and other expenses connected with the music-hall.

This special case was accordingly presented to the Court.

The trustees, as representing the interests of Mrs Sheridan's two children, the fiars, were the parties of the first part.

The widow, Mrs Rossborough, was the party of the second part.

Mrs Sheridan, with consent of her husband, was the party of the third part.

The second party maintained that, qua relict, she was entitled to one half of the moveable estate, including therein, as being moveable, (first half of the sum of £3000 contained in the bond and disposition in security over the subjects in College Street and High Street, Glasgow; and (second one-half of sums contained in the bonds and dispositions in security, o which formal intimations calling for payment had been given, and the notices had expired prior to Mr Rossborough's death without payment being made. She also claimed (third) to be relieved of and from all claims for rent, taxes, and other charges for and connected with the Britannia Hall as from and after Whitsunday 1887.

No. 35.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

The first parties admitted the right of the second party to terce and jus relictæ, but they maintained that she was not entitled to one-half of the sums of £3000, £1800, £1150, and £1300 or to relief from whatever loss might be incurred in connection with the Britannia Music Hall, from Whitsunday 1887 till the end of the lease.

The third party, the liferentrix, maintained the same pleas as the first parties, and further maintained "that in the event of the lease of the Britannia Music Hall not being realised profitably for the estate, the rent, taxes, and other charges under the said lease, and all loss or deficiency thence arising to the estate, should be charged against and deducted from the capital or residue of the estate liferented by her and her children."

The questions of law were as follows:—"(1) Were the bonds above mentioned, or any of them, rendered moveable as to the relict by the steps taken to realise the securities, and is the second party entitled to one-half of the sums contained in said bonds, or any of them, as jus relictæ? (2) Can the rent of the Britannia Music Hall, and the tenant's obligations under the lease thereof, till the expiry of the lease, be so charged by the first parties as to affect the estate falling to the widow as terce or jus relictæ? (3) Are the obligations in the tenant's part of the lease of the Britannia Music Hall, including therein rent, taxes, and all other charges falling upon the tenant, to be charged against and deducted from the capital or residue of the estate? Or do the said obligations fall to be charged against the revenue thereof?"

Argued for the first parties, the trustees;—The first question was whether, by the steps which the deceased took before his death to realise the bonds and dispositions in security, he had converted them into moveable estate, so as to make them subject to the second party's jus relictæ, notwithstanding the provisions of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868,* which expressly enacted that they should not be subject to a widow's jus relictæ. It was no doubt her interest that the question should be answered affirmatively, for as she had claimed her legal rights she was entitled as jus relictæ to one-half of the moveable estate as against one-third of the revenue of the heritage as terce, and therefore it was to her advantage that the moveable estate should be increased at the expense of the heritable. The question, however, fell to be answered in the negative. In the first place, even in a question between heir and executor, apart from the Act, it could not be held that conversion had taken place. The true test of conversion was whether the deceased had gone so far that it was impossible for him to draw back and retain his security, so that all that remained to him at his death was a mere claim for a sum of money.<sup>1</sup> Even in the case of the bond for £3000, where the steps had

* By 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101, sec. 117, it is enacted that from and after the commencement of the Act such securities shall be moveable as regards the succession of the creditors therein, " . . . . Provided that all heritable securities shall continue, and shall be heritable quoad fiscum, and as regards all rights of courtesy and terce competent to the husband or wife of any such creditor, and that no heritable security, whether granted before or after marriage, shall to any extent pertain to the husband jure mariti, where the same is or shall be conceived in favour of the wife, or to the wife jure relictæ, where the same is or shall be conceived in favour of the husband," &c.

<sup>1</sup> Ersk. Inst. ii. 2, 16, and ii. 8, 23 and 25; More's Notes to Stair, 143; Bell's

No. 35.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

gone furthest towards realisation, the deceased had power to resale, owing to the failure of the purchaser to implement his bargain. Viewed by this criterion, then, no conversion had taken place, and the bonds still remained heritable at the time of his death quoad the second party's jus relictæ. But, in the second place, this was not a question between heir and executor, but between the executor and widow, and it was plain that she would be entitled to terce out of these bonds, inasmuch as at the date of the husband's death his infestment in all of them remained undischarged. The law was quite settled that the husband's infestment was the measure of and security for the widow's right of terce.<sup>1</sup> At the date of the death of the deceased it did not matter how far he had gone in realising the securities, if the disponee were not infest.

The second question related to the music-hall. The business carried on was really a mercantile speculation, in which the testator's moveable estate was invested, and from which his whole moveable means, out of which the second party's jus relictæ was payable, was derived. It was only just that before her jus relictæ was paid the loss effeiring to the bad asset should be deducted.<sup>2</sup> The third question was one between the liferentrix and the fiars, her children. The lease being part of the residue, any profits by increasing the residue would have increased the income arising therefrom, and therefore the loss should lie on the revenue.

Argued for the second party;—(1) It was quite clear from the steps which the testator took to realise his bonds prior to his death, that he intended to convert them into money. As regarded the bond for £3000, he had actually sold the subjects.<sup>3</sup> He might have a right of retention for the price, but that was quite a different thing from his position as security-holder. The contention of the trustees involved the absurdity that the insolvency of the debtor in the contract of sale was to regulate the succession to the creditor's estate. Conversion must then be held to have taken place, and that being so, the second party was entitled to her jus relictæ out of them. (2) No part of the loss on the music-hall ought to fall upon her. She never could be entitled to jus relictæ out of the lease, and therefore any loss in connection with it must primarily fall upon the heir.<sup>4</sup> If there had been no heritable estate out of which to pay the debt, of course the moveable estate would be liable. But here, confessedly, there was heritable estate in the house at Mount Vernon, more than sufficient in value to pay the whole debt incurred in connection with the music-hall.

The third party concurred in the arguments stated for the first parties, except that she argued that in a question between the liferentrix and the fiars the loss arising from the lease of the music-hall ought to fall on capital and not on the revenue of the estate.<sup>5</sup>

Com. ii. 6; Montier v. Baillie, June 29, 1773, Hailes' Decns. 530, and M. 15,859; Heron v. Espie, June 3, 1856, 18 D. 917, per Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope), 928 and 931, and per Lord Murray, pp. 928, 937, and 938, 28 Scot. Jur. 420; Wilson v. Wilson, Nov. 29, 1808, F. C.; Johnstone and Others v. Greig, &c., June 28, 1831, 9 S. 806, 3 Scot. Jur. 537; Paul v. Home, July 5, 1872, 10 Macph. 937.

<sup>1</sup> Ersk. ii. 9, 46; Bell's Prins. 1600; MacCulloch v. Maitland, July 10, 1788, M. 15,866; Campbell v. Campbell, Feb. 17, 1776, 5 Brown's Supp. 627; Fraser on Husband and Wife, ii. 1095.

<sup>2</sup> Ferguson v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1877, 4 R. 532.

<sup>3</sup> Stair's Inst. ii. 4; Sir Geo. Mackenzie's Inst. ii. 2, 6; Bell's Comm. (5th and 7th edns.) ii. 6; Fraser's Husband and Wife, ii. 985.

<sup>4</sup> Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, &c., Feb. 22, 1884, 11 R. 586.

<sup>5</sup> Ferguson v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1877, 4 R. 532.

At advising.—

No. 35.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr Hubert Rossborough died on 28th March 1887, leaving a settlement, dated 8th June 1886, disposing of his whole estate. He was married to Miss Elizabeth Gifford, the second party in this special case, but there is no issue of the marriage.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

The widow rejects the provisions made for her in the settlement, and claims her legal rights, and it is not disputed that she is entitled so to do.

Her rights extend to one-third of the income of her husband's heritable estate and one-half of the moveable estate. Her interest therefore is to augment the amount of the moveable estate as much as possible, or, in other words, to enlarge the amount affected by her jus relictæ at the expense of the estate subject to the terce.

The greater part of Mr Rossborough's heritable estate consisted of bonds and dispositions in security on which he was infeft. The Act 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 117, makes such securities moveable as regards the succession of the creditors therein, but with the express proviso, that they shall continue heritable quoad faciem, "and as regards all rights of courtesy and terce competent to the husband or wife of any such creditor, and that no heritable security, whether granted before or after marriage, shall to any extent pertain to the husband jure mariti where the same is or shall be conceived in favour of the wife, or to the wife jure relictæ where the same is or shall be conceived in favour of the husband."

Where a widow claims her legal rights in opposition to her husband's settlement, all questions between her and the parties interested in her husband's succession must be settled as in a case of intestacy, for while the latter cannot found on the settlement to the prejudice of the former's rights, neither can the latter take any benefit from the settlement which she has repudiated. The question therefore comes to be, what portion of the deceased's estate is to be considered heritable and what moveable in a question between the widow on the one hand, and the heir and executor respectively on the other. Now, the statute settles that question so far, when it enacts that heritable securities shall remain subject to the terce as heritage, and shall not to any extent pertain to the widow jure relictæ.

But as regards certain of the heritable securities in the present case, the widow contends that both the common law, and the statute which declares and confirms the common law, should receive no effect because of the steps which were taken by her husband before his death for the purpose of converting the heritable securities into moveable estate. These steps are fully detailed in the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth heads of the special case, and amount in substance to this—Of the entire amount of heritable bonds belonging to the deceased (£29,870) he had previous to his death demanded payment in the usual form of four bonds, amounting in all to £7250. In one case he had served the usual intimation and requisition for payment, but no further steps were taken. In another, after the expiry of the period for payment under the requisition, the subjects were advertised for sale, but had not been sold or exposed for sale. In a third, the subjects had been brought to sale, but had not found a purchaser. In the fourth, the subjects had been exposed for sale, and were actually sold. But the purchaser being unable to pay the price the contract of sale remained unfulfilled, and the purchaser obtained no title to the subjects.

No. 35.

In all these cases it is clear that the infertment of the deceased as creditor stood undischarged and undisturbed, and afforded him at the time of his death precisely the same security over the same subjects as he acquired when he originally took infertment on the bonds, excepting only any change in the value of the security subjects.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

It is well-settled law that the husband's infertment at the time of his death is the measure as well as the security of the tercer's right, and that though the husband has actually sold his heritable estate, and the purchaser be ready to fulfil his contract and pay the price, yet if the purchaser be not infert during the husband's lifetime, the right of terce will not be excluded. It seems needless to add (though the statute above cited has done so) that estate which is subject to the terce cannot be affected in any way by the jus relictæ.

The first question therefore falls to be answered in the negative.

As regards the second and third questions, Mr Rossborough was at the time of his death tenant of the Britannia Music Hall under a lease for twelve years from Whitsunday 1878 at a rent of £600. He carried on business there as a manager and purveyor of public entertainments, and realised profits from that business. But when his estate came into the hands of his trustees they were unable either to carry on the business or to find a purchaser for the unexpired term of the lease. They have accordingly wound up that business, and the hall is unoccupied, and instead of yielding revenue is an annual burden on the estate to the extent of the rent and taxes till the expiry of the lease at Whitsunday 1890.

It appears to me that this is a loss occasioned to the estate by the failure of a speculation in business, and falls to be charged against the moveable estate of the deceased in a question with the widow, and against the residue of the estate under the settlement in a question between the other parties to the case, and does not form any proper charge against the third party as liferenter.

LORD MURE.—I agree in the opinion read by your Lordship, and having had the opportunity of previously seeing it, have nothing to add.

LORD ADAM.—The main question here is whether the widow of the testator has a claim of jus relictæ out of the sums due under the six bonds, amounting in all to £29,870, 5s. ? It is not disputed that they are all heritable bonds, and that the husband died infert in the subjects over which they were granted. Neither do the trustees dispute that the widow has a right of terce out of the bonds. On the contrary, they assert that she has such a right, and that is their principal reason for holding that she is not entitled to jus relictæ. Prima facie the widow's right is one of terce and terce only, but it is said—and it is the first question which we have to decide—that certain steps taken by the husband during his life with a view to realise the securities over which the bonds were granted had the effect of rendering the bonds moveable quoad the widow, as as to give her a claim to half the amount due under the bonds as jus relictæ instead of terce.

I think it is only necessary to consider the particular steps taken by the testator to realise the security under the bond for £3000, because the steps in that case went a great deal farther towards realisation than the steps taken under any of the other bonds. If the widow cannot succeed on the facts in the case of that bond, she cannot succeed as to the others.

With reference to that bond, it is set forth in the case that the security subjects were exposed for sale by public roup at the upset price of £5250. A purchaser appeared and offered the upset price, and was preferred to the purchase. The purchaser was unable to fulfil his bargain, and a charge for payment was served upon him in the usual way, and it was allowed to expire three days before the testator's death without payment being made. It is not relevant to consider what the trustees did after his death, and therefore the proceedings are just these,—The testator during his life endeavoured to realise the security subjects, and they were knocked down to an intending purchaser for a certain sum. The purchaser was unable to fulfil his contract, and the testator died without having got payment of the price, and remained still infert in the subjects.

No. 35.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rosesborough's
Trustees v.
Rosesborough.

Now, in my opinion, the widow is not entitled to jus relictæ out of that bond, but is clearly entitled to terce. There is no doubt on all the authorities, that the husband's sasine is the measure of the widow's right, and no proceedings which have not the effect of evacuating the husband's sasine can preclude her right. There are two authorities on the point, and one is a very strong authority. The first is the case of MacCulloch v. Maitland, M. 15,866, where certain lands were actually disposed by the husband, and the disponee took possession, but did not get infertment in the lands. The husband died, and after his death his widow claimed terce out of the lands. It was held that the husband's sasine had not been evacuated, and the widow was therefore held entitled to terce out of the lands. The other case is the case of Campbell v. Campbell, 5 Brown's Supp. 627, and it is there said:—"The husband's sasine, says Mr Erskine, is the measure of the wife's terce; thus neither an heritable bond nor a disposition of lands granted by the husband, if death has prevented him from giving sasine to the creditor or disponee, can hurt the terce," and so the Lords found,—“In respect that the deceased John Campbell was not at the time of his death denuded of the subject within mentioned by infertment, but only by a title which remained personal: Therefore find that Katherine Waddell, his relict, is entitled to a terce of said subjects, and not to a third part of the price thereof.”

Now, it appears to me that both of these cases are—one of them much—a fortiori of the present case. There was not only an intention to sell, but an actual disposition granted, but it was not followed by infertment of the disponee. The husband's sasine still subsisted, and with it the widow's terce. I cannot find circumstances so strong in the present case, and therefore I think the authorities are conclusive of the present case, and it must be held that the widow has a right to terce. That being so, the necessary consequence is that the bonds are not subject to a claim of jus relictæ. I therefore agree with your Lordships that the only answer we can give with reference to the bond for £3000 is that the widow is not entitled to jus relictæ. If that is true of the first bond, it is also true of the rest. We must therefore answer the first question in the negative.

I also agree as to the answer to be given to the second and third questions.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In answer to the first question, find and declare that the bonds mentioned in the case were not rendered moveable as to the relict by the steps taken to realise the securities, and that the second party is not entitled to any part of the sums contained in the said bonds jure relictæ: In answer to the second and third questions, find and declare that the loss occasioned to the estate of the deceased by

No. 35.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Rossborough's
Trustees v.
Rossborough.

the subsistence till 1890 of the lease of the Britannia Music Hall is occasioned by the failure of a speculation in business, and falls to be charged against the moveable estate of the deceased in a question with the widow, and against the residue of the estate under the settlement in a question between the other parties in the case, and does not form any proper charge against the third party as liferenter, and decern: Find the first and third parties entitled to expenses against the second party."

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—ADAM SHIELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 36. ROBERT LIDDLE WALES, Complainer (Reclaimer).—Strachan—M'Lennan.

MARY WALES, Respondent.—Ure—A. S. D. Thomson.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Wales v.
Wales.

Jurisdiction—Burgh Court—Heritable Right.—Under a mutual disposition and settlement a husband assigned to his wife, "in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allenary," certain house property. After the husband's death, his heir-at-law by onerous deed disposed the fee to the widow, "as liferenter of the said subjects." This disposition was placed on record. The widow thereafter married again, and after residing some time with her second husband, she separated from him, and brought an action of ejectment from the house property above mentioned against him in the Court of the royal burgh in which it was situated. The husband defended the action, on the ground that the liferent had been extinguished by the conveyance of the fee, and that the jus mariti was not excluded. The Magistrates granted warrant of ejectment, on the ground that the alimentary liferent still subsisted, and that the jus mariti of the husband was excluded. In a note of suspension at the instance of the husband, held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that the question was one of heritable right, and that the Burgh Court had no jurisdiction to entertain it.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

IN April 1888, Mary M'Lauchlan or Wales, wife of Robert Liddle Wales, innkeeper, Stranraer, raised an action against her husband in the Burgh Court, Stranraer, concluding for an order on the defender to remove from Nos. 1 and 2 Agnew Crescent there, or alternatively for warrant to eject him therefrom.

The pursuer averred that prior to her marriage with Wales, which took place in 1877, she was widow of Robert M'Lauchlan, and had resided with him at 1 and 2 Agnew Crescent; that M'Lauchlan died in 1868; that by a mutual disposition and settlement, between him and the pursuer, he disposed to her, in case she should survive him, "in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allenary, whom failing and at her death to my own heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, in fee, his whole heritable estate," including the property in question. She further averred that she had been compelled to leave her present husband in 1885, and had lived apart from him ever since.

The defender averred;—"The pursuer acquired absolute right to the properties in question by disposition granted by William M'Lauchlan [who was heir-at-law to the deceased Robert M'Lauchlan], land-steward, Billown, near Castletown, Isle of Man, in her favour, dated the 16th, and recorded in the division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Wigtown the 20th, both days of August 1873. The defender's rights of jus mariti and right of administration are in no way excluded by the terms of said disposition, and no other deed has entered the record in any way affecting or restricting them. Said disposition is in the possession of pursuer, and she is called upon to produce it, failing which a diligence is craved for its recovery."*

* The disposition referred to bore,—“I, William M'Laughlin, land-steward,

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer being proprietor for her liferent alimentary use allanarly of the subjects before mentioned, is entitled to exercise all the rights of property over the same, without being subject to the control or administration of her husband. No. 36.
Nov. 28, 1888.
Wales v. Wales.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) It is incompetent for this Court to entertain any consistorial question, such as the pursuer's justification for separating herself from her husband, and all such averments should be deleted from the proceedings. (3) The defender, in entering into the contract of marriage with the pursuer, was entitled to rely on the public records, and the same not disclosing any exclusion of his legal rights of jus mariti and right of administration in the properties in question, no secret or latent deed containing such exclusion can be competently pleaded against him. (4) Assuming that, by the terms of said mutual disposition and settlement, defender's legal rights were excluded, the pursuer not having taken infestment thereon, but on a title containing no such exclusion, the defender cannot be affected by the terms of the former deed.

By interlocutor, dated 28th March 1888, the Magistrates granted warrant to officers of Court to eject the defender from the subjects in question.*

Billown, near Castletown, Isle of Man, heritable proprietor in fee of the subjects and others hereinafter disposed, in consideration of the sum of two hundred and fifty pounds sterling, instantly paid to me by Mrs Mary M'Dowall or M'Lauchlan, residing in Stranraer, widow of the deceased John M'Lauchlan, vintner there, and liferenter of the said subjects and others, as the price of my interest as far thereof, do hereby sell and dispose to the said Mrs Mary M'Dowall or M'Lauchlan and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably," the subjects in question.

* The interlocutor was as follows :—"Find in fact (1) that the pursuer was, prior to her marriage with defender in 1877, widow of the late John M'Lauchlan, vintner, at Nos. 1 and 2 Agnew Crescent, Stranraer, who was proprietor, inter alia, of said subjects ; (2) that, by a mutual disposition and settlement, executed between the said John M'Lauchlan and pursuer, then Mrs Mary M'Dowall or M'Lauchlan, dated 21st March 1867, the said John M'Lauchlan gave, granted, assigned, and disposed to and in favour of the pursuer, in case she should survive him 'in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allanarly, whom failing and at her death, to my own heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever in fee, All and Whole my heritable and moveable estate,' including Nos. 1 and 2 Agnew Crescent ; (3) that the pursuer being the alimentary liferenter of the subjects in question, by a disposition in her favour, granted by William M'Lauchlan, land-steward, Billown, near Castletown, Isle of Man, dated 16th and recorded 20th, both days of April 1873, acquired right to the fee of the properties in question ; (4) that the pursuer and defender have been living apart since about the month of July 1887 ; (5) that the pursuer legally warned the defender to flit and remove from said premises, Nos. 1 and 2 Agnew Crescent, at and against the term of Whitsunday 1888 : And find in law that the liferent alimentary allanarly provision in favour of pursuer, contained in the mutual disposition and settlement executed by her former husband and herself above referred to, implies an exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration of the defender, and will not fall under the legal assignation implied in the marriage, the effect of such exclusion being to place the pursuer in the same position as if she were an unmarried person : That it is quite competent for pursuer to hold two interests at same time in same property, one the liferent alimentary, the other the fee : That the liferent alimentary provision of pursuer has not been in any way assigned, sold, attached, superseded, or discharged by her acquisition of the fee : That the pursuer's alimentary liferent right has not been consolidated or extinguished by her acquisition of the fee ; and that therefore pursuer is entitled to exercise the whole rights of property over the properties in question without being subject to the control or administration of

No. 36. In May 1888, Robert Wales presented a note of suspension.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Wales v.
Wales.

On 8th November 1888, the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the reasons of suspension.*

The complainer reclaimed, and argued on the question of competency;—The complainer here was in possession on an ex facie good title. Summary ejection was competent in the inferior Courts only where it was alleged and shewn that the person sought to be ejected was a vitious or precarious possessor.<sup>1</sup> It could not be said here that the possession was vitious, as he had possessed along with his wife till she left him, nor could it be said that it was precarious, i.e., on tolerance—(see Hally v. Lang)—as the only infetment produced was in favour of the respondent, viz., the disposition by William M'Lauchlan, and that infetment did not bear that the jus mariti was excluded from the liferented subjects. It was alleged that the result of the mutual deed entered into between the respondent and her first husband had the effect of excluding the jus mariti of the complainer, but that raised a question of heritable right which could not competently be tried in the Burgh Court. The reasons of suspension should therefore be sustained.

Argued for the respondent;—The magistrates of a royal burgh had jurisdiction on all questions of possession arising between inhabitants of the burgh.<sup>2</sup> The possession here was simply precarious,—i.e., on tolerance,—as the effect of the mutual deed between the respondent and her first husband was to exclude the jus mariti of her second husband from the liferent of these subjects. The Burgh Court was entitled to see what was the nature of the possession of the complainer, and if it proved to be precarious then they had power to eject him.

LORD PRESIDENT.—A very interesting question has been raised and partially argued, but according to my view of the case it is impossible to get at that defender: And therefore, and in respect that the term of Whitsunday has now come and is bygone, the Magistrates grant warrant to officers of Court to eject the defender, his family, servants, and effects furth and from the said premises, Nos. 1 and 2 Agnew Crescent, Stranraer, in terms of the alternative conclusions contained in the prayer of the petition."

* "OPINION.—The first objection stated by the complainer is that the decree complained of is incompetent in respect the Magistrates of Stranraer had no jurisdiction. The subjects from which the complainer is sought to be removed were subjects within the royal burgh of Stranraer. The whole proceeding was gone about in a formal manner, as in removings in a burgh. The complainer was duly warned, as is certified by the burgh officer's execution. A petition for removing was then presented, and the period for removal having expired, the Magistrates were entitled to grant a warrant of ejection, which they did. The whole proceedings were in accordance with the law as laid down in Robb v. Menzies (20th January 1859, 21 D. 277).

"It is next said that the Magistrates of Stranraer had no power to pronounce judgment in such a case as this, because it was not a case between landlord and tenant, but between husband and wife. They had certainly the power to see whether the wife had a title to sue, being the proprietor, and this was all they did. It is of no consequence that this is a litigation between a husband and a wife. The question is simply whether the complainer ought not to be removed from premises within their jurisdiction, and that depends entirely upon the title which is produced, and which the magistrates are entitled to read." (His Lordship then dealt with the question on the merits.)

<sup>1</sup> Hally v. Lang, June 26, 1867, 5 Macph. 951, 39 Scot. Jur. 530; Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society v. Horne, May 31, 1881, 8 R. 737.

<sup>2</sup> Ersk. i. 4, 21.

question in the present case, because we are met by the preliminary objection that the action is altogether incompetent. My view on that point is contained in my opinion in the case of Hally v. Lang. No. 36.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Wales v.
Wales.

The general rule is that to obtain summary ejection there must be an allegation and proof that the person sought to be ejected is either a vitious or precarious holder. Now, those words are perhaps slightly technical, and require interpretation. A vitious possessor is one who has obtained possession either by force or fear; a precarious possessor is one who holds by mere tolerance. No doubt, as I observed in Hally's case, there are certain anomalous and exceptional cases which do not fall under either of those two heads, but I do not think that this case falls under that miscellaneous category, and we must therefore consider whether the possession here was either vitious or precarious.

That it was not vitious is clear, for the husband and wife possessed the house together and lived there as husband and wife—the possession was therefore lawfully obtained. It is said, however, that it was precarious. It seems to me extravagant to say that that is so. The only existing infetment was that of the wife under the disposition from her first husband's heir-at-law. That disposition proceeds on the narrative of a purchase, and though it is mentioned that the widow was liferentrix, nothing is said as to the nature of her liferent. Therefore taking the infetment as it stands, it is demonstrable that the husband is entitled either to the rents of these subjects, or to possession of them, if they are not let, in virtue of his jus mariti.

The answer made is—It is true that that is so on the face of the infetment, but the pursuer undertakes to shew that the infetment cannot receive its natural and proper effect, because of the existence of an alimentary liferent over the subjects by the pursuer, which can be represented as a separate title, and founded on altogether apart from the infetment. That raises a very important and interesting question, but it is one which deals entirely with a heritable right. I do not think it is possible to hold that the Burgh Court was entitled to decide that question to form a foundation for their decree of ejectment. The Burgh Court was not entitled to decide the question of heritable right, and as they could not proceed to give decree without settling that question, I think the whole proceedings have been incompetent. I agree with what has been said during the argument as to the way in which the Burgh Court has given its decision. The judgment is very well expressed and altogether excellent, if the Court had had jurisdiction to pronounce it at all. The interlocutor is remarkably well put, but it is self-condemnatory as regards the competence, for it finds in law that there is a certain right in the wife, and that that right is a heritable right.

LORD MURK.—I have come to the same conclusion. I should have been glad to decide the important question which has been raised, but I do not see how we can avoid deciding on the competency of this action.

I always thought it a trite proposition that no inferior Court has power to entertain any question of heritable right, except where such a Court is specially permitted by statute to do so. Ever since I read the interlocutor of the Burgh Court here, it seemed to me that it involved the decision of a most important question of heritable right. It is said that it would be hard if, because there are findings in law, we were to recall the decree of ejection. But I find in the proceedings in the original action that there are pleas in law which raise clearly

- No. 36. the heritable question. The Magistrates did not raise this question of their own accord, but they have made special findings to meet those pleas. The question is simply one of heritable right, and therefore I think the action was incompetent in the Burgh Court.

Nov. 28, 1888.
Wales v.
Wales.

LORD SHAND.—I am not surprised that the Burgh Court did not take up this question of competency, as the first plea for the defender is quite consistorial, viz., "It is incompetent for this Court to entertain any consistorial question, such as the pursuer's justification for separating herself from her husband." That is the only plea which raises the question of the competency of the action in the inferior Court, and even when the question came here on suspension the same view ran through the argument from what the Lord Ordinary says in his note. Further, the opening on the reclaiming note did not suggest the point on which the case is now decided. It was not in fact until Mr Strachan cited two cases which had not before been laid before us that the real question on competency was raised.

Taking, however, the argument, even at this late stage of the case, I do not see any answer to it. The wife here founds on the original deed, the husband on the later disposition, and the question before the Court comes simply to be a competition of heritable rights. Whether the case is an ejectment, or a removing, or any other process, it does not in my opinion make any difference, because the objection is that the Burgh Court had no jurisdiction to settle any question of heritable right. On that ground I think the action was incompetent, and that the grounds of suspension must be sustained.

LORD ADAM.—I have no doubt that this petition was not competently brought in the Burgh Court. Where it appears that the whole question in a petition to that Court is one of heritable right, and that it is on such a question that the decision must turn, it is clearly incompetent for such a Court to decide. The question of heritable right here did not rise incidentally, but was the whole question before the Court; and accordingly I think that the inferior Court had no jurisdiction to entertain it. I therefore agree that the reasons of suspension should be sustained.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and sustained the reasons of suspension.

ROBERT BROATCH, L.A.—SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—Agents.

- No. 37. ROBERT MACDONALD, Pursuer (Respondent).—R. Johnstone—R. L. Orr.
ROBERT MACKESSACK, Defender (Reclamer).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.

Nov. 30, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Mackessack.

Lease—Summary ejection for failure to stock—Process—Irregularity in proceedings—Sheriff—Jurisdiction.—In a Sheriff Court petition by the landlord of a farm for warrant to sequester and sell his tenant's effects for rent past due, and for an order on the tenant to replenish the farm if necessary, decree of sale was pronounced of consent, and the sale having exhausted the subjects, the landlord moved for an order on the tenant to re-stock, and on his failure to do so within fourteen days, for decree of summary ejection, and warrant to re-let. The tenant by minute stated that he was proceeding to stock. The Sheriff in respect of this minute remitted to a man of skill to see the stocking carried out, and to report within one month. The man of skill reported at the end of the month that the farm had not been re-stocked. The Sheriff thereupon granted warrant for summary ejection. In an action for reduction of this warrant by the tenant, held (diss. Lord Young) that as the Sheriff had not fixed a time within which the re-stocking must be carried out, the tenant was not in default, and that decree of reduction of the warrant to eject fell in consequence to be pronounced.

Question, whether the Sheriff has jurisdiction to grant warrant for the summary ejection of the tenant of an agricultural subject on account of failure to stock.

Opinion per Lord Young that he has.

No. 37.

Nov. 30, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Mackessack.

IN July 1887 Robert Mackessack, of Ardgyle, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Elgin against Robert Macdonald, tenant of his farm of Cardenhill, Alves, under a nineteen years' lease from Whitsunday 1877, at a yearly rent of £14, for warrant to sequester and sell for arrears of rent, "and in the event of the subject of the hypothec being exhausted, or the premises being insufficiently furnished and hypothecated after any sale hereunder, to ordain the defender to stock and replenish the said premises so as to afford sufficient security for payment of any remaining rent payable or to become payable as aforesaid; and failing his doing so, within such time and at the sight of such person as the Court shall appoint, to grant warrant summarily to eject the defender and his goods, gear, and effects from the said premises, and to authorise the pursuer to re-let the same for such periods and for such rent as may appear best."

2D DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

On 27th October 1887, Macdonald by minute consented to decree of sale, and on the same day the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini) granted warrant to sell in satisfaction of arrears of rent and expenses.

Before a sale had taken place, Macdonald petitioned for cessio, and decree of cessio was pronounced on 12th November.

On 10th December the trustee in the cessio sold the stock, &c. on the farm, and the whole proceeds of the sale were subsequently paid to the landlord, in part satisfaction of his claim for rent amounting to £37, 17s. 6d.

On 27th December 1887, the landlord lodged a minute in his own petition, in which he "stated that, in respect the trustee under the cessio of the said Robert Macdonald had recently sold off and displenished the said farm of Cardenhill, the event referred to in the prayer of the petition, viz., 'the subject of the hypothec being exhausted,' had now happened, and the Court is now moved to ordain the defender to stock and replenish the said farm and premises, so as to afford sufficient security for payment of rent now due or to become due at the term of Whitsunday next; and failing his doing so within fourteen days at the sight of Harbourn Marius Straghan Mackay, land-surveyor, Elgin, or within such other time and at the sight of such other person as the Court shall appoint, to grant warrant summarily to eject the defender and his goods, gear, and effects from the said farm and premises, and to authorise the pursuer to re-let the same for such periods, and for such rent as may appear best, all in terms of the prayer of the petition."

The tenant on 18th January 1888 lodged answers to the minute, in which he stated "that he was proceeding to lay down a crop for the incoming season, and was proceeding to stock the said farm of Cardenhill in a husbandlike manner, as craved for in said minute."

On 19th January the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having advised the minute and answers, Nos. 7 and 8 of process, in respect of the statement in the latter that the defender is now in process of laying down a crop for the incoming season, and of stocking the farm of Cardenhill, remits to Mr Harbourn Marius Straghan Mackay, land-surveyor in Elgin, to see the same carried out quam primum, and to report to the Court not later than 19th of February next."

No. 37.

Nov. 30, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Mackessack.

Mr Mackay's report, dated 18th February 1888, was in the terms quoted below.*

On 22d February the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—
“Having heard parties' procurators on the report by Mr Mackay, No. 9 of process, and in respect of the statements therein contained, grants warrant to eject, in terms of the prayer of the petition; also authorises the pursuer to re-let, and interdicts, all as prayed for: Finds the defender liable in expenses,” &c., “and allows extract of this decree to go out after 12 o'clock on Saturday first.”

Macdonald did not appeal against this interlocutor, but on 31st March 1888 he brought a reduction of the decree of ejection in the Court of Session.

The landlord defended, and, inter alia, averred that the pursuer had incurred a conventional irritancy under the regulations and conditions of let of the estate, which the defender alleged (but the pursuer denied) were applicable to the pursuer's holding.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The proceedings complained of being incompetent, illegal, and inept, decree of reduction should be pronounced as craved, with expenses. (2) The pretended decree in question having proceeded upon an incompetent application, and the Court having no jurisdiction, in the circumstances, to pronounce said decree, the same is inept, and should be reduced. (3) Said pretended decree being unfounded and unwarranted, and the proceedings complained of being irregular and oppressive, the pursuer is entitled to have the same reduced and set aside.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(4) Decree of ejectment having only proceeded upon consent of the pursuer, he is barred from objecting to the same. (5) The decree of the Sheriff having been competently pronounced, and no suspension thereof having been brought, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (6) In respect that the pursuer has incurred an irritancy, the defender should be assoilzied.

On 6th July 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—“ . . . Finds that the decree of ejection complained of was incompetent, and was not pronounced of consent of the pursuer: Therefore repels the defences; reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons; finds the pursuer entitled to expenses,” &c.†

* Report by Mr Mackay:—“In terms of remit from the Sheriff-substitute of Elginshire I to-day visited the possession of Cardenhill, occupied by Robert Macdonald. It contains about 23 acres of arable land, divided into six lots. Of this land one lot should have been sown out with young grass, but this has not been done. About 12 acres should have been ploughed, and there is only a little over 4 acres. The turnip shift last season was not properly laid down, and having got no artificial manure the crop was a failure.

“There is no stock of any kind upon the place.

“The ploughing has been done by John Grant, Burnside, a neighbour, and a brother-in-law of the tenant; but even although he should plough the remainder, the land is in such a very poor condition and out of regular rotation, and there being no dung of any kind upon the place, this crop cannot, in my opinion, be laid down in a satisfactory manner by the present tenant.”

† “NOTE.— . . . Two questions were discussed—(firstly), Whether the decree of ejection could be maintained on the ground that it was founded on and justified by the conventional irritancy alleged in the answer to cond. 1; and (secondly) whether it was good as a decree by default, or on the ground that the pursuer, by his minute consenting to decree in terms of the leading conclusions of the petition, was barred from objecting to it.

“The former of these questions, it is clear, must be answered in the negative.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Sheriff had jurisdiction. No. 37. He had jurisdiction to eject summarily for a conventional irritancy, or for desertion, or for a legal irritancy, in the case of urban subjects,<sup>1</sup> but whether he had before 1877 jurisdiction to eject for a legal irritancy in the case of agricultural subjects it was unnecessary to inquire. The Sheriff Court Act of 1877<sup>2</sup> gave the Sheriff jurisdiction in heritable subjects, provided the value of the subjects did not exceed £50 of yearly value or £1000 of capital value and the action was not one of reduction or adjudication. The present action fulfilled these conditions. This was not a declarator that the lease had come to an end—merely an ejection until the tenant chose to come back and stock the farm. (2) The proceedings here had been regular. There was at anyrate no such deviation in point of form as entitled the pursuer to complain, seeing that it was only on account of his answers that the Sheriff did not pronounce the order which the pursuer said ought to have been pronounced.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Sheriff had no jurisdiction.<sup>3</sup> Even if he had, the proceedings had been irregular. It was essential that the Sheriff should have fixed the period within which the tenant must stock. No such period had been fixed, and the tenant consequently was not in default.

The Sheriff Court proceedings shew that the decree of ejection was not, in fact, founded on the irritancy, or upon any allegation that it had been incurred, so that, even if the Sheriff Court had jurisdiction to pronounce decree of ejection upon such a conventional irritancy not declared, the ejection could not be sustained upon that ground. It appears very doubtful, however, whether in this case a process of summary ejection was competent before the Sheriff, for the case was not one in which the pursuer was possessing without any title (Horn v. M'Lean, 8 Sh. 329; Nisbet v. Aikman, 4 Macph. p. 284).

"But on the question whether the decree can be sustained as a decree by default, there was, it was thought, more to be said. It was contended that the Sheriff's interlocutor of 19th January, remitting to a man of skill to see the defender's proceedings carried out, 'and to report to the Court not later than 19th February next,' followed by the report of 18th February, proved that the pursuer was in default. The decree bears to be, 'in respect of the statements therein contained,' viz.,—contained in Mr Mackay's report. But the pursuer's position, as shewn in the minute and answers, was that he was proceeding to stock the farm, the stock which had been upon it having been sold for behoof of the landlord and other creditors in the way explained on record. Now, the report, although it states that there was no stock on the farm on 18th February, does not instruct that there was no stock upon the 19th, and does not negative distinctly the statement that the tenant was 'proceeding to stock,' &c. In short, the Sheriff Court proceedings do not shew any default committed. I think that, in the absence of any definite order, there was a miscarriage in point of procedure, of which the pursuer is entitled to take advantage.

"With regard to the case of Scott (7 Sh. 481), I think it does not apply here—there is nothing in the proceedings to shew that the pursuer consented to decree of ejection, or that he is barred in any way from maintaining his objections to the decree."

<sup>1</sup> Ross M'Kye v. Nabony, Dec. 4, 1780, M. 6214; Tait v. Gordon, July 3, 1828, 6 S. 1055; Horn v. M'Lean, July 19, 1830, 8 S. 329, 2 Scot. Jur. 148, and 2 Deas and And. 192; Thomson v. Handyside, Dec. 27, 1833, 12 S. 557; Wright v. Wightman, Oct. 30, 1875, 3 R. 68; Bell's Prin. sec. 1258; Bell on Leases, ii. 8; A. S. Dec. 14, 1756.

<sup>2</sup> Sheriff Court Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 8.

<sup>3</sup> Horn v. M'Lean, supra; Macdougall v. Buchanan, Dec. 11, 1867, 6 Macph. 120, 40 Scot. Jur. 67; Dove Wilson, Sheriff Court Practice, pp. 484-7.

No. 37. At advising,—

Nov. 30, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Mackessack.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action of reduction of a decree pronounced in the Sheriff Court at Elgin in a process between Mr Mackessack, proprietor of Ardyge, and one of his tenants, Mr Macdonald. It appears from the proceedings that the tenant had fallen into arrears to a considerable extent, and the landlord brought a petition against him in the Sheriff Court, part of the prayer of which was to have the stock on the farm sequestrated and sold in payment of these arrears. The tenant consented to decree to this effect being pronounced, and accordingly the Sheriff gave power to sell so much of the tenant's effects as would meet the landlord's claim. The effects, however, were sold under a process of cessio which the tenant brought, and then the landlord lodged a minute in the petition which he had brought, in which he stated that,—“ In respect that the trustee under the cessio of the said Robert Macdonald had recently sold off and dispenished the said farm of Cardenhill, the event referred to in the prayer of the petition, viz., the subject of the hypothec being exhausted, had now happened, and the Court is now moved to ordain the defender to stock and replenish the said farm and premises so as to afford sufficient security for payment of rent now due or to become due at the term of Whitsunday next, and failing his doing so . . . to grant warrant summarily to eject the defender.” Now, if the order asked had been granted, probably this case would never have arisen, but the tenant appeared on 19th January and stated that he was proceeding to lay down a crop for the incoming season, and was proceeding to stock the said farm in a husbandlike manner, and in respect of this statement by the defender the Sheriff did not pronounce an order upon him to stock within a definite period at the sight of a man of skill, but remitted to Mr Mackay, land-surveyor, to see what was being done, and to report not later than 19th February. Upon 18th February Mr Mackay reported that a certain part of the farm had been ploughed, but that even if the remainder should be ploughed, the land was in such poor condition, and there was such absence of manure of any kind upon the place, that the crop could not, in his opinion, be laid down in a satisfactory manner by the present tenant. He also reported that there was no stock of any kind upon the place, but the report does not state in clear terms whether or not any steps were being taken to stock it.

This action of reduction has been raised by the tenant on the ground that he had been summarily ejected without having had any order served upon him to stock within a definite time under pain of summary ejection. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that that ground of reduction must receive effect. He bases his judgment upon the ground that as there had been no order to stock there could be no decree on account of default. After the most careful consideration I have come to think that the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary was the only one that could have been pronounced in the circumstances.

It is perfectly plain on the face of the proceedings that the failure to fix and to certiorate the defender of any definite time within which he must stock was entirely an oversight of the Sheriff, who was misled by the tenant himself to pronounce the interlocutor he did, but he did not so word his interlocutor as to put the tenant in default in the event of failure, and therefore the tenant could not be summarily ejected as being in default. It would be somewhat dangerous to sanction the idea that a tenant may be summarily ejected for non-fulfilment of an order to stock without intimation of a definite term at which if he fail to stock he may be summarily removed. There was here a remit to a man of skill to see that the stocking was carried out, but there was no notice to the tenant that if he had not stocked before a certain date he would be summarily ejected. There was no definite intimation made to him from which he could draw the distinct conclusion that failure to stock would be followed by summary ejection. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 37.

Nov. 30, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Mackessack.

LORD YOUNG.—This case has received and deserves a good deal of consideration. The question was argued to us whether the action brought by the landlord was a competent process in the Sheriff Court. Perhaps it is not necessary in the view expressed by your Lordship, and shared in, I understand, by my brethren, to decide that question, but in the view I take of this matter it is necessary for me to express my opinion upon it. The question is whether a tenant upon failure to stock may be ejected by summary application to the Sheriff, the alternative view being that action must be by declarator in this Court. If by statute only the latter method were competent, of course it would be necessary to resort to that method, although I should even then regret the necessity, as an application to the Sheriff is so obviously a more apt remedy than a declarator. In the analogous case of a tenant of a house failing to furnish it as his implied if not express obligation, it is settled that the landlord's remedy is ejection by summary application to the Sheriff. I am, in the absence of any distinct authority to the contrary, disposed to hold that the remedy of a suffering landlord in such a case as this is also a summary application to the Sheriff, and that it would be a denial of justice to the landlord to say that he can only proceed by declarator in this Court.

A further question remains, which is important although merely formal, indeed a more formal matter it would hardly be possible to conceive. The Lord Ordinary has based his judgment upon the fact that the warrant of ejection was not preceded by a formal order to stock the farm within a definite time, failing which there would be summary ejection. That was undoubtedly the proper course to pursue; it was the course prayed for in the prayer of the petition. I stop to point out that after all the warrant of ejection would not have been pronounced for a breach of an order of Court—that is, for contumacy, but for a breach of the contract with the landlord, ascertained and found to have been committed after a reasonable opportunity had been given for fulfilling it. Now, attending to the circumstances of this case, we see that the tenant was ascertained to be in, and continued to be in, that breach of contract after not only reasonable and fair, but full and ample opportunity had been given to him to fulfil it. After the farm had been displenished by the trustee in the cessio a minute was given in on behalf of the landlord, upon 27th December 1887, stating that fact, and moving the Court to ordain the tenant to stock and farm, and failing his doing so within fourteen days, at the sight of Mr Mackay, to grant warrant for his summary ejection, with the warning that if he failed to do so he would be ejected. As your Lordship has observed, if that course had been exactly followed, and if the Sheriff had ordered the farm to be stocked in terms of the minute, and ejection had followed, there would probably have been no such action of reduction as the present. But that course would have been followed but for the interposition of the tenant himself. Now, what was that interposition? It was at the stage when the proper form would have been to give an opportunity to the tenant to stock within fourteen days,

No. 37. and the order to that effect would have been pronounced had he not interposed with the minute of 18th January stating that he was proceeding to lay down a crop for the incoming season, and to stock the farm in a husbandlike manner. In effect he said—"What is the use of making an order upon me? I am doing what is wished. Don't trouble yourself about it; I am doing it as fast as I can. I don't want a formal opportunity which such an order would signify." Well, what does the Sheriff do? It would have been more regular if he had said—"I won't attend to your minute; it may be a trap. I will pronounce a formal order." But he does attend to it, and in the very spirit in which it was intended. Instead of the order thereby demonstrated to be in the tenant's view superfluous, he remits to Mr Mackay to see whether the tenant is doing what he professes to be doing, and to report if it has been done. Upon 18th February—a month afterwards, and not fourteen days as asked by the landlord—Mr Mackay reports that the farm is totally displenished, and that there is not a trace of either stock or crop upon it, and thereupon the Sheriff pronounces the order for ejection. There was no appeal. There was no attempt to review that judgment, but this reduction is brought on the ground that the warrant was pronounced without being preceded by a formal order to stock. This is not candid or proper conduct on the part of the tenant, and we ought, I think, to give no countenance to it. The tenant has no right to remain in the farm except under the contract, and one of the conditions of his contract is that it should be so stocked as to give to the landlord security for the rent, and if he failed, and continued to fail, to comply with the condition, after due and sufficient notice, he was liable to be ejected. I think therefore there are no grounds for reducing this decree.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I give no opinion upon the question whether this summary ejection was competent before the Sheriff. Upon the authorities quoted it would be difficult to hold that the action was competent unless we are further to hold that there has been a change in procedure because of the recent Sheriff Court Act of 1877. I agree with Lord Young that if competent it would be a better form of process to proceed by summary action before the Sheriff rather than by declarator of reduction in this Court. But assuming the competency of the proceedings, I think they were not regularly carried out, and that the tenant therefore is entitled to decree of reduction.

LORD LEE.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair and with Lord Rutherford Clark, and upon this simple ground, that the case was not ripe for a decree by default. In arriving at this conclusion I assume that an action of ejection founded on an irritancy of the contract of lease would be competent in the Sheriff Court if the question were properly raised. The Sheriff Court Act of 1877 expressly provides that declarators of heritable right up to a certain value are to be competent in the Sheriff Court. Here there was a peculiarity which I should say required declaratory words to be employed in the prayer of the petition. What the landlord desired was warrant to sell the stock and crop to pay the rent for 1886, and only after that does the petition go on to ask a further decree ordering the tenant to stock the farm so as to give security for the rent to become due for crop 1887, and for ejection in case of failure. I think that that was a case in which it was essential to justice that the irritancy should be regularly declared, and that the proceedings should be so conducted as to make it quite clear that the irritancy had been incurred. No. 37.

THE COURT adhered.

ROBERT STEWART, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

Nov. 30, 1888.
Macdonald v.
Mackessack.

DONALD M'LEAN, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. J. Guthrie.

WILLIAM ADAM, Defender (Appellant).—Balfour—Shaw.

No. 38.

Nov. 30, 1888.
M'Lean v.
Adam.

Reparation—Verbal injury—Privilege—Malice.—The chairman of the public health committee of a local authority stated, at a meeting of the committee, that a case of typhoid fever had been reported to him by a medical man, "who said that it was probably to be traced to the milk supplied" by a certain dairyman. In an action of damages against him by the dairyman it was proved that the medical man had not been of that opinion, and had not said so; but that the defender had misunderstood a conversation which he had held with him, and had made the statement in the belief of its truth and in the discharge of his public duty. Held that in these circumstances the defender was entitled to be absolved.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk) on the circumstances in which the groundless character of an allegation against another may infer malice.

DONALD M'LEAN, carter, Burghead, raised an action against William ADAM, residing there, for £250 as damages for alleged slander uttered by the defender regarding him. 2ND DIVISION.
Sheriff of Elgin.
I.

The pursuer stated, and it was admitted, that prior to June 1887 he had carried on business as a dairyman in Burghead, and that in that month a serious outbreak of typhoid fever occurred in that place.

In condescendence 3 he averred,—“On or about 22d June 1887, at a meeting of the Burghead Water and Drainage Committee, held in the Free Church schoolroom at Burghead, in the presence and hearing of the Rev. R. Niven, Free Church minister, and A. Jenkins, baker, both residing in Burghead, and John Nicoll, inspector of poor, Hopeman, or one or other of them, the defender stated that a case of typhoid fever had been reported to him by Dr Hay, Forres, who had said that it was probably to be traced to the milk supplied from the pursuer's dairy. That statement was false, and was made maliciously and without probable cause.” The pursuer further averred that in consequence of the defender's false and malicious statement his dairy business had been destroyed, and that he had sustained loss and injury to the extent sued for.

The defender, who was chairman of Burghead Water and Drainage Committee of the Local Authority, admitted the correctness of the following minute of the committee, dated 22d June 1887, which minute he produced, viz.:—“The convener [defender] stated to the meeting that a case of typhoid fever had been reported to him by Dr Hay, Forres, who said that it was probably to be traced to the milk supplied from Mr D. M'Lean's dairy, as cases resembling typhoid had been in that family for some time previous. It was the opinion of the committee that a sample of the milk should be procured, and sent for analysis to Dr Littlejohn, Edinburgh. Mr Adam and Mr Jenkins were appointed a committee to have this done. . . .” He denied the averment that he had acted maliciously, and averred that in his official position he had been desirous to ascertain and remove the cause of the epidemic; that from circulars of the Board of Supervision he had learned that it had been ascertained that such disease had been transmitted through milk, and had been recom-

No. 38.

Nov. 30, 1888.
M'Lean v.
Adam.

mended to give attention to sanitary arrangements and to the existence of contagious disease at all dairies; that on the morning of the 20th June, two days before the alleged slander, he had been sent for to meet Dr Petrie Hay, Forres, who practised in Burghead, and was then attending typhoid fever cases there, and that in the course of the conversation he (defender) learned from Dr Hay that no inquiry had been made as to the milk supply of those infected with the disease; that inquiry was then made, which resulted in its being ascertained that some persons reported to be ill of typhoid fever got their milk from the pursuer; that this was reported to Dr Hay, "whereupon he expressed his opinion that the typhoid fever might have come from the pursuer's dairy, as he had recently attended two children in his house, and could not account for the high fever they were suffering from."

The defender further stated that in consequence of his investigations he called the meeting of 22d June, at which the statement complained of was made, reported to them and received their instructions, and that his investigations and his report to the committee were all in the discharge of his duty as a member of the Local Authority and Public Health and Water and Drainage Committees.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The defender having acted solely in the discharge of a public duty, with probable cause and without malice, in the matter complained of, he is entitled to have decree of absolvitor pronounced in his favour. (5) The defender having, in his official capacity, as convener foresaid, conducted the inquiry referred to in his statement of facts, and having, at the meeting of the said committee, and solely for their guidance in the matter, made the statement complained of, in accordance with a duty incumbent on him to supply all information in his possession relating to the public health of Burghead, he is entitled to the plea of privilege.

Proof was led. It appeared that the pursuer, prior to the occurrence in question, had kept one cow, the milk of which he sold. It also appeared that the defender and another member of Local Authority went, after the meeting of the Public Health Committee at which the alleged slander was uttered, to take samples of the milk sold by the pursuer for analysis. Dr Hay and Mr Dick also visited and inspected the premises. A rumour having in consequence arisen that the pursuer's dairy was a cause of fever, the result was the destruction of the pursuer's business. Subsequent inquiries shewed that the milk had nothing to do with the fever. It appeared that there were at the time cases of illness in the pursuer's house which were at first suspected of being typhoid fever but proved to be only the fever of measles.

Evidence, which is fully referred to in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, was led as to a conversation, prior to the meeting of the Public Health Committee, between the defender and Dr Hay, and at which Mr Dick, a medical student, and Mr Grant were present. Dr Hay deponed that at this conversation he blamed rather the drainage system than the milk supply, but that the defender suggested milk as the means by which the fever was propagated, and adhered to that opinion. At the time in question the streets of the village had recently been opened up in order to execute a drainage system, and the soil, which was porous and on which sewage matter had been for many years thrown, was saturated with sewage. Dr Hay and Mr Dick both denied that the former had reported to the defender that the fever could be traced to the pursuer's dairy. The defender deponed that he and Dr Hay had discussed the possibility of the milk being a source of danger, and that Dr Hay, after ascertaining that certain of the patients got their milk at the pursuer's dairy, said that the cases at the pursuer's own house must be typhoid. He (defender) had thereupon called the meeting of Public Health Committee, and made at it the statement of which the pursuer complained.

No. 38.

Nov. 30, 1888.

M'Lean v.

Adam.

The Sheriff-substitute (Rampini), on 28th June 1888, found that the defender's statements founded on in condescendence 3 "were unfounded in point of fact, and that they were made maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause; that they were not privileged in point of law; that in consequence of the said statements the pursuer has suffered serious injury and damage to his business and reputation, and that the defender is liable to him in damages therefor; assesses the same at £100 sterling, and decerns for that sum against the defender."*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The circumstances made the case one of exceptionally high privilege. The defender, who held a public position concerned with the maintaining of public health, was reporting to the committee over which he presided a matter which he believed of importance to their duties. The defender's case of privilege was similar to that of a town-councillor speaking to the business of a council meeting, as in the recent case of Shaw.<sup>1</sup> Malice must be established against him as a condition of liability. Personal ill-will and desire to injure were disproved by the evidence. It might be that he was mistaken both as to the cause of the spread of fever, and as to the import of his conversation with Dr Hay. But the fact remained that the subject of milk as a source of danger had been discussed, and that the defender believed it to be the result of this conversation that Dr Hay considered that the milk from the pursuer's dairy was a source of danger. Malice might possibly be inferred from an unfounded statement made with gross disregard to truth, and without inquiry, but the circumstances of the case shewed that the defender had been acting honestly, and after inquiry.

Argued for the pursuer;—That the occasion was one of privilege was admitted. But the question was whether the defender's conduct could be sheltered behind that defence. He had destroyed the pursuer's business by a statement which was proved to be unfounded, and by the action he and his committee took in consequence thereof. Dr Hay, his alleged authority for his statement, had never said the pursuer's dairy was to blame for the spread of fever. He had blamed the drains. No doubt there had been talk about fever being often carried by milk, but that was what the defender himself said in consequence of a theory he had determined * "NOTE.— . . . It seems very much to the Sheriff-substitute as if the defender having formed his own theory of the cause of this fever, had been determined to maintain it through thick and through thin,—that so convinced was he in his own mind that he was right and that Dr Hay was wrong, that he could not or would not listen to anything that was said on the other side. In no other way can the Sheriff-substitute account for the reckless, and, as it has been proved, entirely unfounded statement he made to the meeting on the 22d of June. This is not the temper in which the chairman of an important committee should approach the discussion of questions which involved so much to the whole community of Burghhead. Nor is this, the Sheriff-substitute thinks, the temper which will entitle him to plead privilege in a case like the present.

"Personal ill-will, the Sheriff-substitute gladly believes, the defender had none against the pursuer. But evidence of personal ill-will is not required to establish malice in law. Malice may be inferred from facts and circumstances, and 'the falsehood of what is said is not always an important consideration in cases of this kind, but sometimes it is conclusive,' and as the Sheriff-substitute has been unable to find the slightest justification in fact for the statements the defender made to the meeting, he thinks it is conclusive here. . . ."

<sup>1</sup> Shaw v. Morgan, July 11, 1888, 15 R. 865.

No. 38. to support, and to which Dr Hay did not subscribe. It was untrue that "a case of typhoid fever had been reported to" the defender "by Dr Hay, Nov. 30, 1888. Forres, who said that it was probably to be traced to Mr D. M'Lean's dairy, as cases resembling typhoid had been in that family for some time previous." Yet the defender had for some reason chosen to make that statement, representing it not as his own opinion but as in point of fact Dr Hay's opinion, and an opinion communicated to him. This circumstance shifted the onus which lay on the pursuer in the first instance and put it on the defender to shew an excuse for a statement not erroneous merely, but made without any reasonable ground whatever, and against the information in his possession. There could be no honest belief in it. Where the false statement related to something not within a person's own knowledge, the mere fact of making it would infer malice.<sup>1</sup>

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute of Elginshire. The pursuer claimed damages from the defender on the ground that his business as a milk-dealer in Burghhead, in that county, had been ruined, in consequence of a statement made by the defender that an outbreak of typhoid fever among the inhabitants was probably to be attributed to milk supplied by the pursuer. The defender maintained that the statement was made by him as chairman of the Burghhead Public Health and Water and Drainage Committee, and in the fulfilment of his office as a member of a public body, having a duty to report such matters relating to the sanitary condition of the place as might become known to him, and that he neither acted maliciously nor without probable cause. The Sheriff-substitute has, after taking a proof, decided against the defender, and finding that the statements were made maliciously and without probable cause, has awarded £100 of damages.

The case is a most unfortunate one. The evidence makes it certain that there was no ground for attributing the outbreak or spreading of typhoid fever in Burghhead to the milk sold by the pursuer, and it appears to be highly probable that, but for the unfortunate report of the defender to the committee, and the somewhat ill-judged action taken upon that report, the pursuer might have been selling his milk profitably to this day, instead of having his little business destroyed. I think it would have been much more prudent if the defender had confined his report to the expression of his belief that milk would probably be found to be the cause of the mischief, and if the committee, instead of singling out, and thus pointing the finger of suspicion at, the pursuer's dairy, as distinguished from others, had directed samples to be taken from all the milk-dealers, and thus saved the pursuer from the desertion of customers, which, in so small a place, was sure to follow any indication on the part of the authorities that one dairy in particular was suspected.

But while it is certainly deplorable that such error in discretion should have been committed, leading to disastrous results to the pursuer's milk business, the question whether it is to be held that the defender in making his report was acting maliciously, and therefore is to be liable in damages for the consequent injury, is an entirely different one. It can hardly be suggested that in this case there is any trace of personal malice, producing a direct desire to cause injury. The pursuer's counsel did not in debate maintain that the proof disclosed any such case. He rather argued that malice was to be implied in the legal sense from the facts disclosed, on the ground that the true inference from them was that the report had been made in reckless disregard of the pursuer's interests. The highest point to which he attempted to bring up his case was that the evidence did not justify the idea that the defender could have had an honest belief in the truth of what he said, had he well considered the matter, and that he must be looked upon as guilty of such recklessness as is held in law to imply malice from his making so groundless an accusation. Now, it appears to me that the inference of malice from recklessness of statement must depend not merely upon the falsity of the statement, however gross, although that is undoubtedly an element which may be of importance along with others, but upon other considerations. A statement may be absolutely devoid of foundation, and yet may not be uttered in such circumstances of reckless disregard of another's interest or peace of mind as necessarily to be held malicious. Malice may or may not be the necessary implication according to the surrounding circumstances. For example, if the injurious statement accuses the injured party of some gross crime or highly dishonourable conduct—attacks a man in such way as to bring disgrace on his personal character—the inference may readily be drawn from the mere fact of its being recklessly made without any reasonable ground for belief that the person originating the calumnious report or spreading it, acted maliciously, regardless whether his injurious words were true or not. On the other hand, if the direct purpose of the statement complained of is plainly not to injure the person to whom it relates, or to indulge a propensity to tell scandalous tales of one's neighbours, but to effect some laudable or innocent purpose, and particularly if the purpose be one of importance to the public weal, then it is not and cannot be so easy to infer that the rashness of the statement, as indicated by its falsity, amounts to utterly reckless, and therefore, in a legal sense, malicious calumny.

<sup>1</sup> Denholm v. Thomson, Oct. 22, 1880, 8 R. 31.

What, then, were the circumstances of the present case, and how do these principles apply to them? There was a serious outbreak of typhoid fever in Burghhead. It was plainly the duty of the defender in his official position to endeavour to trace the disease to its source, and I think the evidence indicates that he was doing so, not with the object of attacking or injuring anyone, but for the purpose of doing what he could to assist in checking the outbreak and stamping out the disease. He had interviews with Dr Hay, who practised in the village, and with Mr Dick, a gentleman acquainted with medical science, at which undoubtedly the milk supply was spoken of by the medical men as a proper subject for inquiry. A circular from the Board of Supervision had called attention to the milk supply as a probable means of communication of enteric disease. It was after the interviews with Hay and Dick that the defender made the report complained of. Now, that he should be engaged in inquiry, should have conversations with the doctors, and should report to his committee, were all proceedings in themselves within his duty, and perfectly laudable. He was no busybody, rushing about to make himself important by professing superior knowledge and making statements without responsibility. His actions are therefore to receive favourable and not unfavourable construction in themselves. The circumstances all point to his being engaged according to his lights in the fulfilment of public duty.

Then the report which he makes is upon a matter of importance in the circumstances. Unquestionably the subject of milk was brought up in the conversations with the medical men, and was considered by everyone as being

No. 38.

Nov. 30, 1888.

M'Lean v. Adam.

No. 38. one for consideration and inquiry. There is a conflict of evidence as to the question whether Dr Hay did or did not indicate milk supply as the probable source of the mischief. It is undoubted that he did direct attention to milk supply, because he states that he cautioned Mr Dick, who was resident in Burghead, about the milk, and advised him to "ascertain in cases of fever where the milk is coming from," and he and Mr Dick inspected the pursuer's milk premises, and made inquiries from the witness Grant as to the place from which the milk supply came to a house in which typhoid fever had broken out. But Dr Hay, while admitting that there was conversation about milk, which, he says, "one is always suspicious of in cases of typhoid outbreak," denies that he gave the defender any ground for believing that he thought the pursuer's dairy a probable source of the evil. He states that he said to the defender that he "could not convince him," meaning by these words that he could not convince him that the fever was to be attributed to bad drainage, and not to milk, and Mr Dick's evidence tends to confirm this. On the other hand, the defender states that Dr Hay on learning that the milk had been supplied from the pursuer's dairy, made the remark, "That is just it, and these cases we met with in M'Lean's house must have been typhoid fever," and this is so far confirmed by the witness Grant, who states that on Dr Hay being informed of the milk supply to the infected house coming from pursuer's dairy he answered that "that was just what he was saying, and that all those children he had seen were suffering more or less of the same."

In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to solve this conflict of evidence. The whole evidence taken together plainly imports that in the circumstances the question of milk supply was important, and should be investigated, and that rightly or wrongly the defender had taken up the impression that Dr Hay had suggested that the illness in the pursuer's house had probably a typhoid character, and that therefore there were probable grounds for suspicion that the pursuer's milk might be a cause of propagation of the disease. He may have formed a wrong impression of what Dr Hay meant, and the recollection of the four persons present may vary as to details of a general conversation, but I find nothing in the evidence taken as a whole to satisfy me that the defender was not in the bona fide belief that suspicion did attach to this dairy of the pursuer, and I am satisfied that in stating that belief to the committee of which he was chairman he acted in his public capacity, and without any motive except the good of the community. I have said already that I think greater prudence would have been shewn had the report been more guarded, and been acted on in a less invidious way. But looking to the whole circumstances, I am unable to come to the conclusion that the defender was actuated either by direct malice, or acted with that outrageous disregard of a neighbour's good name and interests which is to be held so inexcusable in its recklessness as that malice must be held to be implied from the acts done without any evidence of direct malice.

I must move your Lordships, therefore, to recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, to find that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender in making the report to the Water and Drainage Committee acted maliciously, and to assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action.

LORD YOUNG.—I am substantially of the same opinion. The record in this action does not on reading it make a favourable impression, and the evidence confirms the impression received from the condescendence that a good deal has been made of very little. The pursuer is designed as a carter in Burghhead, and he kept one cow to add, by the sale of her milk, to his earnings as a carter. The defender is chairman of the committee on public health at the same place. The action is for £250 of damages, because one day at a meeting of the committee, consisting of the defender himself and three other persons, the defender said, according to the pursuer's averment, "that a case of typhoid fever had been reported to him by Dr Hay, Forres, who had said that it was probably to be traced to the milk supplied from the pursuer's dairy."

No. 38.

Nov. 30, 1888.

M'Lean v. Adam.

I think the demand extravagant. The Sheriff has given the pursuer £100 as damages for this statement to the business I have described. Anything more extravagant I do not remember to have met with. The statement is noted accurately on the minutes of the meeting. It contains no imputation on the character of the pursuer. It is a simple statement that a doctor had reported to the pursuer that typhoid fever was probably to be attributed to the milk from his dairy. Now, no doubt people should be cautious in their speech, but this occasion does not strike me as one for special caution. I think it is one for freedom of speech. No occasion will justify wilful falsehood spoken to a neighbour's prejudice, but it is not suggested that there was wilful falsehood to the pursuer's prejudice. What else, then, could be the malice of the defender, if it was not a case of wilful falsehood? He was not in competition with the pursuer in business. The only thing that can be supplied as a motive is, that he misapprehended the import of the conversation he had with Dr Hay. I quite accept Dr Hay's statement that he did not attribute the fever to the milk, but rather thought the opposite. But I as certainly believe that he did convey to the defender the impression which the defender says he did, and that the defender honestly took it up, and repeated it in the discharge of his duty. I should therefore not be contented with saying that the pursuer has not proved malice. I should be for finding, in fact, that the defender did not act maliciously. It is certain that he took up the impressions I have mentioned from his conversation with the doctor, unless he is committing perjury. He swears it, and I believe him.

I think that is an end of the case, for it results in this, that the defender was acting honestly in the discharge of his duty. It is matter of common knowledge that suspicion attaches to milk in such cases. And here suspicion was the more natural, because there was fever in the pursuer's house. No doubt, that afterwards turned out to be the fever of measles, not of typhoid. But that can make no difference to this action. I daresay there may have been some suffering in the matter, though it be greatly exaggerated, just as in the case of an epidemic of crime, and not as here of disease, suffering may be caused to innocent people who are at first suspected of having been to blame for it. But that will not make this a good action, unless the defender was actuated by malice.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordship in the chair. The statement which the defender made, and which is complained of, was, I think, made in the discharge of his duty, and in the honest belief that it was true. I see no evidence of actual malice, and there is no proof of anything on the defender's part to which I can apply such a name. I am therefore of opinion that the case of the pursuer is not established.

No. 38.

Nov. 30, 1888.
M'Lean v.
Adam.

LORD LEE.—In this case the statement complained of as defamatory was made by the defender as convener of the Water and Drainage Committee of the Local Authority of Burghead, at a meeting of that committee. The record discloses this fact, and therefore it is clear that the defender was in a privileged position, and that the issue to be proved by the pursuer required that he should establish that the statement was made maliciously.

It is no doubt well settled that malice may be inferred from recklessness. But I do not think it is correct to say that recklessness amounts to malice, or necessarily implies malice. The correction of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor in Denholm v. Thomson (8 R. 31), shews that it was considered necessary in that case to affirm malice in point of fact, and not sufficient to say, as the Sheriff-substitute has said, that the defender "acted with a recklessness amounting to malice in the legal sense." There is also a recent case in the First Division in which this point was considered, and considered more fully than the report indicates. I refer to the case of Ritchie v. Barton (10 R. 813). It may be gathered from the opinion of Lord Deas, however—correcting an expression he had used in the case of Watson v. Burnet (Feb. 8, 1862, 24 D. 494)—and also from the opinion of the Lord President, that it was not thought sufficient to support the verdict that there was evidence of recklessness. It was dealt with as a question upon the evidence whether the recklessness was such as, combined with the other circumstances, justified the jury in finding malice proved. The Lord President's examination of the evidence was directed to the object of shewing that there was not mere recklessness, but such a repetition of the slanderous expressions as might be held to imply ill-will, and to exclude the idea that the defender in his letters was merely expressing in good faith his view of the pursuer's conduct.

Upon the evidence in the present case, I concur in holding that it is entirely insufficient to prove or to suggest that the defender acted otherwise than honestly, and within his privilege and duty, in reporting to the committee what he understood Dr Hay to have said.

I therefore concur in the proposed judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 28th June 1888: Find that the pursuer is a carter, and carries on the business of a dairyman at Burghead, and the defender, chemical manufacturer there, is chairman of the Water and Drainage Committee of the Local Authority: Find that, in the month of June 1887, a serious and alarming outbreak of typhoid fever occurred in the village of Burghead, and that on the 22d day of that month, the defender, at a meeting of the said committee, made the statements contained in the 3d article of the pursuer's condescendence, of and concerning the pursuer, in the hearing of the parties therein named: Find that the said statements were unfounded in point of fact: Find that the defender, in making said statements, acted in his official capacity as chairman of the Water and Drainage Committee of the Local Authority of Burghead, and solely for the information of the committee, and that he made them bona fide, and in the belief that they were true: Therefore sustain the 4th and 5th pleas in law for the defender; assoilzie the defender from the conclusion of the action Find him entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court: Remit," &c.

GIBSON & PATERSON, W.S.—CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT GUDGEON, Pursuer (Appellant).—J. C. Thomson—C. S. Dickson. No. 39.
 GEORGE OUTRAM & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
Asher—Murray.

Dec. 1, 1888.
 Gudgeon v.
 Outram & Co.

Reparation—Slander—Issue—Innuendo—"Singular conduct."—An action of damages at the instance of the manager at Ayr Farina Mills was brought against the proprietors of a newspaper for slander alleged to be contained in the following article:—"Fire at Ayr Farina Mills—Singular conduct of the manager.—A fire occurred at a late hour last night in Messrs Hyland & Company's Farina Mills, Ayr, and before the flames were got under damage to the extent of £150 was done. It appears that the proceedings at the fire were somewhat unusual. The alarm was given, and the fire brigade turned out, but on their arrival at the gate of the establishment they were refused admittance by the manager, Mr Gudgeon, who said they could manage the fire themselves. Superintendent M'Kay, the chief of the police, and some of his men were also refused admittance, although the fire was breaking through the roof of the buildings. Superintendent M'Kay and his men eventually got into the premises by climbing over the wall, and the fire brigade seem to have got in by forcing open the gate. They were followed by the crowd. Mr Gudgeon ordered Superintendent M'Kay to take away the hose, but the superintendent said he had no power to do so, and the fire brigade commenced to play on the flames, which were soon got under. . . . ." The Court held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the article falsely and calumniously represented that he "had endeavoured to prevent the fire at the works referred to in the said article from being subdued, so as to cause destruction of the said works and stock therein, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

ROBERT GUDGEON, drysalter, Ayr, manager in Scotland for Messrs 1st Division.
 Thomas Hyland & Company, manufacturing chemists, Manchester, raised Sheriff of an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against George Outram & Com- Lanarkshire.
 pany, proprietors of the Evening Times and Glasgow Weekly Herald news- M. papers, concluding for £2000 in name of damages for an alleged slander published by them in the Evening Times of 18th September 1888, and reprinted in the Glasgow Weekly Herald of 22d September.

The article complained of was as follows:—"Fire at Ayr Farina Mills—Singular conduct of the manager.—Ayr, Tuesday (special).—A fire occurred at a late hour last night in Messrs Hyland & Company's Farina Mills, Ayr, and before the flames were got under damage to the extent of £150 was done. It appears that the proceedings at the fire were somewhat unusual. The alarm was given, and the fire brigade turned out, but on their arrival at the gate of the establishment they were refused admittance by the manager, Mr Gudgeon, who said they could manage the fire themselves. Superintendent M'Kay, the chief of the police, and some of his men were also refused admittance, although the fire was breaking through the roof of the buildings. Superintendent M'Kay and his men eventually got into the premises by climbing over the wall, and the fire brigade seem to have got in by forcing open the gate. They were followed by the crowd. Mr Gudgeon ordered Superintendent M'Kay to take away the hose, but the superintendent said he had no power to do so, and the fire brigade commenced to play on the flames, which were soon got under. The Farina Mill is rather isolated, and is situated on the banks of the Ayr. The fire originated in a drying-stove, in which a high temperature is kept up."

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 6) "The said articles, immediately above quoted, are false, and are slanders and libels of, against, and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and injuriously represented and represent to the public that the pursuer had endeavoured to cause destruction of the said works and stock by fire, or at all events had

No. 39.
Dec. 1, 1888.
Gudgeon v.
Outram & Co.

endeavoured to prevent the fire being subdued, and so cause destruction of the premises and stock, and had committed, or endeavoured to commit, the crime of fire-raising, and the crime of causing further destruction by fire to said works and stock as aforesaid, and so defraud the insurance companies with whom the same were insured, or one or more of said crimes or offences. In any event, the pursuer is falsely and calumniously represented thereby as culpably acting in violation of his duty as manager in connection with and regarding the said fire. By these paragraphs, and by the representations thereby conveyed to the public, the pursuer's feelings have been deeply injured, and his reputation and business position have also been, and may still further be, very injuriously affected, to his serious loss and damage."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defenders having falsely and calumniously accused the pursuer of committing, or endeavouring to commit, the crimes or offences libelled, the latter is entitled to solatium and reparation therefor. (3) The articles complained of by the pursuer having been published in regard to him by the defenders, and intended and understood to bear the actionable meaning put upon them by the pursuer in his condescendence, he is entitled to solatium and reparation therefor from the defenders.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant.

The Sheriff (Guthrie), on 30th October, allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session under section 40 of the Judicature Act.

The following issues were proposed:—“(1) Whether the said articles, or part thereof, are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether the said articles, or part thereof, are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that he, being the manager of Thomas Hyland & Company's works in Ayr, had endeavoured to prevent the fire at the said works referred to in the said articles from being subdued, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

Argued for the pursuer;—On the first issue.—The article complained of was free from ambiguity, and no innuendo was required to be inserted in the issue.<sup>1</sup> [LORD PRESIDENT.—There was no ambiguity in the words in Macrae v. Wicks, and on that ground it was properly held that no innuendo was required. Here the words were ambiguous, as in some circumstances a man might properly think that more harm would be done by the water used in putting out a fire than by the fire itself.] The pursuer, however, did not further insist on the first issue. On the second issue.—The sting of the article lay chiefly in the heading “Singular conduct of the manager.” This was followed up by a statement that the manager refused admission to the fire brigade, “although the fire was breaking through the roof of the building.” The whole article suggested that he had not done his duty as a manager, and that he had some sinister motive in refusing the services of the brigade. The word “singular” strongly suggested that, and if the slander were believed it would damage his character in the eyes of the public.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no slander here, and nothing to go to the jury. There was no word directly charging the manager with fault. “Singular” was not an actionable word, though it might be innuendoesed so as to make a relevant case. It might be singular that any man should refuse the services of the brigade, but in some circumstances he might be entitled to do so. If the act stated to be “singular” was innocent in itself, the addition of that word would not be slanderous, and if the act were a guilty one, "singular" would add no strength to it. The key to the whole article lay in the sentence that the manager "said they could manage the fire themselves." The pursuer suggested several innuendoes—fire-raising, defrauding the insurance companies, &c. At all events, an innuendo must be inserted, as the words were ambiguous, as the manager might have done all that the article said quite properly in certain conceivable circumstances.

<sup>1</sup> Macrae v. Wicks, March 6, 1886, 13 R. 733.

LORD ADAM then suggested that the words "so as to cause destruction of the said works and stock therein" should be added to the issue.

The pursuer adopted the suggestion, and the Court (LORD SHAND absent), without giving any opinions, pronounced this interlocutor:—

"DISALLOW the first issue; approve of the second issue as amended at the bar; appoint the same to be the issue," &c.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 39.

Dec. 1, 1888.
Gudgeon v.
Outram & Co.

MRS ANN MARTIN AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—D.-F. Mackintosh—M'Lennan.

No. 40.

MRS CHARLOTTE STEWART, Respondent.—R. V. Campbell—W. Campbell. Dec. 1, 1888.
Martin v.
Stewart.

Parent and Child—Pupil—Tutor—Appointment of tutor to act conjointly with mother—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27), s. 2.—A father died, survived by his wife, and by a child in pupillarity. He was at his death possessed of considerable heritable and moveable property, including numerous assets in connection with a mercantile business in London. He left no nomination of tutors or curators to his child. On the petition of the nearest of kin to the pupil on the father's side to have one of their number appointed to act as tutor to the child jointly with the mother, the Court appointed a person, nominated by the mother, to act jointly with her as tutor, in terms of section 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

JOHN STEWART, shipowner, London, and of Larghan, Coupar-Angus, a 1ST DIVISION. B.
domiciled Scotsman, died intestate in August 1888, in London, survived by his wife, Mrs Charlotte Stewart, and by an only child, Elizabeth Stewart, aged eleven years.

On 16th October 1888, Mrs Ann Martin and others, the nearest of kin to the pupil Elizabeth Stewart, on her father's side, presented a petition to the Court, to appoint two, or at all events one of the petitioners to act conjointly with the mother, Mrs Stewart, as tutors to the pupil, in terms of sections 2 and 8 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27).*

Mrs Stewart lodged answers opposing the prayer of the petition.

It appeared from the petition and answers that Mr Stewart left no nomination of tutors or curators to his child, and that there had been no marriage-contract entered into between him and his wife.

It appeared further that the heritable estate of the deceased, which was

* By the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, it is enacted (section 2) as follows:—"On the death of the father of an infant, and in case the father shall have died prior to the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone, when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father. When no guardian has been appointed by the father, or if the guardian or guardians appointed by the father is or are dead, or refuses or refuse to act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, from time to time appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother." By section 8 of said statute it is enacted,—"In the application of this Act to Scotland, the word guardian shall mean tutor, and the word infant shall mean pupil."

No. 40. mainly situated in Scotland, amounted to about £9200, and the moveable estate to about £20,300.

Dec. 1, 1888.
Martin v.
Stewart.

The petitioners stated,—“The said Mrs Charlotte Stewart, the mother of the pupil, is entirely without experience in business, and is not qualified to take sole charge of the winding-up of the deceased's London business, the realisation of the numerous and complicated assets, and the administration of the large property now belonging to the pupil.”

They further made averments with regard to the relations between the deceased and his wife, to the effect that she had never enjoyed his confidence. They did not, however, press for a proof of these statements.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are of opinion that some person should be appointed to act jointly with the mother as tutor, but we are not disposed to adopt the suggestion of the petitioners. The hostility of parties renders harmonious action unlikely if we did so. If the widow will suggest any suitable person to act with her, we should be very glad to appoint him.

Counsel for the respondent suggested Mr William Scott Ferguson, farmer and manure manufacturer, Picton's Hill, Perth, the brother of the respondent. The petitioners opposed his appointment, on the grounds that were he appointed there would be no one to represent the father's side of the family, and that he was not qualified as a business man to manage the winding-up of such a complicated estate.

The respondent maintained that there must be delegation whoever was appointed, as a large part of the estate was situated in London, and that Mr Ferguson was as suitable a person in every way to be appointed as could be found.

THE COURT (the LORD PRESIDENT, LORD MURE, and LORD WELLWOOD) appointed Mr Ferguson to act jointly with Mrs Stewart, and found no expenses due to or by either party.

THOMAS HART, Solicitor—P. H. CAMERON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 41. WILLIAM W. BAIN, Pursuer (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell—Salvesen.
ROBERT STRANG, Defender (Appellant).—J. G. Smith—Shaw.

Dec. 6, 1888.
Bain v.
Strang.

Loan—Injury to borrowed article—Onus—Reasonable care—Horse.—Where a borrower returns the article borrowed in a damaged condition, and damages are claimed in respect thereof, the onus lies on him to prove that he exercised reasonable care in the use he made of the article.

Question whether the onus is on him to prove the immediate cause of the injury.

A person borrowed a horse. While he was driving it along the road the horse stumbled and fell, damaging itself seriously. Circumstances in which the Court assolized the borrower from an action of damages at the instance of the owner, on the ground that he had proved that he had exercised reasonable care in driving the horse.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

WILLIAM W. BAIN, Hamilton, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton against Robert Strang, concluding for payment of £35, 18s. 3d., in respect of injury to a horse which he lent for the day to the defender on 27th May 1887.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) “When the defender obtained the custody and control of said cob on the said 27th day of May, it was in perfect order and condition; and while in defender's custody it was, through the reckless or negligent conduct of him, or someone for whom he is responsible, so severely injured, as to be quite useless for pursuer's purposes. Said injuries are believed to have been caused by defender having driven the cob at an excessive rate of speed with a loose rein, and otherwise in a careless manner." No. 41.

Dec. 6, 1888.
Bain v.
Strang.

The defender answered;—(Ans. 2) "Denied. The pursuer is called upon to condescend on the reckless or negligent conduct of the defender. Explained that the defender left Hamilton about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and drove the horse carefully to Blackwood, where the horse was stabled until about nine o'clock in the evening, when the defender along with Mr Begg started on their return journey. When they were nearing Hamilton, and about three hundred yards west of the bridge over the river Avon, the said horse stumbled and went upon its foreknees. At the time the animal was being carefully driven, and the defender was exercising every possible control over it. The accident occurred through no carelessness on the defender's part."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Said cob having been delivered gratuitously on loan to defender by pursuer in a sound condition, and being in the entire custody and control of the defender, he was bound to return it in the like good condition. (2) Said cob having been rendered useless for pursuer's purposes by injuries sustained through the fault of the defender, or of those for whom he is responsible, while under the use, custody, and control of the defender, he is bound to pay the pursuer the damage sustained by him.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and wanting in specification, ought not to be remitted to probation, and the present action falls to be dismissed. (2) The horse not having been injured through the recklessness or negligence of the defender, he is not responsible for any loss that may have been sustained by the pursuer.

Proof was led in the case. The defender and Mr Begg, who were alone in a two-wheeled dogcart when the accident happened, both deponed that the former was driving carefully at the time.* There was no evidence to

---

* The defender deponed,—“The horse was in good condition when we got it, as far as I know, and went quietly to Blackwood. We drove direct to Blackwood from Hamilton. We stabled at the farmhouse, and started to return about seven minutes past nine in the evening. It was in the beginning of June. It was not dark. The horse came down about a hundred or a hundred and fifty yards on the Hamilton side of Avon Bridge. That would be about a quarter-past ten. I cannot say the distance between Blackwood and Hamilton. I think it must be about nine miles. Avon Bridge is just at the entrance to Hamilton. I was driving when the horse fell. I was driving carefully. Mr Begg and I were alone in the machine. We were both pitched out. The machine was damaged, and so was the horse. It was a dogcart. I should say we were driving six or seven miles an hour when the horse fell. I was not driving with a loose rein. The horse had leather padding on his sole. There was no stone in his foot. When I examined the ground I thought it was a stone that had made him fall. I examined the ground to see if there were loose stones just at the place where the horse fell. I did not see any loose stones. I saw a scar on the road. I saw nothing in the state of the road which would account for the horse coming down.”

Mr Begg deponed,—“Coming home, when near to Avon Bridge, the horse came down. We were not driving quickly at the time. We were going at what you might call a dog's trot—a good trot. Mr Strang was driving. He made an examination to see if there was anything on the road which could account for the horse coming down. I think he said he had found a slip, as if the horse had placed its foot on a stone. I do not know that there were any loose stones. There was nothing that I saw in the state of the road to account for the horse coming down. My opinion was that the horse had fallen asleep.

No. 41.

Dec. 6, 1888.

Bain v.
Strang.

the contrary. It was also proved that the defender had been accustomed to driving for many years. It was proved that the horse had, previous to the accident, shewed some symptoms of weakness in the shoulder, and the evidence on this point is fully given in the opinion of the Lord President. It was further proved that up to the date of the accident the horse had always been driven in a four-wheeled vehicle.

On 11th February 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's horse was injured while on loan to the defender, and that the defender has not proved he used all reasonable care: Finds in law that the defender is liable in damages; assesses the same at £21, 18s. 3d.; Finds the defender liable to the pursuer in said sum."*

On 24th May following the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.†

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The onus on him was to prove that he had exercised reasonable care in using the horse.<sup>1</sup> He and Mr Begg both deponed that the horse was being care-

I do not think it was going at a trot of six or seven miles an hour. It was not much more than a walk. We were not driving with a loose rein. Mr Strang had a good catch of the horse any time I saw him. The horse was cut on the knees, and bleeding."

* "NOTE.— . . . The law is that a borrower must take all reasonable care, and prove that he has done this. In Wilson v. Orr, 1879, 7 R. 266, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) said:—"The hirer of an article under the contract of location is under an obligation to restore the commodity in like good condition as that in which he received it. If the subject of the contract perish without fault on the part of the hirer, it perishes to the owner, and the hirer is sufficiently discharged of his obligation if he have taken reasonable care of it. But if the subject of the contract be not restored in like good condition as that in which it was received, there is a certain burden of proof laid on the hirer. He must shew the cause of the injury or death, and at least produce prima facie proof that the cause was one for which he was not responsible." And Lord Gifford says the same burden lies on all parties who, under any other contract, get the entire use, custody, and control of another person's property.

"The point is narrow, as the direct evidence is that the defender was driving carefully, and with a tight rein, and as Mr Begg's surmise that the horse fell asleep is inconsistent with his evidence that it was driven at a fair pace until within three hundred or four hundred yards of the spot where it fell, but I cannot hold that the defender has acquitted himself of the burden thrown on him. There is nothing to account for the horse falling. The road was practically level, there was no stone in the neighbourhood, and the horse's feet were soled with leather so that a stone would not so probably cause it to stumble. Nor has the defender attempted to prove that the horse was liable to fall, or that a horse will fall without cause if driven with proper care."

† "NOTE.—This is certainly a narrow case in which to apply against the defender the general rule of law which presumes fault on the part of a borrower who returns in an injured condition the subject which he has borrowed, and lays on him a certain burden of proof in order to overcome that presumption. In the result, however, on a consideration of the evidence, I am not prepared to differ from the view which the Sheriff-substitute has taken. The horse apparently was not given to stumble, there was no stone on the road where he fell, and it is difficult to suggest a cause for his falling apart from some fault on the part of the defender, who was driving him. . . . I think that, as the authorities stand in the law of Scotland on the subject of burden of proof in such cases, the defender has not discharged himself of the onus thrown upon him, and he must be held liable for the damages."

<sup>1</sup> Pyper v. Thomson, Feb. 4, 1843, 5 D. 498, 15 Scot. Jur. 256; Pullars v. Walker, July 13, 1858, 20 D. 1238, 30 Scot. Jur. 742; Wilson v. Orr, Nov. 22, 1879, 7 R. 266.

fully driven, and there was no evidence to the contrary. If that evidence was believed (and none doubted it) the onus was discharged. There was no authority for saying that there was an onus on the defender to prove the special cause of the accident, but even if there were, the previous history of the horse, which disclosed that it was weak in the shoulder, was sufficient to explain the horse's fall.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender was bound to do more than to prove that he had used reasonable care. He must shew the special cause of the accident.<sup>1</sup> He had failed to do that. There was no loose stone on the road over which the horse could have stumbled, and unless there was something of that kind to account for the stumble, the only explanation available was that the defender was driving carelessly.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the defender Mr Strang borrowed the pursuer's horse on the 27th of May 1887 for the purpose of driving over from Hamilton to a place called Blackwood, a distance of nine miles, and back again. It was suggested that the loan was not entirely gratuitous, because there was some expectation that Mr Begg, who was to accompany Mr Strang in his drive, might become purchaser of the horse, but I think that is not sufficiently established. I am disposed to take it that the loan was entirely gratuitous upon the part of the defender. In that case the transaction resolves itself into a simple contract of commodate, and that being one of the nominate contracts there are certain conditions implied in it whether they are expressed or not. Now, one of these conditions undoubtedly is that the thing lent is not to be used except for the express purpose for which it is lent; and secondly, that in using the article for the purpose for which it was lent the borrower shall use reasonable care. There is what may be called an incidental condition of the contract also, which is rather to be gathered from decisions of the Court than from anything in the essence of the contract, viz.,—that if the article is returned in a damaged condition there is an onus on the borrower to shew that the damage did not arise through his fault. It is argued that the onus is heavier than that, and that he is bound to shew what was the specific cause from which the injury arose. I am not disposed to decide that question, because I do not think there is any necessity to do so. We have, I think, sufficient evidence to shew that reasonable care was used by Mr Strang in dealing with this horse. We have on that point the testimony of Mr Strang, and of the gentleman who was driving with him. I do not think that anyone has said that their evidence is not reliable, and, as far as I can see, it is most fairly and frankly given. Their evidence amounts to this, that in driving to Blackwood and back Mr Strang, who was acquainted with horses, and had quite enough skill to drive this horse safely, did use reasonable care. The horse certainly was not over-driven; on the contrary, Mr Strang drove it very discreetly, if the evidence is to be believed. Now, there is no counter evidence on this point, and I agree with a remark made by Lord Mure in the course of the argument that in a district such as that in question if there had been anything of the nature of reckless driving someone would have noticed it, and been able to give evidence about it. No such evidence, however, has been adduced. I think there is sufficient evidence then for us to say that reasonable care was taken.

No. 41.

Dec. 6, 1888.

Bain v.

Strang.

<sup>1</sup> Robertson v. Ogle, June 23, 1809, Fac. Coll.; Wilson v. Orr, 7 R. 266.

No. 41.

Dec. 6, 1888.
Bain v.
Strang.

Still the fact remains that the horse was brought back with broken knees. There is no doubt that he did come down on the road, and that he broke his knees, and that his value was thereby lessened. It appears to me, however, that the fall of the horse is quite to be accounted for by looking at its previous history, and, therefore, I need not go into an inquiry as to whether in law the defender is bound to prove what was the immediate cause of the accident. I find that the horse had undoubtedly previous to this shewn a certain amount of weakness in the shoulder. Mr Hamilton, a veterinary surgeon, who attended the horse on one occasion, says,—“Cross.—I attended the horse once while with Mr Bain. It was very shortly after Mr Bain purchased it. He was then suffering from a little over-exertion. He was a good while in the stable. We found it necessary to blister him, and until the marks of the treatment had gone away I think he was not sent out. That would be about six weeks. We blistered him on the shoulder. It was not a case of slipping the shoulder. Shoulder-slipping is a very different matter. I could not confuse the two. I do not think that ailment depreciated the value of the horse after he got better. It was a sprain on the muscles from too long a journey by a young horse, and I believe the muscles would be as good as ever. I had the horse a fortnight or three weeks before I sold it to Mr Bain.” Again Mr Bain himself says,—“While I had the horse he had no other accident. Four or five months after my purchase, he was attended by Mr Hamilton, the veterinary surgeon. He was lame. I do not know the cause. He was attended in our own stable. He was three to four weeks lame. I never heard such a thing that the illness was from slipping the shoulder. I do not know what slipping the shoulder is. I am aware there was a dispute as to the lameness. Some said it was in the foot; others said it was in the shoulder. Mr Hamilton said at the time he could not understand where the horse had got lame, but it must have occurred by pulling too hard, or something of that kind. Mr Hamilton operated upon the shoulder.” The pursuer’s brother says,—“The horse once went lame with a stone in its foot. That was about the beginning of the year. It was in the stable another time for some weeks, but Mr Hamilton, veterinary surgeon, said it was only from the straining of some muscles. I have also seen it going lame from a shoe being put on too tight. It does come to this that while my brother had the horse, we had frequently to complain of it going lame. It seemed to be an unfortunate horse in that respect, but there was nothing at all wrong with itself. For a month or two before the accident it was shod with leather pads on its soles. From the fact that it was rather big in the frog of the foot, stones got in, and Mr Copeland, the shoer, advised padding to prevent this.” “Re-examined.—Any time it went lame, it was caused by improper shoeing.” And lastly, Mr Cran, a horse-dealer, says,—“I had seen the horse before, and I thought he had been what we call ‘junked’ in the fore,—that is, the muscles strained. It was not a slipped shoulder. It was just general weakness of the fore parts. I did not examine the horse particularly.” On this evidence I do not think it possible to doubt that there was a certain weakness in the shoulder of the horse, and also that it had suffered a good deal from bad shoeing, the effects of which are apt to be permanent if frequently repeated. Now, these two things together are, I think, quite sufficient to account for the horse coming down, and therefore it is I do not think it necessary to decide the question as to onus to which I have referred. On these grounds I think the decision of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute must be reversed.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion, and concur in what your Lordship has said as to the rule of law which is applicable to such cases as the present, viz, that it must be shewn that the borrower used reasonable care in his treatment of the article borrowed. Now, the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute both seem to have thought that Mr Strang was driving carefully when the accident happened, and I see no reason for doubting the accuracy of the evidence given by him, and by the friend who was driving with him; and, assuming that evidence to be correct, I do not see where proof of fault or of want of reasonable care is to be found. As has been pointed out by your Lordship, we have not to go far for an explanation of the cause of the accident. For there is a considerable body of evidence to shew that this horse was weak in the shoulder and tender in his forefeet, and it is proved that he was several times lame, and on one occasion for six weeks, after he belonged to the pursuer. This ailment was not exactly what is known as slipping the shoulder, but it seems to have been something of that kind; and the probability I think is that it was some sudden attack of pain in that quarter which made the horse stumble, and that certainly cannot be attributed to want of care on the part of the defender. I think the interlocutors appealed against should be recalled.

No. 41.

 Dec. 6, 1888.
 Bain v.
 Strang.

LORD SHAND.—The law applicable to this case was, I think, fully appreciated and expressed by the Sheriff-substitute in the finding contained in his interlocutor. The difficulty in the case lies in the application of the law to the facts. Where a horse, hired or lent, is taken out sound and brought back damaged, there is an onus on the borrower to shew that the injury was not caused through his fault, and that it was sustained notwithstanding all reasonable care on his part. The Sheriff-substitute has found that the defender has not discharged that onus, and the Sheriff has adhered to that judgment; but I think with your Lordship that the defender has proved that he used reasonable care in the use of the horse. He and the gentleman who was with him both say that the horse was driven carefully, and not too fast. He examined the spot where the accident occurred, and he could find no loose stone to account for the horse stumbling. Now, the Sheriff founds his opinion that reasonable care was not used, and that the accident was caused by "some fault" in driving, on the mere circumstance that no other direct cause for the horse falling has been shewn. I do not think the evidence warrants this inference, which is directly negatived by the evidence of the defender and his friend, whose account of the accident otherwise is accepted without question. Horses will at times stumble or slip where the cause cannot be certainly ascertained.

But further, there is evidence that there was a certain amount of weakness in the horse's shoulder, and that, to my mind, sufficiently accounts for the accident. If we join to this the fact that the horse had, up to the time of the accident, been regularly driven in a four-wheeled cart or van, and had on this occasion been driven (with the pursuer's knowledge) in a two-wheeled vehicle, necessarily throwing more weight on the forelegs of the horse, I think we have an ample explanation of the accident. I therefore concur with your Lordship in thinking that we must sustain this appeal.

LORD ADAM.—I agree that when any article of property is borrowed in an uninjured condition and is returned damaged there is an onus on the borrower to shew that he exercised all reasonable care in the use of it. There is no

No. 41.

Dec. 6, 1888.
Bain v.
Strang.

further onus on him, I think. If he satisfies the Court on that point, then he is free from the consequences of any accident. That being so, the question is whether the defender here has taken all reasonable care. Now, if the evidence of Mr Strang and Mr Begg is believed, I think there can be no doubt that such care was taken. It will be observed that neither of the Sheriffs throw any doubt on the reliability of those witnesses, and it is difficult to read their evidence without seeing that they have given a very straightforward account of the affair. If that is so, it is, I think, conclusively shewn that reasonable care was exercised in driving the horse. It is, however, suggested that that is not enough, inasmuch as the defender has not proved the specific cause of the accident. It is not, perhaps, necessary to decide whether there is any such onus on the defender, but it occurs to me that even though a borrower cannot prove any specific cause, yet if he satisfies the Court that he took all reasonable care, he is entitled to absolvitor. The Sheriff seems to decide the cause, not on the ground that a specific cause must be proved, but on the ground that no specific cause having been proved, it is to be presumed that the horse was not being driven carefully when the accident occurred. Even if we knew nothing of the previous history of the horse, I should not have been disposed to draw that conclusion. Anyone who knows anything about horses knows that even the best horse, although carefully driven, will on occasion make a mistake and come down. But here we have it further proved that this horse had been three times previously lame while in the pursuer's possession, and Mr Cran, the horse-dealer in whose possession it had been for some time, says there was a general weakness of the fore parts. This is enough to account for the accident; and if it is necessary to find any special cause for the accident, I agree that it is to be found in the previous history of this horse.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the pursuer's horse was injured while on loan to the defender, but find that the defender has proved that he used reasonable care in using the horse, and that the accident and injury were not caused by fault of the defender: Therefore assoilzie," &c.

W. R. PATRICK, Solicitor—RHIND, LINDSAY, & WALLACE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

MISS A. M. HAMILTON, Appellant.—Sir Charles Pearson—Baxter.
GORDON KENMURE HARDIE AND OTHERS (Hardie's Executors), Respondents.—J. A. Reid.

Executor—Confirmation—Proof of domicile—Act 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 56, sec. 9—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 41.—The executors-nominate of a deceased Scotsman who had died in England after residing there for many years applied for confirmation in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, in which county there was heritage belonging to the deceased. They produced an affidavit, in terms of the 41st section of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876,* to the effect that the deceased was a domiciled Scotsman at the date of

* The 41st section of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, provided,—"Where, under the provisions of the 9th and subsequent sections of the Act 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 56, . . . it shall be desired to include in the inventory of the personal estate of any person dying domiciled in Scotland personal estate situated in England or Ireland, it shall not be necessary to have a special proceeding before the Sheriff with the view to his pronouncing therein an interlocutor finding that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland, that fact shall be set forth in the affihis death. Confirmation was objected to by a person who alleged that she was one of the testator's next of kin, and that the deceased died domiciled in England, where, accordingly, the will ought to have been proved. She stated further that the testamentary deed was liable to reduction on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. Held that no ground had been set forth to justify the Court in interfering with the granting of confirmation.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

GAVIN HARDIE of Lancefield, near Glasgow, was born in Glasgow in 1806, passed at the Scottish Bar, and went to London sometime after 1833. He afterwards resided continuously in England, dying at Ealing, near London, on 25th May 1888, aged eighty-one years.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

He left a disposition and deed of settlement, dated 24th February 1888, appointing Gordon Kenmure Hardie, M.D., Ealing, Major Henry Robert Hardie, Torquay, and John Haswell, of Vienna, to be his executors. He further conveyed his whole estate to these gentlemen, share and share alike, under the burden of two small legacies. The total amount of his personal estate, as appearing from the inventory, was about £25,000. The ground-annuals over Lancefield were valued at £3600 a-year. The deed was drawn by a Scottish conveyancer, and was executed according to the forms of both countries.

The executors-nominate applied for confirmation in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, one of them making affidavit to the effect that the deceased died at Ealing, "where he was temporarily residing, though domiciled in Glasgow, Scotland, upon 25th May 1888, leaving neither widow nor children"; and that he had heritable estate in Scotland.

Thereafter Miss A. M. Hamilton, London, lodged a caveat, and, in the objections which she put in, she stated that, being a granddaughter of an aunt of the testator (a relationship which she traced), she was one of his next of kin; and averred,—(Stat. 3) "The testator had no domicile in Scotland, and for many years previous to 1852 resided in Blackheath, near London. In or about the year 1852 the testator's wife died, and the testator thereupon made a will in England, and according to English form, which, it is believed, conferred substantial benefits upon the objector, and which had never been revoked or altered until the making of the settlement now founded on. The objector is making inquiries both in the United Kingdom and in Australia which she believes will result in the discovery of this will. After the death of his wife the testator continued to reside at Blackheath with his wife's mother until her death some years afterwards. The testator subsequently resided for several years in Piccadilly, then in Queen Street, and afterwards in Doughty Street, all in London, until the date of the events narrated in the next paragraph." (Stat. 4) "In the year 1882 the testator informed the objector, in a letter now in her possession, that he had been invited to spend a few days at Ealing, near London, at the house of Mr davit to the inventory, and it being so set forth therein shall be sufficient warrant for the Sheriff-clerk to insert in the confirmation, or to note therein, and sign a statement that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland; and such statement shall have the same effect as a certified copy interlocutor finding that the deceased person died domiciled in Scotland . . ."

The 9th section of the Act 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 56, provided,—“From and after the date aforesaid it shall be competent to include in the inventory of the personal estate and effects of any person who shall have died domiciled in Scotland any personal estate or effects of the deceased situated in England or Ireland, or both; provided that the person applying for confirmation shall satisfy the Commissary, and that the Commissary shall by his interlocutor find, that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland, which interlocutor shall be conclusive evidence of the fact of domicile.”

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

Gordon Kenmure Hardie, one of his trustees and executors, during that gentleman's absence. The testator was at the time advanced in years, very deaf, and in weak health. From his entrance to Mr Gordon Kenmure Hardie's house it is believed that he never resided elsewhere, and he gradually fell under the influence and control of the said Gordon Kenmure Hardie, and latterly none of his relatives and friends were admitted to him, and the said Gordon Kenmure Hardie's servants were forbidden to let him see anyone. All correspondence addressed to the testator passed through Gordon Kenmure Hardie's hands, and were answered by him. Letters were sent to the said Gordon Hardie by the solicitors of the objector in December 1887 alleging unsoundness of mind of the testator, and requesting an interview to discuss the propriety of taking proceedings in lunacy, but the solicitors were never able to obtain such interview, although no denial was given to the alleged unsoundness of mind of the testator." (Stat. 5) "In this state of matters, and while feeble and incapable of managing his own affairs, the testator is said to have executed the settlement founded on. . . . The objector and her mother are entirely ignored, although the testator frequently told the objector's friends that they would be provided for, and being wholly dependent on the testator's bounty they are left in a distressed state." (Stat. 6) "Up till the year 1882 the testator was on the most friendly terms with the objector, who frequently visited him, and to whom he wrote affectionate letters, but from that time, owing to the events narrated in the two last articles, these visits were rendered difficult and at last all access to him was refused. For the last eighteen years he has allowed the objector's mother the sum of £480 per annum, and to the objector the sum of £90 per annum, besides presents from time to time." (Stat. 7) "The said settlement was made by the testator under duress. He was eighty-one years of age, was not of testamentary capacity and had been for some time of weak intellect." (Stat. 8) "Over £20,000 of the inventory is situated in England, and the objector maintains that as the domicile was there the inventory should have been returned there. She is prepared to prove her allegations there, and she doubts not that said settlement will be set aside." (Stat. 9) "The objector and her witnesses are in London. The settlement was made near London. If her objections are sustained it will then be incumbent on the respondents to prove the validity of said settlement where the facts are best known, and where the witnesses are. The objector believes that the ends of justice will be sacrificed if confirmation is granted here. She has already lodged a caveat in the proper Court in London. If confirmation is granted here and the settlement quashed there, a conflict may arise, which ought not to be. She is thus constrained to object to confirmation here, as it manifestly ought to have been expedited in England."

The executors-nominate in answer averred that the testator's domicile at the time of his death was in Lanarkshire, although admitting that he had resided in England for a number of years, and gave a general denial to the allegations of undue influence, &c. set forth in Statements 4, 5, 7, and 9. They admitted that the deceased had for some time before his death made a voluntary allowance to the objector's mother, and given presents to herself.

The objector pleaded;—(1) The objector being related to the testator in the manner stated, is entitled to insist in the present question. (2) The testator having been domiciled for many years in England, and upwards of four-fifths of his moveable estate being there, the title of the trusts should have been confirmed there. (3) The testator having been under duress when said settlement was executed, it is right and proper that validity should be tried where it was made. (4) The application for confirmation in this Court was incompetent in respect that the deceased did not die domiciled in the county of Lanark, and in respect that Edinburgh is the only Court in which confirmation is competent when the deceased dies domiciled furth of Scotland.

No. 42.
—
Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

On 20th July 1888, the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) granted warrant to the Clerk of Court to issue confirmation in favour of the executors-nominate.*

The objector appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for her;—(1) The Sheriff had gone wrong in assuming against her, as he must have done, that she was not one of the testator's next of kin. She averred that she was one. The Confirmation and Probate Act, 1858, sec. 9, required the person applying for a confirmation intended to include property in England to satisfy the Sheriff that the deceased was domiciled in Scotland.<sup>1</sup> Section 41 of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876 in changing the procedure, and substituting an affidavit for an interlocutor by the Sheriff with a finding as to the domicile, did not preclude the inquiry which was competent under the 9th section of the Act of 1858, the object of which was merely to obviate two inquiries, one in each part of the island. Confirmation ought not therefore to be granted without allowing the objector an opportunity of proving her allegations as to domicile. (2) Further, the allegations that the testator had been subjected to undue influence by the respondents were of the greatest importance, and if the objector succeeded in establishing an English domicile, the Courts of that country would allow her an opportunity of proving these allegations before probate was granted. This element ought to be taken into account by the Court.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) By the 9th section of the Act of 1858 the Sheriff's interlocutor as to domicile was final, and not subject to review, and the 41st section of the Act of 1876 was now substituted for that section. (2) It had been held that allegations which pointed to a reduction of the testamentary deed were not relevant to interfere with the granting of confirmation.<sup>2</sup> Besides, the objector had not set forth any interest in the estate. Her relationship to the deceased, as set forth by herself, was not clear.

At advising,—

Lord PRESIDENT.—The deceased Mr Gavin Hardie, who died on 25th May last, executed in February of this year a will in the Scottish form, which was also attested in the English form, he being then resident at Ealing, near London. Under the authority of the Act of 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. cap. 56), confirmation of that settlement was applied for in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire by the executors-nominate of the deceased. By section 9 of that Act, it is provided that "from and after the date aforesaid it shall be competent to include in the inventory of the personal estate and effects of any person who shall have died domiciled in Scotland any personal estate or effects of the deceased situated in England or Ireland, or both; provided that the person applying for confirmation * NOTE.—The deed of settlement of Gavin Hardie is executed in the Scotch form, and is ex facie valid. In it the deceased describes himself as of Lancefield, his origin is Scotch, and the bulk of his property appears to be in Scotland. The objector does not appear to be one of the next of kin, and she has therefore no title or interest to oppose confirmation. In these circumstances, I see no reason for refusing to grant warrant to confirm the executors-nominate."

<sup>1</sup> Alexander's Commissary Practice (1859 edn.), 190, 191.

<sup>2</sup> Grahame v. Bannerman, Feb. 28, 1822, 1 S. 362.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

shall satisfy the Commissary, and that the Commissary shall by his interlocutor find, that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland, which interlocutor shall be conclusive evidence of the fact of domicile."

That section, in so far as regards the finding as to the domicile of a deceased party, is altered by the Act of 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), for "amending the law relating to the administration of justice in civil causes in the Sheriff Courts." The 41st section of that Act provides as follows,—“Where, under the provisions of the 9th and subsequent sections of the Act 21 and 22 Vict. cap. 56, . . . it shall be desired to include in the inventory of the personal estate of any person dying domiciled in Scotland personal estate situated in England or Ireland, it shall not be necessary to have a special proceeding before the Sheriff with the view to his pronouncing therein an interlocutor finding that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland. That fact shall be set forth in the affidavit to the inventory, and it being so set forth therein shall be sufficient warrant for the Sheriff-clerk to insert in the confirmation, or to note therein, and sign a statement that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland; and such statement shall have the same effect as a certified copy interlocutor finding that the deceased person died domiciled in Scotland. . . .” Whatever one may think of the change introduced by that Act, we are bound to give effect to it. At the same time, it appears to me that the practice which is substituted in the Act of 1876 for the provision in the former Act is a somewhat loose one, but we must take it as it is.

In the present case the affidavit which accompanies the inventory contains the required statement to the effect that the deceased was a domiciled Scotsman, and the Sheriff-clerk has proceeded accurately. Accordingly the provisions of the statutes have been fully complied with by the persons applying for confirmation.

But the peculiarity of the case is that a lady has appeared to resist the granting of the confirmation, alleging that she is one of the testator's next of kin, and also, although this allegation is of a very vague nature, that the deceased had executed a previous will, under which she took benefit, whereas under the present she takes none. There is a further allegation that the deceased was not a domiciled Scotsman at the date of his death. The question is, what is to be done under these circumstances.

The will, which contains a nomination of executors, is ex facie valid and effectual, but the objector says it is liable to reduction on the ground of the incapacity of the testator, and of undue influence. The application for confirmation has now been going on for six months, and no proceedings have as yet been taken to set aside the will of this year, and if that allegation stood alone I do not think there can be any doubt that we should disregard it. Loose statements such as are made here can never interfere with the confirmation of executors-nominate. There is authority to that effect in the case of Grahams v. Bannerman and Others, 1 S. 403, where it was held that the mere proposing by way of statement, in a petition for confirmation, of averments in support of a reduction of the testamentary deed cannot stop the application for confirmation.

Whether, in view of the other allegations which are set forth by the objector we should take a different course, is matter for consideration. But I do not see my way to stop the confirmation after fully considering all the circumstances. The allegations which the objector makes about the domicile are not very satisfactory. That Gavin Hardie, the testator, was a Scotsman by origin, and therefore that his domicile of origin was Scottish, is admitted. The allegation that one would look for in these circumstances is not a mere assertion that there was an English domicile at the date of death. There should be a further allegation that there was a change of domicile, and a statement as to how and when that change took place. As we have had occasion to remark lately (Steel v. Steel, 15 R. 896), a change of domicile is not very easily brought about, and there must be a clear indication of intention to change his domicile by the gentleman whose domicile of origin is said to be lost. That is an observation which occurred to me early in the case. No doubt the statement which the objector makes to the effect that she is one of the next of kin of the deceased must be taken to be made in good faith. But she has not applied for confirmation either here or anywhere else.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

Upon the whole matter I cannot see any definite or intelligible ground upon which we can stand between the respondents and their right to the appointment of executors-nominate. It is not as if there had been an allegation that they were impecunious or insolvent. It is true that they are not within the jurisdiction of the Court. But by expediting confirmation in Scotland to a domiciled Scotsman they have subjected themselves to the jurisdiction of this Court, and the effect of their being themselves domiciled Englishmen is thus neutralised.

I am therefore for adhering to the Sheriff's interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—I do not see my way to any other result in this case than that proposed by your Lordship. The domicile of the deceased was ex facie Scottish, his will, although executed in England, appears to have been made in Glasgow, and he was proprietor of the estate of Lancefield in that neighbourhood. In these circumstances his executors-nominate presented a petition for confirmation to the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, and all the ordinary requisites have been complied with. A caveat was lodged by a party who alleged that she was one of the next of kin of the deceased, but she did not present any competing petition for confirmation. It is, however, objected on her behalf that it was inexpedient, if not incompetent, for the executors to make this application, as the deceased had been long resident in England, and had died, as she avers, a domiciled Englishman; and it is maintained that steps ought to have been taken to obtain confirmation in England, because it would be more convenient for the objector to raise the question of the deceased's capacity to make a will in the Courts of that country than in Scotland. But that does not appear to me to be a ground for stopping a confirmation, the proceedings in which are ex facie regular and valid, more especially in a case where six months have elapsed since the death of the deceased and the objector has not taken any steps to obtain a reduction of the testamentary deed. As to whether, if she had taken such steps, we should have been warranted in sitting proceedings in the confirmation, I give no opinion. But in the circumstances, as they stand, I do not think any case has been made out for interfering.

LORD SHAND.—The course proposed by the appellant here would lead to the introduction of a novelty. It is maintained that the Court ought to allow a proof of the domicile of the deceased, necessarily involving the examination of a number of witnesses, and it may be an expensive and protracted inquiry, as preliminary to the question of granting confirmation. There is no precedent,

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1888.
Hamilton v.
Hardie.

so far as I know, for such a course, and looking to the fact that by our law the effect of confirmation is merely to give a title to the executors to administer the estate of the deceased, and that they are liable to an action not only of accounting but also to have the deed set aside, I do not think the contention is a reasonable one, nor such as we can give effect to. The purpose of the appellant, as appears from the record, is to compel the respondents to go to England for confirmation, because in that way she would obtain an incidental advantage—it being necessary, it is said, according to the practice prevailing there, that the validity of the will be proved before probate is granted, and open to the appellant to appear and be heard on that question. In this country the practice is to give confirmation—subject to any challenge of the will at a future time.

That being the nature of the question which is raised by the appellant, I have come to the conclusion that she has not made out her case. The respondents' affidavit is in form and substance complete, and accordingly the Sheriff was entitled to proceed upon it on that footing. The whole proceedings being ex facie valid and regular, the executors-nominate were prima facie entitled to have confirmation. There is, no doubt, this peculiarity in regard to the position of executors-nominate, that they are by statute relieved from having to find caution. And if in this or in any other case there was an obvious objection to the will, and that objection was followed up by the bringing of an action of reduction to set it aside, and if the executors-nominate applying for confirmation were persons of no means, who might perhaps dissipate the estate after getting possession of it, then I should say that the Court should, in such special circumstances, stop the granting of confirmation, and might appoint a judicial factor on the estate who would be bound to find security. But it is not said that the present respondents are impecunious, or that there is any danger of the estate being lost. On the contrary, they appear to be persons who are thoroughly responsible, and who will be quite able to account for their intromissions with the estate.

Then in regard to the point which was strongly urged as a justification of her opposition to confirmation, that the appellant would be able to have the will set aside at less expense in England than here, it seems to me to be still open to her to bring her action in England, notwithstanding the confirmation of the executors. Two of these executors-nominate are resident in England, and subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts; and accordingly these Courts would, I cannot doubt, entertain proceedings at her instance.

It is a somewhat remarkable feature of the case, which seems to call for some explanation, that the deceased seems to have paid the objector and her mother sums amounting to £570 per annum for many years down to the time of his death, and yet there is no provision for either of them in the will. Even if probate of a will has been granted in England, there must be many cases in which the deed has afterwards been rescinded, and many cases where the grounds of reduction have only come to be known after probate has been granted. Accordingly, even assuming that the appellant has a good claim to set the will aside, I do not think she will be in the least degree prejudiced by the granting of an administrative title to the respondents.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—ANDREW FLEMING, S.S.C.—Agents.

MICHAEL CHRISTISON PIGGOTT, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Jameson—R. L. Orr. No. 43.

THE GOVERNORS OF THE FETTES TRUST, Defenders (Respondents).

—Gloag—Maconochie.

Dec. 11, 1888.

Piggott v.
Governors of the Fettes
Trust.

School—Scheme under the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 59)—Summary dismissal of pupil.—The scheme for the administration of the Fettes College Endowment, which was issued under the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, by section 45, provides,—“Any boy shall be liable, at the discretion of the governors, to dismissal, and to forfeiture of any benefit derived from the endowment for such continued idleness, or breach of discipline, as shall, on report from the headmaster, disqualify him, in the opinion of the governors, for continuing a member of the college. Any boy may also be dismissed summarily for immorality or whenever, in the judgment of the headmaster, summary dismissal is necessary in the interests of the school. In all such cases the headmaster shall forthwith lay before the governors a full report upon the subject.”

Held that the headmaster of the college was acting within the powers conferred upon him by this section when he summarily dismissed from the college a foundationer whom the medical officers reported as suffering from an attack of leprosy, which, in their opinion, might be communicated to the rest of the school.

A SCHEME for the administration of the Fettes Endowment, Edinburgh, 2<sup>d</sup> Division. was issued under the “Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882,” Lord Fraser. and approved by order of Her Majesty in Council on 3d April 1886. I.

By section 45 of the scheme it is provided,—“Any boy shall be liable, at the discretion of the governors, to dismissal, and to forfeiture of any benefit derived from the endowment for such continued idleness, or breach of discipline, as shall, on report from the headmaster, disqualify him, in the opinion of the governors, for continuing a member of the college. Any boy may also be dismissed summarily for immorality or whenever, in the judgment of the headmaster, summary dismissal is necessary in the interests of the school. In all such cases the headmaster shall forthwith lay before the governors a full report upon the subject.”

On 17th and 18th July 1884, Michael Christison Piggott, residing in Glasgow, attended an examination at Fettes College of applicants for admission to the foundation. Being successful, he was admitted by the governors as a foundationer of the college on 19th September. On 4th June 1888, Piggott raised this action against the governors of the college for the sum of £500 for loss and damage sustained in consequence of his dismissal from the school in April 1887. He averred that by his admission as a foundationer he became entitled to free board and education for six years from the date of his admission, the estimated value of his board and education being £130 per annum.

The defenders averred that a few months after Piggott's admission suppurations appeared in his leg. He was sent to the sick-house, and the medical officers came to be of opinion that he was suffering from leprosy. As, however, they were of opinion that leprosy was not transmissible by mere personal contact, they did not consider it imperative to disclose to anyone the nature of his disease, as they thought such disclosure would have a disastrous effect on the boy's prospects. On the 7th April 1887, a skin disease, impetigo contagiosa, broke out in the school, and the medical officers, in these circumstances, considered it no longer safe to allow him to remain with the other boys, because they thought it was possible that he might communicate the leprosy to them through the medium of the other skin disease. They therefore informed the headmaster of the state of the facts, and the headmaster ordered him to leave the school.

The pursuer denied that he was suffering from leprosy, or that there

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1888.
Piggott v.
Governors of the Fettes
Trust.

was any danger to the other boys from his remaining in the school while the attack of eczema lasted, and averred that the defenders, or those for whom they were responsible, had acted illegally and unwarrantably and in violation of their contract with him; and that the headmaster had not complied with rule 45 of the scheme in respect he had not before dismissing the pursuer reported the matter to the governors, and they had not ordered or authorised the forfeiture of his foundation. They were bound in terms of their contract with him to give him board and education for the remaining period of three and a-half years, and their action was in breach of that contract.

The defenders answered that under rule 45 the headmaster was entitled to summarily dismiss the pursuer.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders being bound in terms of the contract libelled to provide the pursuer with board and education for a period of six years, and having failed to implement said contract, they are liable to compensate the pursuer for the loss thereby sustained. (3) The pursuer having been awarded a foundation and admitted to said institution, and thereafter expelled illegally and unwarrantably, and without fault on his part, the defenders are liable to compensate the pursuer as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) By the terms of section 45 of the scheme condescended on, the headmaster was entitled to dismiss the pursuer.

On 24th November the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.*

---

* "OPINION.—It is not necessary to define very strictly what is the nature of the relationship between the governors and youths whom the former have elected to the foundations of Fettes College. It is contended by the pursuer that, by his admission to the college as a foundationer, a contract was entered into between him and the governors which the latter could not terminate at their pleasure. Such a case is not presented for decision at present; and no opinion is therefore called for in regard to it. The pursuer of this action was admitted to the benefit of a foundation in September 1884. A scheme for the administration of the Fettes Endowment was approved, by order of Her Majesty in Council, on the 3d of April 1886. This scheme is applicable to all persons who had any right or privilege under the governing bodies in charge of Educational Endowments in Scotland, such as the Fettes College, at the time when the Act 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 59, was passed—(see section 14). Therefore, any rules laid down in that scheme are applicable to the present case. The 45th rule or section is as follows:—'Any boy shall be liable, at the discretion of the governors, to dismissal, and to forfeiture of any benefit derived from the endowment for such continued idleness, or breach of discipline, as shall, on report from the headmaster, disqualify him, in the opinion of the governors, for continuing a member of the college. Any boy may also be dismissed summarily for immorality, or whenever, in the judgment of the headmaster, summary dismissal is necessary in the interests of the school. In all such cases the headmaster shall forthwith lay before the governors a full report upon the subject.' This is not expressed with that clearness and precision that might have been expected in the circumstances of this endowment. The Lord Ordinary puts a different construction upon that rule from that put upon it by the headmaster of Fettes College. It is stated by the defenders upon record that the headmaster told the pursuer to leave the institution for the reasons assigned in the record. This proceeding on the part of the headmaster was ultra vires. The 45th rule of the scheme gave him no authority to order the pursuer away from the institution. The only persons who could do so were the governors, acting, no doubt, upon the report of the headmaster. The first part of the rule states that 'any boy shall

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—He had been illegally dismissed by the headmaster, whose powers were in this respect unequivocally expressed in rule 45 of the scheme of the college. Under that rule the power of summary dismissal, given to him in certain contingencies, was only to be exercised after a report made by him to the governors, which he had here failed to make. At common law a headmaster had no such

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1888.
Piggott v.
Governors of the Fettes
Trust.

be liable, at the discretion of the governors, to dismissal, and to forfeiture of any benefit derived from the endowment for continued idleness or breach of discipline.' And then the rule proceeds to say that 'any boy may also be dismissed summarily for' two causes mentioned, viz., immorality, or whenever there are circumstances rendering it 'necessary in the interests of the school.' Dismissed by whom? Clearly by the same parties as were to dismiss according to the first part of the rule, viz., the governors. No doubt the circumstances (other than immorality) must be according to the judgment of the headmaster; but the ultimate judges of the matter are the governors, and the rule concludes with these words,—'In all such cases the headmaster shall forthwith lay before the governors a full report upon the subject.' The rule is very inartistically expressed, but the Lord Ordinary cannot hold it to mean that the headmaster should have the absolute power of dismissal whenever he considered that the interests of the college required that a particular boy should be sent away. It would be a very extraordinary thing to confer such a power as this on any headmaster, when the first part of the rule limits the discretion of the governors to dismissal for continual idleness and breach of discipline. The ambiguity arises from not embodying in one sentence the statement that they could dismiss for idleness, breach of discipline, and when it was required for the interest of the school.

"But, practically, the governors have made the dismissal in the present case according to the statements in the record. All difficulty is obviated upon this head by the governors coming forward and adopting and defending the action of the headmaster. They do not plead that the headmaster acted without their authority or subsequent approval, and therefore that they are not liable in damages. They adopt what he has done, and the Lord Ordinary is willing to hold that this subsequent adoption is equivalent to their approval of the conduct of the headmaster, as if it had been given before the dismissal of the pursuer.

"Now, then, the only other point in the case is, whether or not, assuming that there was no absolute right of dismissal at pleasure, was there sufficient ground in the circumstances of this case to bring it within rule 45? The boy was ill with leprosy when he entered the institution, although at that time the disease remained dormant. It broke out at intervals afterwards, and the headmaster said nothing about it, not being willing to do anything that might blight prospects of the pursuer as a student in the college. This was acting with all kindness for the youth, and no one can blame the headmaster for taking a course at once considerate and humane. But, then, at the time that the pursuer was dismissed, his leprosy again came to the front; and there being an epidemic of other disease among the boys, it was absolutely necessary to take action so as to prevent the whole of them becoming lepers by contagion. A learned argument was submitted to the Lord Ordinary by the pursuer's counsel to the effect that leprosy was not contagious. Upon this matter the Lord Ordinary is incapable of pronouncing any opinion; but the existence of such a disease in the midst of a community of boys like that at Fettes College was calculated to create such terror as to impair the usefulness of the institution, and therefore the headmaster (approved of afterwards by the governors) was justified in sending the pursuer away. But here, again, the Lord Ordinary must add that he is not reviewing the action of the governors or the headmaster upon the merits. Their bona fides is not impugned. They had a right to dismiss a foundationer when they thought it was 'necessary in the interests of the school.' Having come to the conclusion that it was necessary, no Court of law can, in the absence of an averment of want of bona fides, interfere with their judgment."

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1888.
Piggott v.
Governors of
the Fettes
Trust.

power unless he could shew a just and reasonable cause.<sup>1</sup> The Lord Ordinary had assumed that this existed. The only possible cause, however, was the medical opinion given him as to the boy's state of health, and this the pursuer was prepared to shew was erroneous. The view of the Lord Ordinary that the governors had homologated the action of the headmaster was unsound. What was originally illegal in the headmaster could not be made legal by their subsequent approval of it.

Counsel for the respondents was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer's case is a very unfortunate one. He seems to have been able by his own exertions to obtain admission as a foundationer in the Fettes College Endowment, though, unfortunately for him, he has not obtained the full benefits of his success. It appears that he was afflicted from time to time with something of the nature of a suppuration in one of his legs, which might or might not have a serious effect on the safety of the rest of the school, and that, on an outbreak of eczema occurring, the headmaster came to the conclusion that he could not allow the pursuer to remain any longer in the college, and accordingly dismissed him. It is not alleged that the headmaster took this course otherwise than in consequence of the advice given him by the medical officers of the college, in accordance with which he was bound to act.

It is in these circumstances, then, that the question arises, What is the legal position of parties?

I have no doubt that it is the duty of the headmaster of a school, if so advised with reference to a pupil, to remove him, where he has power to do so, and where he has not that power it is his bounden duty to report the matter to those who have it.

The Lord Ordinary has indicated that his reading of the latter part of clause 45 of the endowment scheme of the college is, that the headmaster of the college has no power of dismissal, but merely a duty to report to the governors of the college, who, after considering the report, may dismiss the pupil. I think that that is an erroneous reading of the clause. I think that the words "any boy may also be dismissed summarily for immorality, or whenever, in the judgment of the headmaster, summary dismissal is necessary in the interests of the school," plainly mean that the right and duty of exercising this authority rests with the headmaster, as the officer who alone can deal summarily with such a matter. I am also of opinion that the concluding words, "in all such cases the headmaster shall forthwith lay before the governors a full report upon the subject," do not mean that he is to lay a full report before them prior to exercising the power of dismissal, but that, after he has exercised the power, he shall lay before them a full report in order that they may review it. The dismissal is his dismissal, and is summary dismissal in the interests of the school. That is my reading of the 45th clause, and if I am right it is unnecessary to consider the question whether—the action taken by the headmaster being beyond his powers—it is to be held as homologated by the subsequent action of the governors. Had it been necessary however to determine that, I think it would not have been difficult to arrive at an opinion favourable to the dismissal.

<sup>1</sup> Fitzgerald v. Northcote and Another, 1865, 4 Foster and Finlason, 656; Hutt and Another v. Governors of Hayleybury College and Others, June 19, 1878, 4 Times Law Rep. 623.

I am clear that the power lay with the headmaster, and there is nothing to shew that he exercised it otherwise than in bona fides. It would not, in my opinion, be competent to send the proceedings of the medical officers, on which they made their report to the headmaster, to a jury in order to have it determined whether they had come to a right conclusion or the reverse. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1888.
Piggott v. Governors of the Fettes Trust.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree in your Lordship's construction of the 45th clause of the scheme of endowment. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the clause is not expressed so clearly as it might be, and he puts a different construction upon it from that of the headmaster.

I think the clause is divided into two parts—the first part provides that any boy shall be liable, at the discretion of the governors, to dismissal and forfeiture of any benefit derived from the endowment, for such continued idleness, or breach of discipline, as shall on report from the headmaster disqualify him, in the opinion of the governors, for continuing a member of the college. Under this part of the clause, the headmaster may report to the governors with regard to any boy for continued idleness—if he is of opinion that his conduct is such that he ought to be dismissed, and if the governors, after considering the report, concur they may dismiss him. The other part of the clause is,—“Any boy may also be dismissed summarily for immorality or whenever, in the judgment of the headmaster, summary dismissal is necessary in the interests of the school.” There is no reference to the governors, and a power of summary dismissal is given to the headmaster whenever, in his judgment, it is necessary in the interests of the school. The report which in that case he is required to make is regulated in these words,—“In all such cases the headmaster shall forthwith lay before the governors a full report upon the subject.” The headmaster's power of dismissal referred to in the second part of the clause is in contrast to the power referred to in the first—I think that this is the true reading of the clause, and it appears to me perfectly clear and precise.

This action is one of damages against the governors of the college for breach of contract. It is not a personal action at all. Any contract which existed between the pursuer and the governors must be according to the statutory scheme, and the pursuer complains that he was summarily dismissed by the headmaster, and that this dismissal was approved of by the governors, because it was believed that he was suffering from a disease which rendered his continued presence dangerous to the rest of the pupils. He avers that on inquiry it will be found that this belief was erroneous, and therefore that the defenders were guilty of breach of contract. I am of opinion that this is not a relevant ground for an action of damages at all. There is no charge of want of conscientiousness against anyone, and the case as presented is just that the medical officers of the college having informed the headmaster that it was no longer safe for the pursuer to be allowed to remain in the school, he summarily dismissed the pursuer, and thereafter submitted his report to the governors under the 45th clause. But then it is said that a legal wrong would be established if the pursuer could satisfy a jury that the medical officers were incorrect in their representations. That would lead to the funds of the college being subject to a claim of damages, to be determined in an action in which the question was whether the opinion or representations of the medical officers attached to the college were sound or not. I cannot listen to that for a moment. There may

No. 43.

Dec. 11, 1888.
Piggott v.
Governors of the Fettes
Trust.

possibly have been some mistake made, but all conscientious men are liable to make mistakes, and even in such cases there can be no question of legal wrong. I am therefore of opinion that we ought not to send the matter to a jury. I think it was according to the contract the right and duty of the headmaster to form a judgment on the matter, and to act upon it, just as it was the duty of the governors to interfere on the report being made to them, or to refrain from doing so, according as they deemed it right in their judgment to do either of these things.

I am therefore on the whole matter clearly of opinion that there has been no invasion of legal right, and no wrong done here, and that the action ought to be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 44.

Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

JAMES STEEL AND OTHERS (Robert Steel's Trustees), First Parties.—

R. L. Orr.

JAMES STEEL AND ROBERT STEEL, Second Parties.—Gloag—Fleming.

REV. WILLIAM WILLAN AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Balfour—

C. K. Mackenzie.

Succession—Vesting—Payment postponed till death of liferenters—Clause of survivorship.—A testator directed that the fee of the residue of his estate, including certain subjects liferented by his wife (who survived him), should be held by his trustees for behoof of his children in different proportions—the sons' provisions to be payable, to the extent of £2000, twelve months after the testator's death, and the remainder twelve months after the death of his widow, the daughters' provisions to be held for their liferent alimentary use alienably, and for the heirs of the body of each of them in fee, and failing any daughter without leaving heirs, her share to form part of the residue. The testator further directed that should any of his children die upwards of twelve months after his widow without issue, and any part of the shares of the estate in that event devolve on his sons, the trustees should pay the same to the sons as soon after the death of the persons so dying as might be convenient. It was further provided "that in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, leaving heirs of their bodies, the provisions of such deceasers, so far as unpaid to them, shall fall and devolve to the heirs of their bodies respectively, in place of their parents, and in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, without lawful issue, then the provisions of such deceasers, so far as unpaid, shall fall back into and make part of the residue of my estate divisible as aforesaid."

The widow died, her death being followed, nine years after, by that of one of the sons unmarried. On the subsequent decease of one of the daughters without issue, held that the fee of the share liferented by her did not vest until the term of payment, and that no part of it therefore belonged to the representatives of the deceased son.

Per the Lord President.—Where in a testamentary deed a fund is settled on the children of the testator for their liferent use alienably and their children, if any, in fee, whom failing, to another person or class of persons in absolute property, if the person or persons so called are known or the individuals composing the class are ascertained at the death of the testator, the fee will vest in them a morte testatoris, subject to defeasance in whole or in part in the event of the liferenters or any of them leaving issue; if they are not so known or ascertained, the fee will not vest until the occurrence of the event which will determine who are the persons called, or until the individuals composing the class are ascertained. No. 44.

Observations (per the Lord President) on the case of Haldane v. Murphy's Trustees, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269, and correction by his Lordship of the report of that part of his opinion in that case which dealt with the case of Bell v. Cheape, 7 D. 614. Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

ROBERT STEEL, merchant in Port-Glasgow, died on 2d December 1841, 1st Division.
B. survived by his wife, Mrs Jean M'Leish or Steel, who died on 16th November 1852, and by three sons and four daughters.

Mr Steel left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 25th December 1833, and codicil thereto, dated 28th July 1840. The testator disposed and conveyed to trustees therein mentioned his whole estate, heritable and moveable, in trust for the purposes therein mentioned. The deed contained this clause,—“In the sixth place, I hereby appoint my said trustees and their foresaids to hold the fee of the said subjects liferented by the said Mrs Jean M'Leish or Steel, and the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my said estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, subject to the option in favour of my sons after written, for behoof of the lawful children procreated of my body, in manner after mentioned, in the following proportions, viz. :—For and on account of each of my sons, four shares or portions, and for and on account of each of my daughters, three shares or portions of said residue,—that is to say, for every sum of £4 sterling set apart for a son a sum of £3 sterling shall be set apart for a daughter, with the exception and under the declarations and provisions after written; . . . . and I provide and appoint that the provisions hereby made in favour of my sons shall be payable to them as follows, viz, the sum of £2000 sterling, subject to the eventual deduction after mentioned, to each of my said sons upon the expiry of twelve months after my death, and the remainder upon the expiry of twelve months after their mother's decease; . . . . and I provide and appoint that the provisions hereby made on account of my daughters shall be held by my said trustees . . . . for behoof of my said daughters respectively, in liferent for their liferent alimentary use altogether of the annual proceeds of the capital of the said provisions, . . . . and for behoof of the heirs of the bodies of each of my said daughters respectively, . . . . in such proportions and under such conditions and restrictions as they, my said daughters respectively, shall appoint by a writing under their hands, which failing, equally among them in fee; and failing any of my said daughters without heirs of her body, then the share of such decessor or the residue thereof, so far as not disposed of under or by virtue of these presents, shall form part of the residue of my estate; . . . . and I provide and appoint that in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, leaving heirs of their bodies, the provisions of such decessors, so far as unpaid to them, shall fall and devolve to the heirs of their bodies respectively, in place of their parents, and in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions without lawful issue, then the provisions of such decessors, so far as unpaid, shall fall back into and make part of the residue of my estate divisible as aforesaid.”

By the codicil the testator entirely recalled the provisions made by him to one of his sons, named Robert, in the trust-disposition and settlement, and directed his trustees to hold and pay the same to his son William and his sisters, “rateably and proportionally, according to the other shares or portions of the residue of my estates before destined to them, and under the same conditions.” The codicil further provided,—“Should any of my children interested die upwards of twelve months after the death of my wife without leaving lawful issue, and any part of the shares of my estates before destined to them and their issue in that event devolve on my sons, I direct my trustees to pay the same to my two sons interested as soon after the death of the persons so dying as may be convenient."

No. 44.
Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

A deed of declaration and renunciation of the direction regarding Robert's share was after the truster's death granted by all the beneficiaries interested in the succession, and it was thus restored to an equal footing with those of the other brothers, on the narrative that the recall of Robert's provisions was not intended to be final.

William Steel, one of the sons, died unmarried on 27th April 1861, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 16th June 1854, under which his four sisters and their heirs were the residuary legatees. Mrs Elizabeth Hagart Steel or Johnstone having died in 1875 without issue, and Misses Catherine and Margaret Steel having both also died unmarried, a question arose with regard to the right to the fee of the shares of the residue which were liferented by them.

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court, in which the question was,—“Did a part of the fee of the shares of the testator's estate, liferented by Mrs Johnstone, Miss Catherine Steel, and Miss Margaret Steel, vest in the said William Steel at the testator's death, or otherwise, at a period prior to the death of the said William Steel, subject to defeasance in the event of the said liferentrics leaving issue, or was vesting postponed till the death of the said liferentrics respectively?” The parties to the case were (1) The trustees of Robert Steel, the truster; (2) James Steel and Robert Steel, the truster's two surviving children; and (3) the Reverend William Willan (husband of the truster's fourth daughter Jane, who had died in 1878 leaving issue) and others, the beneficiaries and trustees under William Steel's trust-disposition and settlement.

It was contended by the second parties, the surviving children of the testator, that William Steel had not a vested right in any part of the fee of the shares of the testator's estate liferented by his three sisters, that no part of the fee of the shares vested until the death of the liferentrics, and that accordingly the capital set free by their death should be divided among themselves and the family of Mrs Jane Steel or Willan in the proportions of four-elevenths to each of themselves, and three-elevenths to Mrs Willan's representatives.

It was contended by the third parties that the fee of the shares liferented by the testator's three daughters vested a morte testatoris, or at all events, on the expiration of twelve months after the date of the death of the testator's widow, subject to defeasance in the event of the liferentrics leaving issue; that therefore William Steel at the date of his death had a vested interest in a part of the fee of the shares of the testator's estate liferented by his three daughters, subject to defeasance in the event of their leaving issue.

Argued for the second parties;—There were three terms of payment contemplated by the truster; (1) twelve months after the truster's own death; (2) twelve months after his wife's death; and (3) at the death of any of the daughters more than a year after his wife's death. The term “provisions” in what may be called the survivorship clause covered everything to which the sons might at any time succeed under the deed, and was not to be restricted to the shares falling to them on the death of the truster and his wife. If that were not so, the other alternative was, that the fee of the daughters' shares would vest in the sons at the truster's death, subject to defeasance—while the fee of the sons' other provisions might never vest at all, e.g., in the case of a son who survived the truster, but died within twelve months afterwards. The proper construction of the provisions of the deed was that vesting was postponed until the term of payment in each case.<sup>1</sup> No. 44.

Argued for the third parties;—(1) Assuming there had been no clause of survivorship here, it was not necessary to distinguish the case from Steel's Trustees v. Steel,<sup>2</sup> Dec. 12, 1888. Bell v. Cheape,<sup>3</sup> nor to enter upon a criticism of Wannop's case,<sup>4</sup> because, upon the terms of the destination to the daughters in the present case, there was a primary gift of the fee to the sons, unless the contingency of the daughters leaving issue took their shares out of residue. The terms of the bequest were important. They were not "shall fall into residue," but "shall fall back into and make part of the residue of my estate." The case of Taylor<sup>5</sup> was a fortiori of the present. (2) The so-called survivorship clause did not suspend the vesting of the provisions liferented by the daughters. It had no reference to the accruing shares, and applied only to the original and primary provisions. The words "before receiving payment of their provisions" referred to the terms of payment before mentioned, i.e., in the case of the £2000, twelve months after the death of the truster, and in the case of the rest of the estate, twelve months after the widow's death.<sup>6</sup> The codicil provided for an omission in the settlement as to what would happen in the case of a daughter dying without issue more than twelve months after the widow's death. It supplied a code for the payment of the fee of a daughter's provisions at whatever time it might fall in, but it had really no bearing on the present case.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The settlement of the late Robert Steel of Port-Glasgow disposed of the residue of his estates as follows:—

1. The whole fee of residue, including subjects liferented by his widow, is to be held by his trustees for behoof of his children, in the proportions of four shares to each son and three shares to each daughter,—that is to say, for every sum of £4 set apart for a son a sum of £3 shall be set apart for a daughter.

2. The sons' provisions are to be payable to each of them, to the extent of £2000 twelve months after the testator's death, and the remainder twelve months after the widow's death.

3. The daughters' shares are to be held by the trustees for the liferent alimentary use alienably of the daughters, and for behoof of the heirs of the bodies of each of them respectively in fee, and failing any daughter without heirs of her body, the share of such decesser shall form part of the residue of the testator's estate.

There were three sons and four daughters, all of whom seem to have been of full age at the date of the settlement in 1833. But one of the sons having incurred his father's displeasure is cut off from his share of the succession by a codicil in 1840, which also contains this provision,—“Should any of my children interested die upwards of twelve months after the death of my wife

<sup>1</sup> M'Alpine, &c., March 20, 1883, 10 R. 837; Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269, Lord President, p. 278; Bell v. Cheape, May 21, 1845, 7 D. 614; Murray v. Gregory's Trustees, Jan. 21, 1887, 14 R. 368.

<sup>2</sup> Bell v. Cheape, 7 D. 614.

<sup>3</sup> Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269.

<sup>4</sup> Taylor, &c. v. Gilbert's Trustees, July 12, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 217; cf. also Lord v. Colvin, Dec. 7, 1860, 23 D. 111, 33 Scot. Jur. 55, and July 15, 1865, 3 Macph. 1083, 37 Scot. Jur. 568.

<sup>5</sup> Chalmers' Trustees, March 16, 1882, 9 R. 743; Snell's Trustees v. Morrison, March 20, 1877, 4 R. 709.

No. 44.

Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

without leaving lawful issue, and any part of the shares of my estate before destined to them and their issue in that event devolve upon my sons, I direct my trustees to pay the same to my two sons interested as soon after the death of the persons so dying as may be convenient." It is obvious that "children" at the outset of this clause must mean "daughters," and that the phrase "two sons interested," is explained by the exclusion of one of the three sons by a previous clause of the same codicil.

The testator died in 1841, and the widow in 1852. The son William died in 1861, leaving no issue, and was survived by all his brothers and sisters. The other two sons still survive. The daughters are all dead, and only one of them, Jane (Mrs Willan) left issue.

In these circumstances, and but for the effect of a clause in the settlement to which I have not yet adverted, I should have little difficulty in holding that, though William Steel died before any of his sisters, his testamentary dispositive would be entitled along with his surviving brothers or brother to a share of the part of the residue set free by the death of those of his sisters who died without issue, on the ground that the whole residue vested in the sons on the death of the testator, or at all events twelve months after the death of the widow, subject only to defeasance in so far as the daughters left issue.

I think the result of all the cases on this subject may be summarised thus: Where a fund is settled on daughters of the testator for their life or for their life or until they marry, and their children, if any, in fee, whom failing, to another person or other persons in absolute property, with no further destination, the vesting of the fee in the last-named person or persons will depend on these considerations,—whether the person so called to the succession, if only one, was a known and existing individual at the death of the testator, or if more than one, whether the persons so called were all of them known and existing at that date; or if the destination is to a class called by description, whether the individuals who constitute the class are ascertained at that date, or whether he or they cannot be known or ascertained till the death of the life-tenants or the occurrence of some other event. If the person or persons are not known, or the individuals who are to constitute the class are not ascertained at that date, the fee will not vest until the occurrence of the event which will determine who are the persons called or the individuals composing the class are ascertained. But, when the person or persons called are known, or the individuals composing the class are ascertained at the death of the testator, then the fee will vest in them a morte testatoris, subject to defeasance in whole or in part in the event of the life-tenants, or any of them, leaving issue.

There was a great division of opinion in the case of Haldane's Trustees, 9 Ret. 269, as to the construction of the settlement. But it appears to me that all the Judges, or almost all of them, assumed the soundness of the rule I have endeavoured to formulate. This is clearly shewn in the opinion of Lord Moncreiff (Justice-Clerk) who was one of the majority. His Lordship puts the question thus (p. 282),—"Does the testatrix mean by 'my own nearest heirs' those who are or may be 'my own nearest heirs' at her death, or those whom the trustees shall find to be 'my own nearest heirs in moveables' when the obligation comes to be fulfilled. If the first of these interpretations is the sound one, it would raise a very strong, probably a conclusive, presumption of the testator's intention that vesting was to take place at her own death; and if, on the other hand, the persons to whom the trustees are to pay the residue are those whom they shall find to be at the time of payment the nearest heirs of the testatrix in moveables, it is equally plain that the right cannot vest till the period of payment comes." No. 44.

Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

I am anxious to make it clear that the cause of the dispute in Haldane's Trustees, and of the difference of opinion among the Judges, was not any doubt as to the legal principle applicable to such cases, but turned entirely on the words of the particular deed which fell to be construed; because I think there was in the arguments in this case some evidence that the import and effect of that previous case has not been thoroughly appreciated or understood.

In connection with the report of the same case I am desirous of correcting what appears to be a serious blunder in a passage of my own opinion, on p. 278. My words, as reported, are,—“It cannot be disputed that if the residue of an estate is destined to A in liferent, and his issue in fee, and failing his leaving issue, then on the expiry of the liferent to B, no right vests in B till the death of the liferenter without issue. This was authoritatively settled in the case of Bell v. Cheape.” Now, this as it stands is not sound law, and nothing of the kind was settled in Bell v. Cheape. But the blunder consists in this, that after the words “on the expiry of the liferent to B,” there ought to be added, “and his heirs, executors, and assignees,” which makes the proposition good law, and truly represents the judgment in Bell v. Cheape, for that judgment proceeded on the ground that B's heirs and executors were called as conditional institutes after B, and were entitled to succeed in place of B if he predeceased the death of the liferenter and the term of payment. I am not at all prepared to ascribe the occurrence of this blunder to the reporters, for my opinion was in writing, and I do not doubt that the omission of the words occurred in the transcription of the manuscript.

The provisions of Mr Steel's deed of settlement, so far as I have hitherto considered them, point to one conclusion only, that the sons took a vested interest in the whole residue of the estate a morte testatoris, subject only to defeasance in the event of the daughters leaving issue. But there is a clause in a later part of the deed (p. 16 of the printed copy of the settlement), which throws a new light altogether on the intentions of the testator. It provides and appoints “that in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, leaving heirs of their bodies, the provisions of such deceasers, so far as unpaid to them, shall fall and devolve to the heirs of their bodies respectively in place of their parents, and in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, without lawful issue, then the provisions of such deceasers, so far as unpaid, shall fall back into and make part of the residue of my estate divisible as aforesaid.”

Both of the branches of this clause seem to me to be inconsistent with any vesting in the sons prior to the terms of payment of the different parts of their provisions, i.e., of the residue. I do not, of course, construe the words “before receiving payment” as referring to the fact of payment being made, but only to the time when payment ought to be made, or in other words, to the term or terms of payment specified in the deed.

But the plain meaning of the clause is that if a son dies before the arrival of the term of payment of any part of his provision, that part falls to his issue if he any has, as conditional institutes, and if he has no issue, then it falls back into the general residue of the testator's estate, and belongs to the residuary legatees who survive the term of payment.

No. 44.

Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees
v. Steel.

The result, in my opinion, is that William Steel's testamentary disponees are entitled to take all that became payable to him twelve months after the testator's death, and all that became payable to him twelve months after the death of his mother, because he survived these terms, but that they have no right or interest in any part of the residue, which became payable to the sons only after the said William Steel's death.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the result of your Lordship's opinion, and also in the grounds on which it is based.

LORD SHAND.—It seems to me that this case is not attended with any serious difficulty.

Several clauses of the deed of settlement and of the codicil have been referred to in the argument. So far as regards those contained in the codicil, they do not seem to me to have any bearing upon the question we have to determine. The question, I think, depends entirely upon the terms of the settlement itself. The provisions of that deed are as follows:—In the first place, the testator provides a liferent of a part of his estate to his widow if she should survive him, and the fee of the subjects so liferented, and “the whole rest, residue, and remainder” of his estates, he appointed his trustees to hold for behoof of his children in certain proportions, which have been already mentioned by your Lordship. There is therefore a provision of a liferent of part of the estate, and a clear destination of the fee to the children in certain proportions.

In regard to the shares of the residue destined to daughters, it is provided that they shall have a mere liferent of them, but that in the event of their leaving children, the children shall take the fee of the shares liferented by their mothers respectively, and failing children, then that the share of each daughter shall fall back into residue,—that is, shall belong to the sons, who accordingly have right in that case to an enlarged amount of the fee of the testator's estate. The only other provision which need be noticed is the provision that the sons' shares shall be paid to them at certain fixed dates—part twelve months after the testator's death, and part twelve months after their mother's death should she be the survivor.

If these provisions stood alone, I have no doubt that there would have been vesting of the fee a morte testatoris in the sons. For, so far as I have gone, the deed simply comes to this—and it is an ordinary case of testamentary provision—that there is a provision of a liferent to the testator's widow if she survive him, while the fee of the estate is to be held for the children, the daughters having a liferent only of their shares, with a fee to their children if any, and the sons having each a right of fee which would be enlarged by the death of a daughter or daughters without issue.

The only element which it might be suggested would postpone vesting is the mention of certain dates of payment. But it is settled that that does not suspend vesting. Accordingly I have no doubt that the fee would have vested a morte testatoris unless the clause to which your Lordship last adverted had the effect of suspending vesting till the term of payment of each part of the provisions arrived. But I am equally clearly of opinion with your Lordship that the clause in question has that effect. The clause is as follows:—“In case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions” (which really means, as your Lordship has said, before the terms of payment),

"leaving heirs of their bodies, the provisions of such deceasers, so far as unpaid to them, shall fall and devolve to the heirs of their bodies respectively in place of their parents, and in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, without lawful issue, then the provisions of such deceasers, so far as unpaid, shall fall back into and make part of the residue of my estate divisible as aforesaid."

No. 44.

Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

The question to be determined is what is the meaning of the word "provisions" as occurring in that clause, and we have had an argument upon that point. The word occurs twice, and one thing is clear, that in both branches of the clause it must mean the same thing. On the one hand, it has been maintained that the word "provisions" has a limited meaning, and refers to what I may call the primary provisions only, viz., the sons' immediate shares, which are payable twelve months after the death of the testator and twelve months after the death of his widow; and that the words are not to be extended further. If that be so, and the primary provisions only are to fall into residue in the event of a son predeceasing either of the terms of payment of his own share without issue, it follows that the provisions liferented by daughters would vest a morte testatoris. But that construction would lead to the anomalous result that if a son died before twelve months had elapsed after the death of his father or his mother without leaving issue, his share, so far as not due when he died, would drop into residue; but that the share of residue which would fall to him on the death of a sister, and which might not be payable till many years afterwards, would be held to have vested a morte testatoris. That is a construction which I cannot adopt. Accordingly, I think the word "provisions" in the clause now under consideration must be held to apply not only to what I have called the primary bequest, but to everything which fell to any of the sons under the deed, including what would come to them owing to the death of a sister without issue. I think that this is the natural meaning of the term, which is broad enough to cover all the benefits given to the sons. There is no reason for suggesting that one class of provisions or part of the residue should be in one position, and another part in a different position.

Accordingly, taking that view of the deed, and applying the term "provisions" to all parts of the residue, whether primary or eventual, given to the sons, I think there was no vesting in William Steel of any share of the daughters' provisions till each daughter died without issue, for the simple reason that in the case of any son predeceasing the term of payment without issue, there was a destination over of the share he would have taken had he survived, for the deed directs that such share was to fall into residue, and so be divisible among the other sons. I have said that there is nothing in the codicil bearing upon this point. There is one passage to the effect "that my son William shall only be entitled to call up £1000 upon the expiry of twelve months after my death, and the remainder shall lie with my trustees until his whole provisions are payable." I should rather be disposed to read that as a special direction applicable to the provisions payable at the two dates mentioned in the settlement. In regard to the subsequent clause, "should any of my children interested die upwards of twelve months after the death of my wife without leaving lawful issue, and any part of the shares of my estates before destined to them and their issue in that event devolve upon my sons, I direct my trustees to pay the same to my two sons interested as soon after the death of the persons so dying as may be convenient," it appears to me that that clause was added for the purpose of supplying a want in the original deed, viz., a provision as to the term of payment of the shares of daughters dying after the testator without issue. But this has no material bearing upon the point involved in the case.

No. 44.

Dec. 12, 1888.
Steel's Trustees v. Steel.

LORD ADAM.—Having had an opportunity of considering the opinion which has been delivered by your Lordship in the chair, I shall say no more than that I entirely concur in it.

THE COURT accordingly found that “no part of the fee of the shares liferented by Mrs Johnstone, Miss Catherine Steel, and Miss Margaret Steel vested in William Steel at the testator's death, or at any period prior to the death of the said William Steel.”

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 45.

MORRISON & MASON, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Guy.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison & Mason v. Scottish Employers' Liability and Accident Assurance Co. Limited.

SCOTTISH EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND ACCIDENT ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—R. Johnstone—Shaw.

Insurance—Policy—Liability “under or by virtue of Employers Liability Act, 1880”—Action at common law.—An assurance company granted a policy of insurance in favour of a firm of contractors under which they contracted to “pay to the employer all sums which such employer shall become liable for under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, as and for any compensation for personal injury caused to any workman in their service, while engaged in the employer's work,” during the currency of the policy. A workman in the employment of the contractors raised an action against them for personal injury suffered by him while in their employment through the fault of one of the firm. The action was laid solely at common law, and damages were found due. In an action at the instance of the contractors against the assurance company to recover from them under the above clause the amount of these damages, held that the workman's claim not having been made and prosecuted under the Act, the contractors had not been found liable in damages “under or by virtue of” the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and that, therefore, the assurance company was not bound under the policy to indemnify them therefor.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42).—Observations on the new liability introduced by the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lea.
B.

IN February 1886 John Martin, a workman in the employment of Messrs Morrison & Mason, contractors, Glasgow, raised an action against them concluding for damages for injuries received by him by the fall of a scaffolding on which he was working at a railway cutting. The action was laid at common law, and did not contain any reference to the Employers Liability Act, 1880. The grounds of Martin's action were that Morrison, one of the partners of the defenders' firm, had personally designed and supplied him with an insufficient scaffolding, and particularly that the figures or scaffold supports should have been larger and of a different construction, and that the bolts which fastened the figures or scaffold supports were round, and should have been wedge-shaped. It was admitted by Morrison that he had himself designed both figures and bolts, and that they had been made to his order.

A verdict was returned for the pursuer, and the damages were assessed at £200. Messrs Morrison & Mason paid the above sum of £200, together with the expenses incurred by the pursuer, and their own expenses in defending the action.

On 12th December 1887 Morrison & Mason raised this action in the Court of Session against the Scottish Employers' Liability and Accident Assurance Company, Limited, concluding for payment (1) of the £200, with £3, 4s. 1d. of interest, (2) of the expenses of the action, and of £33, 16s. 9d., being the amount of certain sums paid weekly to Martin from the date of the accident up to the time of the raising of his action. The defenders acknowledged liability for the last-mentioned item.

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

The pursuers averred,—(Cond. 2) “On 21st July 1885 the pursuers effected an insurance with the defenders, under Table B of their prospectus,* against all accidents of occupation to their workmen, including accidents for which the pursuers might become liable under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and at common law, to the extent of three years' wages, and the defenders issued to the pursuers a policy of assurance, dated 28th July 1885, numbered 6929, and marked ‘Table B,’ by which policy, in respect of the payment of a premium of £600 sterling, the defenders insured the pursuers, to the extent of £80,000 sterling, against such sums as the pursuers might become liable for in respect of personal injuries caused to workmen in their service during the twelve calendar months from the 21st day of July 1885.”

The defenders answered,—(Ans. 2) “Admitted that the policy of insurance was issued. It is referred to for its terms. Explained that the defenders do insure at common law to the extent of three years' wages, and issue policies to that effect, a form of which is produced and referred to. The policy founded on is not such a policy. Explained that when the assurance was arranged between the pursuers and the defenders, the latter advised and solicited the pursuers to insure at common law to the extent of three years' wages, and offered to cover that risk for 1s. to 1s. 6d. extra per £100 of wages, but the pursuers declined, and stated that they had had many years' experience of the common law liability, and that they were prepared to continue to take that risk upon themselves. Quoad ultra denied.”

The policy † contained the following clause :—“(1) The company, so far as regards injuries caused during the period covered by the premium so paid as aforesaid, or any further period, in respect of which the company shall accept a premium or premiums, shall pay to the employer all sums which such employer shall become liable for, under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, as and for compensation for personal injury caused to any workman in their service, while engaged in the employer's work in either of the occupations, and at any of the places, mentioned in the schedule hereto.”

* Quoted p. 218, note.

† The policy of insurance was in the following terms :—“TABLE B.”—[See Prospectus, p. 218]—“Whereas Morrison & Mason, contractors, Glasgow, hereinafter called the employers, by a proposal, dated 21st July 1885, applied to the Scottish Employers' Liability and Accident Assurance Company, Limited, hereinafter called the company, for an indemnity against all such claims as hereinafter mentioned for compensation for personal injuries caused to workmen in their service, in any of the occupations mentioned in the schedule hereto, and have paid to the company the sum of £600 sterling as the premium for such indemnity for twelve calendar months from the 21st day of July 1885. Now, it is hereby agreed as follows :—(1)” (quoted above.) “(2) If at any time during the period covered by the said premium, or during any future period as aforesaid, any workman in the employer's service shall sustain personal injury caused by accidental, external, and visible means while engaged in the employer's work in either of the occupations, and at any of the places mentioned in the schedule hereto, and for which personal injury the employer shall not be liable under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and the direct effect of such

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

It appeared from the record that when Martin brought his action Morrison & Mason intimated the fact to the assurance company, who, however, denied liability to indemnify them under the policy, and it was thereafter arranged that the employers should defend the action, under reservation of all questions between them and the company.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having become liable, under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, for the said sums of £200 sterling and £3, 4s. 1d. of interest, as compensation for personal injury to a workman in their service, while engaged in their work, and the defenders having by their said contract of insurance and indemnification, and by their policy of assurance, agreed to indemnify the injury shall occasion the death of such workman within three months of the happening thereof, then the funds and property of the company shall be subject and liable to pay to the employer, according to the scale in schedule hereto, in respect of such injury, and that within a month after proof of such death to the satisfaction of the directors of the company shall have been furnished. And if any workman in the service of the employer as aforesaid shall sustain any personal injury, caused as aforesaid, and during the employment as aforesaid, which shall not be fatal, and for which injury the employer shall not be liable under said Act of 1880 as aforesaid, then, on medical proof of such injury as aforesaid, and of such consequent incapacity as hereinafter mentioned, satisfactory to the directors, being proven, compensation shall be paid to the employer at the rate per week of one-half of the week's wages receivable by such workman at the time of the injury so long as such workman shall have been totally and absolutely incapacitated from attending to work of any kind in consequence of such injury. But the period during which such compensation for total disablement is to be paid shall not exceed twenty-six consecutive weeks for any single accident, and the company shall not be liable for and the employer shall not be entitled to demand payment of the said compensation in the events aforesaid for a greater or longer period than what is above set forth. . . . Provided always that this policy, and the covenant to indemnify herein contained, are subject to the conditions endorsed hereon, which are hereby agreed to be conditions precedent to the right of the employer to sue or recover hereunder."

THE CONDITIONS referred to contained the following clauses:—"1. Upon the occurrence of any accident, notice of it shall within three days of its occurrence be given to the company. The fullest particulars of the cause of the accident must be carefully preserved, so that in the event of legal proceedings such may be produced or be open to inspection. The failure to preserve such particulars has been an element against employers in the law Courts. The employer on receiving notice of a claim shall, within three days, send on the same or a copy thereof to the company, with such further certified information as to the time at and the circumstances under which the injury was caused, and the nature and extent thereof, and the name and occupation of the claimant, and such other information as the company may, by their rules or otherwise, require, and he shall cause to be supplied to the company such further certified information as to and such evidence of the circumstances connected with such claim as the company may from time to time apply for. 2. On receiving from the employer notice of any claim the company may take upon themselves the settlement of the same, and in that case the employer shall give them all necessary information and assistance for the purpose. The employer shall not, except at his own cost, pay or settle any claim without the consent of the company, but if any proceedings be taken to enforce any claim in respect of which such notice shall be given, the company shall have the absolute conduct and control of the same throughout in the name and on behalf of the employer, and shall, in any event, indemnify the employer against all costs and expenses of and incident upon any such proceedings, and the employer shall, at the cost of the company, render them every assistance in his power to enable them to resist any claim wholly or in part or to defend any such proceedings. . . ."

pursuers in all sums for which they might so become liable, the pursuers are entitled to decree therefor against the defenders. (2) Alternatively, the pursuers having become liable at common law for the said sums of £200 sterling and £3, 4s. 1d. sterling as compensation for personal injury to a workman in their service, while engaged in their work, and the defenders having by their contract of insurance and indemnification with the pursuers agreed to indemnify the pursuers in all sums for which they might so become liable, to the extent of three years' wages of the workman, the pursuers are entitled to decree therefor against the defenders.

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The claims made by the pursuers being (with the exception of the claim for the £33, 16s. 9d.) claims of relief arising out of or in connection with an action against them not under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and the same not being covered by the policy or contract of insurance between the parties founded on, the defenders should be assoilzied quoad these claims. (6) On a sound construction of the policy libelled, the defenders are not liable to the pursuers as concluded for, and they fall to be assoilzied.

On 22d February 1888, the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced an interlocutor granting decree in favour of the pursuers for the above-mentioned sum of £33, 16s. 9d., and for the expenses incurred by both parties in Martin's action down to a certain date (these claims being admitted by the defenders), and, quoad ultra, assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—This action is founded on a policy of insurance, by which the defenders undertook, in consideration of a premium of £600, to pay to the pursuers, as employers of labour, 'all sums which such employer shall become liable for, under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, as and for compensation' for personal injury, 'caused to any workman in their service, while engaged in the employer's work in either of the occupations, and at any of the places, mentioned in the schedule hereto.'

"On 4th August 1885, and during the period covered by this policy, John Martin, a mason in the service of the pursuers, sustained personal injuries while engaged in the pursuers' work; and on 4th February 1886, Martin raised an action of damages in the Court of Session against the pursuers, alleging that the accident occurred in consequence of the insufficiency of a scaffolding, through the pursuers' fault.

"The action came to depend before me; and an issue was adjusted for the trial of the cause, in the following terms:—

"Whether on or about the 4th day of August 1885, the pursuer, while working in the employment of the defenders on a scaffolding fixed to a retaining wall on the Glasgow and Cathcart Railway, near Dixon's Avenue, was injured in his person, in consequence of the insufficiency of the said scaffolding, and the falling thereof, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer.

"Damages claimed, £1000."

"The trial resulted in a verdict for the workman, and against the present pursuers, with £200 of damages; and an attempt to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence was unsuccessful.

"The defence in the present case raises no question that Martin suffered his injuries while in the pursuers' service, and engaged in their work, in one of the occupations, and at one of the places, mentioned in the schedule appended to the policy. But the defenders dispute their liability to indemnify the pursuers, on the ground that the employers' liability for the above sum was not 'under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880.'

"It is admitted that the workman's action was not founded on the Employers Liability Act. He had given no notice under the statute, and raised his action

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
 Morrison &
 Mason v.
 Scottish
 Employers' Liability and Accident
 Assurance Co.
 Limited.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The test of the defenders' liability under the policy was not whether the action brought by Martin was in the Court of Session as for compensation at common law. The common law was sufficient for his purpose, because he alleged and proved that the accident arose from the insufficiency of a scaffolding for which the pursuer Mr Morrison was personally responsible.

"But it is contended for the pursuers that the policy is not exclusive of risks of liability arising at common law, but covers all risks of liability for injuries to workmen for which the employer insuring is responsible. The argument is, that the statute merely extends and amends the common law, and that the meaning of the reference in the policy to the Employers Liability Act is to make it clear that the policy applies to cases in which the employer is liable under the statute, as well as to cases where there is liability at common law, or at all events, if there be liability under the statute as well as at common law, it is of no consequence that the claim of the workman is constituted under the common law; for it is the nature of the accident, and not the nature of the workman's action, that must decide the question.

"I am of opinion that it depends on a construction of the policy of insurance, whether it covers a case of liability both at common law and under the statute.

"Allegations are made by the defenders pointing at an inquiry into prior communings as shewing that the pursuers understood that the policy applied exclusively to claims arising out of the Employers Liability Act. It is stated that they refused an offer to cover common law risks for an extra premium. The pursuers, on the other hand, also propose to refer to the terms of the proposal and relative prospectus, as shewing that 'Table B' mentioned in the policy includes 'all accidents of occupation' even at common law. I think that the question of construction must be decided upon the terms of the policy alone, and that it is incompetent to inquire into extrinsic circumstances in order to control or explain the policy.

"It was contended for the defenders that liability on the part of an employer under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, is purely statutory, entirely new, and quite distinct from, and exclusive of, liability at common law. In support of this argument there was cited the case of The Queen v. The Judge of the City of London Court (14 Q. B. Div. 905). I am bound to say that although the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in that case reserves the question whether these causes of action are new, the opinions appear to shew that the defenders' view is that which is taken in England. But a different view of the statute has been taken in Scotland, and has been applied in practice ever since the case of M'Avoy v. Young's Paraffin Oil Co., in 1881 (9 R. p. 100). In the case of Morrison v. Baird & Co. (10 R. p. 271), I explained the grounds on which, in my opinion, the view of the Act taken in M'Avoy's case necessarily leads to the conclusion that the ground of action under the statute was not distinct from or exclusive of an action at common law. I adhere to the views then expressed, and as my judgment was affirmed in the Inner-House, and the practice is now quite settled in Scotland, (so much so that cases founding both on the common law and on the statute are tried under one issue), I cannot in the Outer-House hold this question to be open.

"The result is that an employer's liability for injuries suffered by workmen in his employment always arises out of fault for which he is responsible. It may be that he is responsible for that fault only by reason of the statute, or that he is responsible for it both under the statute and at common law. But it is always fault on his part, actually or constructively, that is the ground of liability. That there may be liability at common law as well as under the statute in some of the cases enumerated in the first section of the Employers Liability Act, appears to me to be clear. This may be illustrated by the first subsection of clause 1, as qualified by subsection 1st of clause 2. It is thereby enacted, inter alia, that a workman shall have the same right of compensation as any third party, in the case of injury from any defect in the machinery or brought under the provisions of the statute, but what was the nature of the accident for which damages were claimed. If the accident were shewn to be due to any of the causes narrated by the Act, that was sufficient to infer liability against the assurance company. This accident was covered by sec. 1, subsec. 1, of the statute.* The employer was therefore liable for damages here "under or by virtue of" the Act. The practice in cases of this kind was to try them, when laid alternatively at common law or under the statute, under one issue, shewing that there was no difference in the kind of liability. The one issue was, "Is there fault?" The defenders therefore had to bring their case up to this, that the policy only applied to cases where a new liability was introduced by the Act, and where there was no antecedent liability at common law.<sup>1</sup> Here, however, the action would have been competent either under the Act or at common law. The result of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor would be that any workman might affect the liability of the assurance company according to whether he brought his action under the common law or under the Act. There was in this policy, to say the least, an ambiguity, and in such contracts where that was the case the terms must be construed contra proferentem.<sup>2</sup> There being an ambiguity in the

No. 45.
Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

plant used in the business of the employer, provided the defect arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer and entrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the machinery and plant are in proper condition. Excepting in so far as this enactment refers to injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, the liability of the employer in such a case exists not less under the common law than under the statute.

"Now, as this is precisely the kind of case that was raised by the issue in the action at Martin's instance against the pursuers, viz., defect in plant arising from the negligence of the employer, the question is whether the employer in such a case became liable under the Act for the sum awarded? I think that he became liable under the Act as well as under the common law to make compensation.

"But is this enough to give the employer a claim against the insurance company under this policy? My opinion is that it is not. I think that in all such cases it is for the assured party to establish his claim, and that in this case he can only do so by shewing that his liability to Martin for the sum found due arose under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act, 1880. I think that he has failed to shew this, not because Martin's claim was not constituted under that Act, but because the Act was not required to create the liability, and was not in any sense the cause of the risk which in Martin's case the pursuers incurred. If advantage had been taken of the Act, and liability for the sum in question had been attached to the employer under it, that might have been conclusive against the company, for it would have been no answer to them to say that the employer was also liable at common law. But seeing that the Act was not in fact made the ground of liability, and was not required in law, my opinion is that the risk was not covered by the terms of the policy."

* Sec. 1 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, provides that the workman "shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work," where personal injury is caused to the workman "(subsec. 1) by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant, connected with, or used in, the business of the employer."

<sup>1</sup> M'Avoy v. Young's Paraffin Co., Limited, Nov. 5, 1881, 9 R. 100; Morrison v. Baird & Co., Dec. 2, 1882, 10 R. 271.

<sup>2</sup> Life Association of Scotland v. Foster, Jan. 31, 1873, 11 Macph. 351—See Lord President, at p. 358, 45 Scot. Jur. 240.

No. 45.
Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

policy, it was competent to go beyond its terms and import the prospectus of the company, which was expressly referred to by the marking Table B upon the policy itself. By the prospectus policies issued under Table A were to cover all cases of employers' liability under the Act, and at common law, to the extent of three years' wages, while policies under Table B were to cover all accidents of occupation, including legal obligations under Table A. For the additional liability of the defenders a higher premium was charged, and this was obtained from the workmen by a deduction of 1d. per £ per week from their wages, this system of deduction from wages being recognised by the defenders in the schedule to the policy. The policy in question being a Table B policy, the first clause covered liability under the Act and at common law to the extent of three years' wages, the second clause of the policy covering what was paid for by the workmen, namely, accidents for which the masters were not liable at all.*

* EXTRACTS FROM PROSPECTUSES (No. 29 of Pro.) :—"The passing of this Act subjects the employer not only to the serious pecuniary claims thereby provided for, but also to claims for accident to the workman never contemplated by the Act. Many claims of this latter kind will doubtless be advanced, and trouble and litigation will surely follow. By insuring under Table A the employer will relieve himself of the claims for which he is legally responsible, and of the litigation, trouble, and expense that wrongous claims may incur. The company, under the name of the insured, will defend all actions, and relieve the employer of the trouble and expense. It is one of the main objects of the company to provide for the insurance of the workman against all accidents of employment. Many accidents will befall them for which they can have no claim on their employer. To meet such cases the rates under Table B have been prepared. It is confidently expected that workmen will readily agree to give the small additional sum—averaging from 2s. to 5s. per man per annum—necessary to accomplish this end. By this plan all questions as to liability and consequent litigation will be avoided.

"TABLE A.—Rates to cover all employers' risks under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, for every £100 per annum paid in wages 5s.

"Class IV.—In the building trades—mason, carpenter, slater, painter, plumber, plasterer, in dock and harbour service, ironfounder, quarrier.

"TABLE B.—Rates to cover all accidents of occupation, and in the event of an accident for which the master is not liable, giving compensation to the employee as under :—In case of death one year's wages ; in case of total disablement, two-thirds of a week's wages for a period not exceeding 26 weeks ; for every £100 per annum paid in wages 12s. 6d. to 15s. Class IV."

"(No. 30 of Pro.)—By the payment of a small premium either on the amount of annual wages or on fixed sums, policies are issued by the company to cover—1. Employers' liability under the Act, and at common law, to the extent of three years' wages, per Table A ; 2. All accidents of occupation to workmen, including legal obligations (under Table A) per Table B.

"With a policy under Table A employers are relieved of all liability for personal injuries sustained by workmen in their service, whether these injuries have been caused (1) by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer, &c. &c. . . . Special quotations will be given to any employer wishing to cover the risk of all claims—which are exigible at common law—beyond three years' wages. Under Table A policy, all wrongful claims on the employer will be resisted at the company's expense.

"By insuring under Table B, compensation will be secured for all actions of occupation to servants, not younger than fourteen years nor older than sixty-five years, in the following manner :—If the injuries are caused through the employer's fault, as defined by the Act, all claims, including medical fees, will be paid ; but if there is no liability under the Act, or at common law, on the Argued for the defenders;—Under the policy they only undertook liability for cases where the master was liable in damages “under or by virtue of” the Act, that is to say, where the Act was invoked by the pursuer. The form of the action was the test of liability, and unless the statutory requirements of notice, &c. were carried out there was no liability on the part of the defenders. If the pursuers’ contention were right the word “under” would mean nothing. The conditions annexed to the policy clearly shewed that the company had guarded themselves from being liable for damages sued at common law, because they had stipulated that any notice of claim given under the statute should be notified to them, and had reserved the right to themselves to settle or to defend any action brought against the employers. Further, they issued special policies, as was pointed out in the prospectus, at special rates, where they undertook both classes of liability, and where, therefore, they were subject to heavier calls under the common law than they would have been under the statute.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders in this case are a company calling itself the “Scottish Employers’ Liability and Accident Assurance Company.” The company issues policies for the purpose of indemnifying masters against claims by workmen who suffer personal injury in the course of their employment. It appears that Messrs Morrison & Mason, the reclaimers, took out a policy which bears to be an indemnity “against all such claims as hereinafter mentioned for compensation for personal injuries caused to workmen in their service, in any of the occupations mentioned in the schedule hereto, and have paid to the company the sum of £600 sterling as the premium for such indemnity for twelve calendar months from the 21st day of July 1885.” Accordingly in that recital the company undertook to indemnify the company in certain specified cases.

During the period for which the policy subsisted, a workman in the employ-part of the employer, the proportion of wages or equivalent of wages fixed in the policy will only be paid through the employer.

“Under this system all questions of liability will be removed and litigation avoided.

“Classification of Trades, shewing annual premiums for each £100 paid in wages for policies covering the employers’ liability under the Act, and for joint policies covering all accidents while at work, whether the employer is liable or not. The rates in Table A are for policies covering the whole of the employer’s liability under the Act. The rates in Table B are for joint policies, covering the whole of the employers’ liability under the Act, and providing for all accidents of occupation outside the Act, and giving the following allowances to the workpeople, excluding those over sixty-five years of age and under fourteen :— One year’s average wages in case of death ; and two-thirds of the weekly wages during temporary total disablement, limited to twenty-six weeks—provided there is no liability under the Act.

“(No. 31 of Pro.)—Table shewing annual premiums for each £100 paid in wages for policies covering employers’ liability under the Act of 1880, and at common law, not exceeding three years’ wages. Building trades contractors 5s. Special quotations to cover claims under the Act only.

“(No. 24 of Pro.)—Policies are issued by the company to cover, viz :—1. Employers’ liability under the Act and at common law, to the extent of three years’ wages, per Table A ; 2. All accidents of occupation to workmen, including legal obligations (under Table A), per Table B.”

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers’ Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

Act. No notice was given in terms of that Act, and the action was laid and damages awarded entirely at common law. That being so, the words of the policy seem to me to be insufficient to cover the claim now made against the defenders. For, in the passage read by your Lordship, the words are express, to the effect that what the indemnity clause was intended to cover was those cases only which were brought under or in virtue of the Employers Liability Act. I therefore concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. And I also concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordship that the new liability introduced by the Act was substantially this, that it puts the workman in the same position in the matter of remedy against his employer as he would have been had he not been a workman but an ordinary member of the public.

LORD SHAND.—This case raises simply a question of construction of the policy of insurance granted by the defenders. In considering the terms of the clause of indemnity which the policy contains it is important to keep in view the distinctions which exist between an undertaking to indemnify employers against claims at the instance of their workmen, where the liability arises under the Employers Liability Act, and where it arises under the common law.

There are certainly many claims which may be enforced at common law which cannot be pursued under the statute; for example, the large class of cases where the accident in respect of which the claim is made was caused by the direct fault of the employer himself. Many of these are not dealt with, and could not be pursued under the statute. Again, there is this material consideration, that though the assurance company may become bound to indemnify the employer whether the claim arose against him at common law or under the statute, yet under the common law the damages recoverable are not limited, whereas the damages under the statute are limited in amount. It is farther an important consideration for the insurance company that under the Act a limited time is fixed within which notice of a claim must be given to the employer, and besides this, the action must be prosecuted within a certain short time fixed by the statute. The cases under the statute are limited in their nature, the liability is limited in amount, and the claims can only be made after timeous notice and if the prosecution has begun within six months of the accident. It is therefore obviously a serious consideration for the company in granting a policy of assurance to have it clearly fixed whether the policy is to cover the larger number of cases which may arise without any defined limit of liability at common law, or the smaller number which can be prosecuted with limited liability and under conditions as to time under the statute.

Coming, then, to the policy with which we have here to deal, I am of opinion that its intention and effect was that the company should, and did, undertake liability for those cases only which might arise "under or by virtue of" the Act, and which should, if not settled, be prosecuted under the statute, and not at common law. That that is the effect of the policy is to be gathered from the words used in the body of the policy itself, and that reading is, I think, borne out by the conditions annexed to the policy, and which must be taken to be embodied in it. The obligation in the policy is to pay "all sums which such employer shall become liable for under or by virtue of the Employers Liability Act." In the conditions the company stipulates that they shall have the advantage of any notice of claim being communicated to them within three days of the notice being given, and that they shall, if they think fit, have the power to take the settlement of any case upon themselves, and the conduct and control of any resulting litigation. They have also this important advantage, that the action, if founded on the Act, must be raised within the time allowed by its provisions. Having in view these considerations, I think it is clear that the company only contracted to indemnify the employers in cases brought and prosecuted under the provisions of the statute. It is not unimportant that we have before us a document which may fairly be looked at in illustration of the argument and of the ground on which the judgment proceeds—I mean a form of policy under which the company agrees to indemnify the employer not only against claims made under and in virtue of the Employers Liability Act, but claims at common law. In that policy it is distinctly stated that the company accepts responsibility in both classes of case, and in that event they charge a larger premium.

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.

Morrison &amp;

Mason v.

Scottish

Employers'

Liability and

Accident

Assurance Co.

Limited.

If this is the proper reading of the policy, this action necessarily falls. There was here no claim made under the statute, and no notice was given so that the company might settle or defend the case if they chose.

The pursuers, however, maintain that though the liability here arose and damages were awarded at common law, yet the action might have been brought to a successful issue under the statute. I do not think that with a policy so expressed the Court can enter on that consideration after the close of an action against the employer in which liability at common law has been established. The test is, I think, Was the action de facto prosecuted "under or by virtue" of the Act? To hold otherwise would be to allow the insured to prosecute a claim for indemnity, on one ground, of a loss made good against him on another ground not covered by the language of the policy, and would deprive the insurers of the notices required by the statute.

The question might be put,—Supposing an action brought under the Act, and liability made out against the employer, could the company have contended that though the liability was made out under the Act the claim could have been successfully prosecuted at common law, and could it in that case be maintained that they were not liable? I think they could not successfully maintain that plea. The test in each case is,—How was the action raised—under the statute, or at common law? No doubt the respondents are at this disadvantage, that the pursuer in an action of damages may affect the liability of the company by bringing his action under the Act or at common law as he chooses. But I do not think the Court is entitled to take into account what is merely an incidental circumstance in such a case. The liability of the defenders arises on a collateral contract between the employer and the insurance company, to which the employed was no party, and with which he had no concern.

On these grounds, which differ in some respects from those of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, I think the interlocutor reclaimed against should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—The sum for which indemnity is here sought is the sum of damages awarded against the pursuers in an action of damages brought against them at common law by one of their workmen. There is no reference in the action to the Employers Liability Act. I concur that that being the nature of the action it cannot be brought under the indemnity clause of the policy, because the pursuers have not been found liable in damages "under or in virtue" of the Act. On that short ground I have no difficulty in concurring in the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

With regard to the construction of this very ill-expressed policy, it is contended

No. 45.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Morrison &
Mason v.
Scottish
Employers' Liability and Accident
Assurance Co.
Limited.

that the clause of indemnity means that the liability referred to therein implies liability arising under the Act, and in no other way,—that is to say, that the clause only applies to cases where but for the passing of the Act there would have been no liability in damages at all. The result of that would be that where there was an antecedent liability at common law, the company would in no case be liable to indemnify the employer. That would simply come to this, that supposing the action was brought under the provisions of the Act the defence would still be open that the liability was a liability antecedent to the Act, and that, therefore, it did not arise “under or by virtue” of the Act. The other view of the clause is this, that where the action might be laid alternatively at common law or under the statute, and where proceedings were taken under the statute, then the company was to be liable. That, however, leads to this, that it would be in the power of any workman who is injured in his employment, to affect the liability of the insurance company according to the way in which he brought his action. That does not seem to me a likely view, but it is not in my opinion necessary to decide which is the true interpretation of the policy. If, however, I were called on to give an opinion, I should be disposed to say that the clause was only intended to guarantee the employer against liabilities created by the Act, and that therefore if it were shewn that there was an antecedent liability at common law, that would be a good defence to the company in such an action as the present.

THE COURT adhered.

MACANDREW, WRIGHT, & MURRAY, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 46.

Dec. 14, 1888.*
Ross v. Cowie's
Executrix.

JOHN ROSS, Pursuer (Appellant).—J. C. Thomson—Rhind.
JANE M'KENZIE OR COWIE (Cowie's Executrix), Defender (Respondent).
—Gloag—Sym.

Triennial prescription—Tradesman's account.—A joiner, after the death of a customer, raised in December 1887 an action against his representative for payment of an account, stated continuously, and containing entries from June 1875 to May 1886. A portion of the account, from June 1876 to May 1877, amounting to upwards of £350, consisted of charges incurred for work and materials supplied in a building adventure in which the customer had been engaged at that time. Quoad ultra, it was a jobbing account, and for the last nine years of its currency amounted only to £3, 9s. 7d. The defender maintained that the portion which related to the building adventure was a separate account, and pleaded prescription in regard to it. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the whole account was to be considered as one.

Proof—Triennial prescription—Entries made to avoid plea of prescription.—Where in an action on a tradesman's account the defender stated that the last two entries therein were fictitious, and had been stated in order to avoid the operation of prescription, the Court allowed proof before answer as to these items.

Proof—Advance of money—Mandate.—A tradesman in an action for payment of an account containing charges for sums said to have been paid by him on behalf of his customer, produced receipts by the creditors in the sums said to have been so paid. Held that it was competent to prove by parole that the payments had been made on the authority of the customer.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Kin-
cardineshire.
I.

IN December 1887 John Ross, joiner, Stonehaven, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Kincardineshire against Jane Cowie, widow and executrix of Alexander Cowie, sometime feuar in Stonehaven, who died No. 46.

on 25th September 1887, concluding for £379, 4s. 6½d. as the amount of an account said to be due to him by Cowie. The pursuer produced an Dec. 14, 1888.
account which bore to commence on 2d June 1875 and to end on 4th Ross v. Cowie's May 1886.* Executrix.

With reference to the item of £50 mentioned in the account below, the pursuer stated that it "was advanced and paid by the pursuer out of his own funds to the said John Lindsay at the special request of the said Alexander Cowie, and in his presence. The money was on that date drawn by * The account contained under the date "June 1875" a number of charges for work done in Cowie's dwelling-house and fencing his garden. These amounted to . . . . . £23 2 6

Then followed entries beginning thus :—

"1876.

June 22. To paid John Lindsay & Sons, Montrose, being first instalment for concrete work, . . . . .	50 0 0
To timber supplied for concrete houses,
To 750 lineal feet 9 × 2½ joists, red wood, 3d., . . . . .	9 7 6 "

Here followed a number of similar entries.

"Aug. 9

to 1877. To workmen's time at concrete houses, from 9th August 1876 to 28th May 1877 :—

May 28. To 3922 hours at 6d. per hour, . . . . .	98 1 0
To 335 do. 3d. do., . . . . .	4 3 9
To 80 do. 2d. do., . . . . .	0 13 4 "

Then came a number of entries for other house building materials in wood, iron, and plaster, all of the same date (May 28). Among these was this entry :—

"To amount of James Garvie & Sons' account for doors, . . . . .	29 0 0 "
--	----------

The entries in this part of the account under date 28th May 1877 closed with an entry :—

"To preparing plans and specifications, and carrying out the various work of the houses, . . . . .	30 0 0 "
---	----------

In all, the charges in this, the second portion of the account, amounted to £350, 17s. 3½d. Added to the first portion under date June 1875, they made the account, £373 19 9½

From this certain alleged payments to account in 1875 and 1877 were deducted, . . . . .	150 0 0
--	---------

Leaving a balance of, . . . . .	£223 19 9½ "
---------------------------------	--------------

Then came this item :—

"1877.

May 28. Interest thereon from this date to 28th December 1887, . . . . .	117 14 3 "
---	------------

Then followed a few other items of a jobbing nature said to have been incurred in the years 1879, 1881, 1883, 1885, and 1886. These items amounted in that whole period to about £3, 9s. 7d.

The last three items were as follows :—

"1884.

July 9. . . . .	0 1 3
To night steps repaired, . . . . .

"1885.

Aug. 15. To new pail and handle, . . . . .	0 3 9
--	-------

"1886.

May 4. To attendance at sale of furniture, . . . . .	0 2 6 "
--	---------

After that entry the account was summed up.

No. 46. the pursuer out of his current account with the North of Scotland Bank at Stonehaven. An excerpt from the bank books shewing the entry and Lindsay & Sons' receipt are herewith produced and referred to."

Dec. 14, 1888.
Ross v. Cowie's
Executrix.

The defender denied that the account was due. She stated with regard to what is above described as the second portion of the account, and the pursuer admitted, that the items therein contained had reference to two concrete houses which her deceased husband had erected in Stonehaven, and the joiner work of which the pursuer had done. She stated that it was usual for such work to be contracted for, and settled for at completion, whether done under contract or otherwise, but admitted that no formal contract appeared to have been made for the joiner work in question.

She averred,—“The account prior to and under date June 1876, amounting in whole to £373, 19s. 9½d., falls to be treated as a separate and independent account from the subsequent items, and the pursuer has himself so treated it, by charging interest on it separately, . . . and the account prior to and under date June 1876 is not a continuous or running account with the few small items, amounting in the next ten years only to £3, 9s. 7d.; and the account prior to and under date June 1876 falls by itself under the triennial prescription, and is prescribed.” With regard to the last two items in the account, the defender averred that they were not performed for or on the order of Cowie, and were not due by his estate, and were “inserted in the account libelled with the view of attempting to obviate the plea of prescription, and the whole account is thus prescribed.”

With reference to the payment of £50 to John Lindsay & Sons, the defender averred that the matter there referred to did not fall under the pursuer's work, and that if he had made the payment he had been simply the medium of handing the money from Cowie to John Lindsay & Son, and had done so with money supplied by Cowie. She further stated that no such claim had ever been made in Cowie's lifetime.

With reference to the £29 said to have been paid to James Garvie & Son for doors, the defender averred that the putting in of doors fell within the pursuer's contract, and that he appeared to have bought these from Garvie & Son, and to have made that entry in the account in lieu of a detailed account as to the doors. She further averred that the payment, if made, was made with funds supplied by Cowie.

On the assumption that the account was not prescribed, the defender stated certain counter claims.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The whole account, or at least that part of it prior to and under date June 1876, is liable to and has suffered the triennial prescription, and can be proved only by the writ or oath of the defender. (2) The payment to Messrs Lindsay & Son of £50, if made by the pursuer, having been so by him simply as the medium of the late Mr Cowie, for handing the money to them, and with money supplied by him, is not due or resting owing, and the pursuer can prove by the defender's writ or oath only that the payment was not made from the funds of Mr Cowie.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson), on 20th February 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the portion of the account libelled, which is said to have been incurred prior to 23d May 1879, can be proved only by the writ or oath of the defender,” &c.*

* “NOTE.—The earlier portions of the account for which the action has been brought are unquestionably prescribed unless it can be made out that the later portions are mere continuations of them. It appears to me, however, that the later portions are of quite a different character, and that it would be a mere evasion of the Prescription Statutes to say that they were done under the same

On 15th March 1888 the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) affirmed the interlocutor "with this qualification, that the pursuer is at liberty to reform the account by excerpting the payment of £50 to Laidlaw & Sons, and £29 to Garvie & Son, and any other disbursements made by him on behalf of the deceased Alexander Cowie. . . ."

No. 46.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Ross v. Cowie's
Executrix.

Thereafter proof pro ut de jure having been allowed on the points specified in the Sheriff's interlocutor, the pursuer appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act to the Court of Session.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The Sheriffs had erred in holding that the greater part of the account was prescribed. To reach that result they had held that it was not continuous, and had treated it as several accounts under several employments. In fact they had treated it, not as it was stated by the pursuer, as a continuous account for work of various kinds, but as if it had been the accounts of three joiners for different jobs. But there was no principle for such a course. The account should be looked at in a question of prescription as the pursuer brought it forward. The same man might have different classes of work to do, and state them all in one account. The defender said that work of the kind, stated in what she described as the second branch of the account, was usually settled at completion, but she admitted on record that there was no formal contract for it, and could not therefore get the benefit of an alleged custom which depended on there being regular contracts for such work. The so-called second part of the account would have been subject to the triennial prescription, but only as part of the whole account, and the whole account was saved by the last two items. It was attempted to make the last portion, and therefore the whole account, subject to the triennial prescription by a random statement that the last items were put in to avoid prescription. That could only lead to inquiry by proof before answer on that point.<sup>1</sup> In a recent case of the kind an item, for which nothing was charged, followed by an item "to postages and incidents, 10s.," had been sustained as preventing the application of the triennial prescription on the Court being satisfied employment as the earlier. The later portions of the account are for trifling bits of jobbing work of a few shillings each, such as one might order from the nearest carpenter without anything in the shape of contract or arrangement. The middle portion of the account—that incurred in 1876 and 1877—was for the building of two houses at a cost of some £350, which undoubtedly had been the subject of special contract and arrangement; and it seems to me that it is not possible to speak of the account for the trifling repairs and supplies as being a continuation of the employment to build. The first portion of the account—that incurred in June 1875—has more analogy with the last portions, but it is separated from them by an interval of more than three years, as well as by the house building contract.

"The defender treats the account for building the houses as falling under the triennial prescription. I should rather myself have thought that it fell under the quinquennial, but whether it fell under the one or under the other it seems to me to have no sort of connection with the other portions of the account, and if this view be sound it is plain that it can be proved only by writ or oath.

"There are two large items in the account, one of £50 and one of £29, which apparently are claimed as having been cash advances on behalf of the defender's author. If they were they would be equivalent to loans to him, and are therefore also provable by writ or oath only. I may add that it would appear to me to be exceedingly unfortunate were any other result to be reached. The defender's husband, who knew all about the work, is dead, and the defender at an interval of ten years from the conclusion of the transactions would necessarily be quite unable to obtain materials for her defence."

<sup>1</sup> Wotherspoon v. Henderson's Trustees, July 10, 1868, 6 Macph. 1052, Lord Neaves, at p. 1061, 40 Scot. Jur. 584.

No. 46.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Ross v. Cowie's
 Executrix.

that these were bona fide entries.<sup>1</sup> (2) The sums of £50 and £29 were paid by the pursuer for the deceased, as he undertook to shew by the receipts produced and by proof that he had a mandate to pay them. Mandate to pay money might be proved by parole, and the plea of triennial prescription did not apply to a claim by a mandatary against a mandant for outlay.<sup>2</sup>

Argued for the defender ;—The pursuer after the death of his customer presented to the widow an account for a sum of more than £300, which, even assuming it to be continuous, was only saved from prescription by items for a purchase of a pail and for attending a sale of furniture. Such an account was suspicious, and no explanation had been offered of the delay which had occurred in rendering the account though the pursuer's counsel had been invited by the Court to explain it. The Sheriff-substitute was right in examining the account to decide on its true nature, and in overruling the pursuer's contention that such examination was ousted by its being stated by him continuously. Of the whole account only £3, 9s. was said to have been incurred within a period of nine years prior to the death of Cowie. Of the rest a great part, rightly described as the second of three accounts, was for a large piece of work of a character totally different from the rest, and never in practice to be found in a house jobbing account. But the whole virtue of the law of prescription lay in its recognition and enforcement of the usual mode of doing business. It was because in practice tradesmen's accounts and house maills were not hung up indefinitely, but paid soon, that the law enforced the bringing of action on them in a limited time under penalty of restricting the mode of proof. That reason was against the treatment of these charges so different in kind as part of a jobbing account. It did not make several accounts into one, that they were said to be all incurred to one man, or even to one man for joiner work, if the work were different in kind. The remote and large part of the account thus kept back till after the death of the alleged customer could not, therefore, be prefixed to a small jobbing account. It must stand on its own merits. If so, it either suffered a separate course of triennial prescription, or as the Sheriff-substitute suggested, it suffered the quinquennial prescription, either of which would be fatal to the pursuer's argument. The quinquennial prescription applied to all bargains "concerning moveables or probable by witnesses," and provided that payment should be sued for within five years from the "making of the bargain."<sup>3</sup> That would apply to this transaction of doing the joiner work in the course of a few months upon the concrete houses which Cowie had been erecting in 1876.

In any view, the pursuer would have to establish by proof that he had furnished the last two items in the third part of the account before the plea of prescription could be repelled.

The alleged payments of £50 and £29 could not be treated as the pursuer proposed. The presumption of law was, if he had paid them, that the payment was made with the money of Cowie the debtor. There was no relevant averment of mandate to pay them, even assuming the pursuer's case of mandate to be well founded in law.

At advising,—

LORD LEE.—This is an action for payment of a joiner's account, commencing

<sup>1</sup> Aytoun v. Stoddart, Feb. 4, 1882, 9 R. 631.

<sup>2</sup> Grant v. Fleming, Dec. 10, 1881, 9 R. 257; Annand's Trustees v. Annand, Feb. 6, 1869, 7 Macph. 526, 41 Scot. Jur. 278.

<sup>3</sup> Act 1669, c. 9.

in June 1875, and purporting to be continued subsequent to May 1877 by sundry charges for work done and materials supplied in May 1879, in September 1881, in March 1883, in July 1884, in August 1885, and in May 1886.

No. 46.
Dec. 14, 1888.
Ross v. Cowie's
Executrix.

The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have held that the whole account prior to 23d May 1879 is subject to the triennial prescription, and upon the ground that the charges subsequent to June 1875 must have been the subject of special contract and arrangement, in which view there would be a period of more than three years between the charges in 1875 and the later portion of the account.

I think that the account cannot be so dealt with upon the record as it stands. There is nothing in the character of the account for June 1876 and for the period from 9th August 1876 to 28th May 1877 which is at all inconsistent with the pursuer's allegation that it was incurred for work done and materials supplied by the pursuer in the ordinary course of his business, and upon what he calls a running account. The joiner work upon the buildings referred to is not alleged to have been done under any special contract. Both the work and the materials are charged in detail according to time and price. I therefore think that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 20th February, and also the interlocutors of the Sheriff proceeding upon the same view of the account, must be recalled.

There is, however, another view in which the account is said to be prescribed. It is pointed out that if the items charged on 15th August 1885—"to new pail and handle, 3s. 9d."—and 4th May 1886—"attendance at a sale of furniture, 2s. 6d."—are struck out, prescription has run. For the action was not raised for more than three years after the preceding items under date July 1884.

It is alleged by the defender that these two last items are not due, and have been inserted with the view of obviating the plea of prescription. This raises a point which was referred to by Lord Neaves in the case of Wotherspoon, 6 Macph. 1052, and I think that the course there suggested should in substance be followed by allowing the parties a proof before answer as to these items. I think this proof must be taken before the plea of prescription is disposed of.

Another question is raised as to two entries in the account charging sums of £50 and £29, said to have been paid to other tradesmen by the pursuer on behalf of the defender for work done by them upon the buildings on which the pursuer was employed to do the joiner work and to prepare the plans and specifications.

The pursuer produces receipts for these sums as paid by him, and I think that there is authority for holding that parole proof is competent on the question whether the disbursements, so instructed, were made upon the authority of the deceased as a customer of the pursuer—Annand's Trustees, 7 Macph. 526; Grant v. Fleming, 9 R. 257.

On these grounds I think that we should recall the interlocutor of 20th February 1888 and whole subsequent interlocutors, and remit to the Sheriff to allow the parties before answer a proof of their averments on record as to the last two items charged in the account, and thereafter to proceed in the cause as may be just.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 20th February 1888, and all the interlocutors

No. 46.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Ross v. Cowie's
Executrix.

subsequently pronounced in the inferior Court; remit the case to the Sheriff, with instructions to allow to the parties, before answer, a proof of their averments on record as to the last two items charged in the account libelled, and thereafter to proceed as may be just: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in this Court, and remit," &c.

W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—WM. B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 47.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Macfarlane v.
Matheson.

JOHN FINLAYSON MACFARLANE, Pursuer (Respondent).—A. J. Young—J. P. Grant.

DAME MARY JANE MATHESON, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—M'Kechnie—Orr.

Public burdens—Poor-rate—Valuation-roll—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29).—In an action for payment of an assessment of poor-rates laid upon the defender (1) as proprietor and (2) as occupier, in respect of tenants paying under £4 of rent,—the entries in the Valuation-roll being the basis of assessment,—the defender stated that she was unable to recover payment (1) of her rents, and (2) of the rates which she had paid for tenants under £4; that her tenants were crofters, and that prior to the making up of the Valuation-roll they had made application to the Crofters Commission for reductions of rent, which, if granted, would take effect from the date of application, and that the Commission had pronounced an order sisting in hoc statu her right to sell in execution of any decree for rent she might obtain. She maintained that as, subsequent to the date of the Valuation-roll, her only available remedy for the recovery of rents and rates had been suspended by the action of the Crofters Commission under the Crofters Acts, the remedies of the collector for enforcing payment from her of rates founded on the Valuation-roll ought also to be suspended.

Held (diss. Lord Lee) that the defence was irrelevant.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Ross-shire.
I.

JOHN FINLAYSON MACFARLANE, collector of poor, registration, school, and cemetery rates for the parish of Stornoway, raised an action against Lady Matheson, proprietrix in liferent of the island of Lewis, for £222, 7s. 4d., the balance of rates due by her in respect of her proprietorship and occupancy of subjects in the parish of Stornoway.

The pursuer averred, and the defender admitted, that the defender had been assessed by the Parochial Board for the year from Whitsunday 1887 to Whitsunday 1888 in the sum of £764, 7s. 7d., that she had paid thereof £542, 0s. 3d., leaving the balance of £222, 7s. 4d. sued for.

The defender stated that she had been assessed in rates on the assumption that the rental of her tenants who paid less than £4 per annum of rent would produce a sum of £168, 2s. 6d., but that she had only recovered £102, 2s. of that sum; that, with regard to tenants whose rent was £4 and upwards, she had been assessed on the assumption that the rates applicable thereto would amount to £508, 16s. 8d., "but she had only been able to collect rents representing an assessment of £352, 9s. 10d."

The defender further stated;—(Stat. 3) "In the event of the defender adopting legal proceedings against her tenants who are in arrear of rent, the same would, in terms of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1887, be liable to be prohibited till the crofter's application to fix a fair rent has been determined. There is no immediate prospect of their application to fix fair rents being entertained or determined." This statement was admitted by the pursuer, under the explanation that "the defender has not attempted to sue any of her tenants who are in arrear of rent; and that until she does so, the Crofters Commission has no power to sist the proceedings." No. 47.

The defender pleaded;—The defender not having recovered payment of the sums sued for in respect of rates from her tenants who pay less than £4 per annum, and in respect of rents from those who pay £4 per annum and upwards, she is not bound to pay rates in respect of the sums not recovered by her as aforesaid, and she is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. Dec. 14, 1888. Macfarlane v. Matheson.

The Sheriff-substitute (Fraser) decerned against the defender for the £222, 7s. 4d. sued for.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

It was stated at the bar for her that she was unable to pay the rates, as the rents of the estate had not been recovered; that from over two thousand crofters she had only recovered at the last collection £9 of rent; that she had raised numerous actions for rent against crofting tenants, but that the crofters had in June 1887 applied to the Crofters Commission to have fair rents fixed,* and that the Commission thereafter, on the application of the respective crofters, had issued an order prohibiting in hoc statu the sale of the crofters' effects by virtue of any decree for rent or arrears of rent.†

Argued for the appellant;—The rates were payable in respect of the rents received. But in this case the rental out of which the rates should come was non-existent. The subject of taxation, in fact, had perished.

*The Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), section 6, enacts that "the landlord or the crofter may apply to the Crofters Commission to fix the fair rent to be paid by such crofter to the landlord for the holding, and thereupon the Crofters Commission, after hearing the parties and considering all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, and particularly after taking into consideration any permanent or unexhausted improvements on the holding, and suitable thereto, which have been executed or paid for by the crofter or his predecessors in the same family may determine what is such fair rent, and pronounce an order accordingly."

Section 6, subsection 3, enacts,—“Where the Crofters Commission shall fix a rent which shall be less in amount than the present rent, the crofter shall be entitled, at the next payment of rent, to deduct from the amount of the fixed rent such sum or sums as he may have paid over and above the amount of the fixed rent in respect of the period between the date of the notice of application to fix the fair rent and the date when such rent was fixed.”

Subsection 4 enacts,—“When an application is lodged with the Crofters Commission to fix a fair rent, it shall be in the power of the Crofters Commission . . . to sist all proceedings for the removal of the crofter in respect of non-payment of rent till the said application is finally determined, upon such terms as to payment of rent, or otherwise, as they shall think fit.”

Subsection 5 gives the Crofters Commission power to decide as to whether the whole or any part of arrears of rent to become due before the application is finally determined ought to be paid.

†The Crofters Holdings Act, 1887, enacts, by sec. 2,—“Any crofter who has made or shall make any application to the Crofters Commission to fix a fair rent for his holding, and against whom legal proceedings have been taken for payment of rent, may apply under the same or any subsequent application to the Crofters Commission for an order prohibiting the sale of the crofter's effects upon the said holding by virtue of any decree for payment of such rent; and the Crofters Commission, if satisfied that such sale would have the effect of defeating in the case of such crofter the intention of the principal Act, may, upon such terms as to payment of rent or otherwise as they shall think fit, grant an order prohibiting such sale till the application to fix a fair rent has been finally determined.”

No. 47.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Macfarlane v.
Matheson.

Where the subject of a lease perished in whole or in part rent was not exigible for what had perished.<sup>1</sup> On the like reasoning, the taxation which public law laid upon the subject could not be exacted.<sup>2</sup> The appellant's property did not yield profit on which it could be rated. Poor-rate was in its nature a tax upon income, as appeared from the earliest statutes on the subject. Thus the Act 1579, c. 74, made provision, in order to the relief of the poor of a parish, "to tax and stint the hail inhabitants within the parochin according to the estimation of their substance." Thus also the Valuation Act of 1854<sup>3</sup> furnished machinery for imposing the burden of rates on the value of subjects, according as they were capable of being "let from year to year." The Valuation-roll was the warrant of the collector of poor-rate for laying on taxation, and in an ordinary case it was the test of the rental for the year to which it applied. But a vis major had supervened, just as much as if part of the subject had been swept away by a flood. The Crofters Commission had deprived the appellant of her power to recover her rents by the appropriate diligence of law, a sale on a decree. Thus the collector's warrant was cut down. Again, this stoppage of the power to recover the rent would, if the Crofters Commission reduced the rents, destroy the subject of taxation as it appeared in the Valuation-roll. The crofters had made their applications in June, and the Valuation-roll was made up in August following. But the reductions if granted would in their effect on the rental draw back to June.

Argued for the pursuer;—The rating authorities were bound to assess according to the Valuation-roll. The appellant could not be relieved on the ground that she had not recovered her rents. Besides, she had not done what she could to recover them. The Crofters Commission had indeed prevented her from selling in implement of any decree, but there was no prohibition against her obtaining such, or even enforcing it (if obtained) by arrestment. The basis of the argument of the appellant was that the estate was not really of the value stated in the Valuation-roll, by which the respondent was bound to assess. But if so, the true remedy was to have objected to the entries in the roll applicable to the estate at the time that roll was made up. That course not having been taken, the appellant must impute to herself the consequent loss, if any.<sup>4</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think there is only one way in which we can deal with this case. It discloses a history as deplorable as, I think, ever came before the Court. Lady Matheson has been unable to recover even so much of the rent due to her as will enable her to pay to the collector the rates for which she has been assessed. It appears that the Crofters Act (with its Amending Act) has had the result that while a proprietor is liable to pay the assessments according to the rent which he and his tenant agreed upon, the Crofters Commission has power to step in and to say that those rents shall not be paid by the tenants to their landlord. Yet it is not provided that the proprietor who is liable to be called upon to pay his assessment while his right to recover his rents is stayed is to have his obligation to pay also stayed. It has been argued

<sup>1</sup> Muir v. M'Intyre, Feb. 4, 1887, 14 R. 470.

<sup>2</sup> Tod v. Mitchell, Jan. 26, 1858, 20 D. 445, 30 Scot. Jur. 232, per Lord Neaves (Ordinary); Govan Police Commissioners v. Armour, Feb. 3, 1887, 14 R. 461; Cassells' Law of Rating, p. 35 and p. 42; Mayor of Worcester v. Droitwich Assessment Committee, Nov. 10, 1876, L. R., 2 Ex. Div. 49.

<sup>3</sup> Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 6.

<sup>4</sup> M'Lachlan v. Tennant, May 4, 1871, 43 Scot. Jur. 390.

to us with much force that the action of the Crofters Commission subsequent to the date of the imposition of the assessment is a vis major which disturbs the whole position. The Commission has stopped the landlord's proceedings. At least it has stopped his right to sell in execution of his proceedings for rent, and the effect of these two things is practically the same, for if he cannot sell, a landlord has practically no means to recover his rent, and out of that rent alone can his rates be expected to come. The result is unfortunate. But when we look at the legislation which provides for the imposition of the assessments and their collection, we find no option in the matter. The duty of the rating authorities is to take the rent in the Valuation-roll (which, when the lands are let, is the rent actually payable) and finding there the true rent, to place upon that property the proportion of rates applying thereto. This is the case whether the rents be above £4, or whether they be under £4, in which latter case the landlord may be called upon to pay to the collector the whole rate.

The statutory authorities for the collection of rates have here performed their statutory duty, and though the case is as hard a one as can well be conceived, I am of opinion there is nothing either in the circumstances or in the Crofters Act which prevents their recovering them.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case for the appellant is unstateable. The action is by the collector of the poor and school rate, acting under authorities who are in duty bound to assess the appellant and other rate-payers according to the Valuation-roll in operation for the time, and who, as required by their statutory duty, did make these assessments according to that roll. When the Valuation-roll is being made up the proprietor has notice of it, and may appeal against it, but when once it is made up, the rating authorities have simply to assess according to it. Was the defender then duly assessed? I should have thought that the only question. The pursuer states that she was assessed to the extent of £764, 7s. 7d., that she paid to account £542, 0s. 3d., leaving a balance still due to him of £222, 7s. 4d., being the sum sued for, and her answer to the statement is simply "admitted." Is it possible to say that her case is stateable after that? There is no case here of destruction of the subject by fire or earthquake, or flood, such as has been figured. It is the case of an existing proprietrix of an existing subject assessed for £764, and who has only paid £542. In defence she states that she has been assessed on the assumption that the rental of her tenants paying less than £4 per annum would produce £168, 2s. 6d., and that that of those paying £4 and upwards would produce £508, 16s. 8d.; that from the former class she has only recovered £102, 2s., and from the latter class, notwithstanding all her efforts, she has only been able to collect rents representing an assessment of £352, 9s. 10d. What have the rating authorities to do with that? She also states that in the event of her taking legal proceedings against her crofter tenants in arrear, these proceedings would be liable to be prohibited till their applications to fix a fair rent are determined, and she pleads as her only plea in law,—“The defender not having recovered payment of the sums sued for in respect of rates from her tenants who pay less than £4 per annum, and in respect of rents from those who pay £4 per annum and upwards, she is not bound to pay rates in respect of the sums not recovered by her as aforesaid, and she is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses.” It is not maintainable that a proprietor duly assessed according to the Valuation-roll at the time is not liable to pay rates because she has not recovered her

No. 47.

Dec. 14, 1888.
Macfarlane v.
Matheson.

No. 47. rents. No doubt it is a peculiar case,—a case of hardship,—that a tribunal
 Dec. 14, 1888. been appointed with power to deal with arrears and to reduce rents, but Macfarlane v. rating authorities have no concern with that. They have no other course Matheson. to lay on their rates according to the Valuation-roll, and they have merely a according to their statutory duty. It is impossible not to sympathise with landlords of crofter tenants who may be abusing the advantages extended to
 It is very hard for them to have to pay rates when deprived of the rents which they stipulated. But on the other hand, the Commissioners will not assume, interfere with fair rents, and the defender will, I doubt not, maintain to them that hers are fair rents. It is out of the question to suspend the collection of assessments till that question is settled.

I ought to say in addition that I think the Crofters Commission have authority to interfere with ordinary legal proceedings to obtain decree for recovery of rent due. Their authority is limited to preventing the sale of stock of the tenant in execution of the decree, which they will do to such extent as they may see just, and I have no doubt they will not proceed to exercise power unless in exceptional circumstances. The only power is to interfere to prevent a sale.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I agree that we have nothing to do with the policy of the statute referred to at the debate, and that on the record as it stands there is really no question of the defender's liability. But I understood that the record was amended so as to raise formally certain questions which were mentioned at the bar. It was stated at the bar, that under the Crofters Act the Crofters Commission has de facto interfered to suspend action on the defender's part to obtain her rents. It was also, I understood, averred that the Commission received and entertained claims for a revision of the rental, which, if sustained, will, by the Act, draw back to June 1887, prior to the making-up of the Valuation-roll. Now, as to the irrelevancy of these allegations I have the misfortune not to be so clear as your Lordships. I am, for one thing, not in a position to give an opinion on the extent of the powers of the Crofter Commission. The matter was not fully argued, nor is it competently before us. Then I take the case on the footing that de facto the rental has been altered or rendered subject to alteration by a supervening event since the Valuation-roll was made up in September. I should have thought that that raised a serious question on the Valuation Act. That Act, I think, is concerned with valuation only, not with the validity or effect of assessment, but with the amount of the rental on which they are to be calculated, and the manner of imposing them if they are effective.
 Now, I think that if a subject is destroyed by some fire or flood, or suffers alteration in value from an unforeseen cause, the question of the effect of that on the finality of the assessment is not necessarily decided by the Valuation Act.
 I take section 31 of the Valuation Act as affording an illustration of the point of question which arises,—“In all cases where any land or heritages shall be separately let at a rent not amounting to £4 per annum, and the names of the occupiers thereof shall not have been inserted in the Valuation-roll, the proprietor of such lands and heritages shall be charged with and have to pay the whole of the assessments on such lands and heritages separately let as aforesaid, but every such proprietor charged with and paying such assessment shall be relief against the tenants and occupiers of such lands and heritages for reimbursement thereof, if, and in so far as, such assessments may by law be properly chargeable upon such tenants or occupiers." Now, the Crofters Act entitles the crofter to apply to the Crofters Commission both to stay action and diligence, and to revise the rental, and the effect of the applications the defender's crofting tenants have made may draw back to June 1887. It does appear to me that that may affect the landlord's claim against the tenant for relief from the rates paid by him for the tenant under this section. In fact the effect of the Crofters Act has been to make the Valuation-roll not conclusive of the rental against the tenant, and therefore the right of the landlord to relief is interfered with. I think that raises a serious question, but your Lordships differ from me as to this, and I will only say that I do not see my way to concur.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact that the rates sued for were duly assessed according to the Valuation-roll in force at the time: Find in law that the pursuer is entitled to insist for payment thereof accordingly: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against; of new decern in terms of the prayer," &c.

J. MURRAY LAWSON, S.S.C.—STUART & STUART, W.S.—Agents.

R. ROBERTSON & SONS, Petitioners (Appellants).—C. S. Dickson.
ALEXANDER FALCONER, Defender (Respondent).—Strachan.

No. 48.

Dec. 15, 1888.
Robertson & Sons v. Falconer.

Cessio bonorum—Trust-deed for behoof of creditors—Discretion of Sheriff—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 9, subsec. 3.—Sec. 9, subsec. 3, of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, provides that in petitions for cessio, the Sheriff shall "either grant decree decerning the debtor to execute a disposition omnium bonorum to a trustee for behoof of his creditors, or refuse the same in hoc statu, or make such other order as the justice of the case requires."

A creditor of a bankrupt gave notice to him that he was about to present a petition for cessio. The day after the notice was given the bankrupt granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of a person who had been trustee under a previous trust-deed, and to whom he knew the creditor would object. The Sheriff refused decree of cessio on the ground that the estate was almost realised under the trust-deed. The Court, in the circumstances, sustained an appeal at the instance of the petitioner, and remitted to the Sheriff to grant decree of cessio.

R. ROBERTSON & SONS, manufacturers, Glasgow, on 2d October 1888, presented a petition (after notice duly given on 25th September, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, 22d December 1882, anent processes of cessio) in the Sheriff Court at Elgin against Alexander Falconer, tailor there, in which they prayed the Court to appoint a trustee on the defender's estate, and to ordain the defender to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of the trustee.

The petitioners stated that on 21st September 1888 they had charged the defender, on a decree of Court dated 25th July 1888, to pay the sum of £24, 13s., with expenses contained in the decree, that the days of charge had expired without the debt being paid, and that the defender was insolvent, and unable to pay his debts. They further stated that there were three other creditors of the bankrupt.

It appeared from the deposition of the bankrupt, made in presence of the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini), and from the statements of parties, that about 1884 Falconer had granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr Craig, C.A.,

No. 48. Edinburgh, for behoof of his creditors. At that time the petitioners were not creditors of the bankrupt.

Dec. 15, 1888.
Robertson &
Sons v. Falconer.

In the summer of 1888 the petitioners asked Falconer to grant a second trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of a trustee other than Mr Craig. This he refused to do, and on 25th September the appellants gave notice that they were about to petition for cessio. On 26th September Falconer granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr Craig, "because he had my business before."

On 2d November the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender executed a trust-deed on 26th September last in favour of Mr James Craig, C.A., Edinburgh, for behoof of his creditors: Finds that his estate is in process of being realised, and is in fact almost realised under said deed; therefore refuses the prayer of the petition; dismisses the same."*

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellants;—The refusal of the Sheriff to grant decree of cessio was in the circumstances an abuse of the discretion given him by the Debtors Act, 1880.† The trust-deed was granted the very day after notice of the petition for cessio was given, and it was granted in favour of the trustee under the first deed, to whose appointment the appellants objected, and who would have to judge upon any question which might arise with regard to his own actings under the first trust-deed.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff had an absolute discretion as to whether cessio should be granted, and he gave a very good reason in his note why it should be refused in this case. He thought it was best that the estate should be wound up under the trust-deed. The winding-up had gone on satisfactorily so far, and the application made by the appellants was an abuse of the process of cessio.<sup>1</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—If it were not for the discretion given to the Sheriff by the Debtors Act of 1880 (sec. 9, subsec. 3), I should have been clearly of opinion that there was nothing to prevent the creditors represented here by Mr Dickson from refusing to accede to this trust-deed and proceeding to use the diligence of obtaining cessio (for it appears to me that a cessio prosecuted by a creditor is in its nature simply a form of diligence). We must, however, take into account the discretionary power of the Sheriff, and he is of opinion that it is most expedient that the trust-deed should be used here for the distribution of the

---

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute has no difficulty in refusing the prayer of this petition. The estate is all but wound up under the trust-deed of 26th September 1888, and not a word has been said against the manner in which the trustee under that deed has done or is doing his duty. Looking to the fact that cessio is a mere distributive process, and that distribution has already taken place, or nearly so, by another process equally effectual and apparently more agreeable to the debtor and the majority of his creditors, the present application is a mere abuse of the process of this Court, and accordingly the Sheriff-substitute has felt bound to exercise the discretion allowed him by the statutes."

† Sec. 9, subsec. 3, of the Debtors Act, 1880, provides,—“The Sheriff shall on such examination being taken allow a proof to the parties if it shall appear necessary, and hear parties viva voce, and either grant decree decerning the debtor to execute a disposition omnium bonorum to a trustee for behoof of his creditors, or refuse the same in hoc statu, or make such other order as the justice of the case requires. The trustee shall be nominated by the Sheriff on the suggestion of the creditors represented at the meeting for examination, and if they do not agree on a person the Sheriff shall make his own selection.”

<sup>1</sup> Ross v. Hairstens, Nov. 16, 1885, 13 R. 207.

estate. He has therefore decided that decree of cessio should not here be pronounced. I cannot agree with him in that opinion. I think that in any case where a trust-deed is granted under such circumstances as the present any creditor is entitled to object on the ground that it was improperly granted, and ought to have no effect. No. 48.
Dec. 15, 1888.
Robertson &
Sons v. Falconer.

The appellants say that they asked the bankrupt to grant a trust-deed in favour of another person than Mr Craig, in whose favour a trust-deed was subsequently granted, and that the bankrupt refused to do so. In such circumstances it appears to me that these creditors had no alternative but to apply for cessio, or if they were in a position to do so (which they were not) to obtain sequestration of the bankrupt's estates. They did therefore give notice in terms of the Act of Sederunt of 22d December 1882, and the very next day the bankrupt granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr Craig, who was in his confidence, and to him he knew these creditors would object. The Sheriff-substitute now decides that that gentleman is to distribute the estate under the trust-deed, and therefore refuses cessio. I do not think that in the circumstances that decision is justified, or that it falls fairly within the discretion given to the Sheriff by the statute. The advantage which creditors get by obtaining cessio is that the trustee is bound to find caution and to account to the Court for his dealings with the estate, but here, if the trustee were to distribute the estate and obtain his discharge, there would be no security to the creditors that he had duly accounted for the whole estate under his charge. Mr Craig was trustee under a former trust-deed, and if his conduct under that trust-deed were in any way objectionable he would be the only person who could call upon himself to account for his previous intromissions. I think, therefore, we ought to sustain this appeal.

LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutor appealed from, and remit to the Sheriff to grant decree decerning the respondent, Alexander Falconer, as debtor to execute a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of his creditors, and to proceed further in terms of the Statute 43 and 44 Vict. c. 34."

CAIRNS, M'INTOSH, & MORTON, W.S.—PETER DOUGLAS, S.S.C.—Agents.

ARCHIBALD CURRIE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Balfour—Crole.
MRS A. H. PELHAM CLINTON OR CAMPBELL AND OTHERS (Campbell's Trustees), AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—
Gloag—G. R. Gillespie.

No. 49.
Dec. 18, 1888.
Currie v.
Campbell's
Trustees.

Property—Sale—Description by boundaries inconsistent with measurements—Plan.—A feu-contract described the subject by boundaries. It also described it by measurements, and referred to a plan or sketch annexed. The measurements and plan agreed, but they were inconsistent with the boundaries specified. In an action brought by the vassal for declarator that his property extended to the limits shewn by the measurements and plan, held that the description by boundaries must prevail, and defenders assoilzied.

Lord Young dissented, on the ground that the deed and plan having been prepared by the agent for the superior they were to be construed against the superior.

No. 49.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Currie v.
Campbell's
Trustees.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyllshire.
I.

In 1881 Archibald Currie, shoemaker, Tarbert, Argyllshire, applied to the late Colin George Campbell of Stonefield, for a piece of ground in Tarbert upon which to erect a dwelling-house, and a feu-contract was entered into between the parties.

By the feu-contract, which was framed by the proprietor's agent, and was executed in February 1882, the whole subjects feued were described as follows:—"All and Whole that area or piece of ground situated in the town or village of Tarbert aforesaid, bounded on the west by the public street called Kintyre Street, along which it extends 40 feet 9½ inches or thereby; on the north, partly by ground belonging to the said Colin George Campbell, and presently occupied by Finlay Smith and Duncan M'Arthur, along which it extends 41 feet 7 inches or thereby; on the east, partly by the house also belonging to the said Colin George Campbell, and presently occupied by Donald Johnston, fisherman, along which it extends 14 feet 9 inches or thereby; and again on the north, by the said house, along which it extends 20 feet or thereby; and again on the east, partly by Burnside Lane, along which it extends 26 feet 9½ inches or thereby; and on the south, by ground feued to Robert Lyon Dawson, along which it extends to Kintyre Street 62 feet or thereby, as the said area or piece of ground is shewn on a plan or sketch thereof annexed and signed by the parties of even date with the said feu-contract as relative thereto, together with the houses and other buildings erected on the said area or piece of ground."

The plan or sketch referred to was drawn by the proprietor's factor. It had the measurements mentioned in the feu-charter placed upon the appropriate lines, but it was not drawn to scale, and was more of the nature of an illustrative sketch than of a formal plan.

A difficulty subsequently arose as to the boundaries of the feu on the north.* The house occupied by Donald Johnston, fisherman, when the feu-charter was signed, was taken down in 1883, and the site disposed by the superior to Dr M'Millan. In 1886 Currie began to build a wall upon a part of the site as being within his feu, but Mr Campbell obtained interim interdict against his proceeding further.

Currie, in March 1887, brought this action in the Sheriff Court at Campbelltown against Mr Campbell for declarator that the pursuer had the "sole and exclusive right and property of All and Whole that piece of ground situated in the village of Tarbert, bounded on the west," &c. The boundaries narrated in the petition were the same as those stated in the feu-contract, with one exception. In lieu of the words, "and again on the north, by the said house, along which it extends 20 feet or thereby," which were the words used in the feu-contract, the petition contained the following words:—"And again on the north by a stone wall erected by the pursuer on the site of said house, along which it extends 20 feet or thereby."

The defender Mr Campbell and his disponent maintained that no part of the site of Donald Johnston's house was included in the feu.

On 8th April 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Bell) remitted to Alexander Frew, civil engineer, to inspect the premises, and to report. Mr Frew reported that the description by boundaries in the feu-contract did not correspond with the plan and measurements, as the plan shewed the southern boundary of Donald Johnston's house three feet further north than its actual site as shewn in the Ordnance map. The pursuer subsequently admitted that the Ordnance map shewed correctly the site of Donald Johnston's house. Mr Frew prepared the plan referred to by Lord Young.

* The plan shewed the line of the northern boundary drawn eastward at a right angle from the western boundary for 41 feet 7 inches to a point A, where it met at a right angle a line drawn southwards from A to B, representing the western boundary of Donald Johnston's house. The line A to B was marked 14 feet 9 inches. A line drawn eastwards from B to C, representing the southern boundary of Donald Johnston's house, was marked 20 feet.

No. 49.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Currie v.
Campbell's
Trustees.

On 14th October 1887, owing to the death of Mr Campbell, his trustees were sisted as parties to the action.

On 8th May 1888 the Sheriff-substitute gave effect to the defenders' objections, and pronounced findings fixing the boundaries.

The pursuer appealed, and on 23d July 1888 the Sheriff (Forbes Irvine) affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

The pursuer appealed to the Second Division.

Argued for the pursuer;—The plan and the measurements, which agreed with one another, and supported his contention as to the limits of his feu, must prevail over the descriptive boundaries given in the feu-contract.<sup>1</sup> The portion of ground claimed belonged to the defenders, and therefore this was not an error which was incapable of being rectified. Moreover, the superior's agent had prepared the feu-contract and plan, and they should be construed contra proferentem. The superior was therefore responsible for any mistake that had been committed, and was not entitled to take advantage of his agent's actings to the detriment of the pursuer. The removal of Johnston's house was in contemplation at the date of the feu-contract.

Argued for the defenders;—The boundaries were perfectly distinct, and could not be altered by a rough sketch not drawn to scale, and only intended to illustrate the feu-contract. The case was the same as if there had been no plan. If, however, the plan was looked at at all it was in their favour, for it shewed Johnston's house to be outside the feu. The measurements were demonstrative, not taxative. The pursuer would not have had a stateable case but for the fact that the ground in dispute belonged to the defenders. What bounded a feu could not form part of a feu.<sup>2</sup> Besides in 1882 Johnston's house was standing, and the pursuer's boundary could not go through a house which bounded his feu.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to a heritable subject which is of trifling value. The difficulty arises out of the description in the title of the piece of ground feued by the respondents to the appellant. The feu-contract gives a complete description by the boundaries surrounding the feu, but I think there can be no doubt that, if the measurements there given are taken as correct, there is a mistake somewhere. But the gentleman who drew up the feu-contract, with a view to make matters more clear, added to the description by boundary contained in it a description by a plan or sketch. That was a very reasonable and sensible thing to do, if it had been well done; but there can be no doubt that the addition of this sketch has been the origin of the present dispute. If no sketch had been added, there would have been no difficulty in ascertaining what the boundaries were, and they would have been the boundaries contended for by the respondents. The question therefore comes to be, which of these is to rule,—the sketch or plan attached to the feu-contract, which is without any scale at all, or the boundaries as they are described by the names of the subjects surrounding the feu? The question is a difficult one

<sup>1</sup> North British Railway Co. v. Magistrates of Hawick, Dec. 19, 1862, 1 Macph. 200, 35 Scot. Jur. 94; North British Railway Co. v. Brown's Trustees, Feb. 8, 1879, 6 R. 640.

<sup>2</sup> Reid, &c. v. M'Coll, Oct. 25, 1879, 7 R. 84.

No. 49.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Currie v.
Campbell's
Trustees.

as it stands with this informal sketch, and would have been still more difficult if the sketch had been elaborately drawn to scale. I have, however, come to be of opinion that the boundaries, as given in the description in the feu-contract, must prevail over the sketch, which, I think, must be taken as merely illustrative of the description by boundaries.

LORD YOUNG.—I assent to the proposition as generally true, that where boundaries and measurement conflict in the description of a subject, the boundaries must prevail. I think, however, that that is only a general rule, adopted because experience has taught the Court that it generally leads to the true conclusion as to the meaning and intention of the parties. If a field or estate of any dimensions is conveyed by distinctly specified boundaries, these will not be excluded and other boundaries substituted in order to satisfy the state of the measurements, which may be wrong to the extent of feet, yards, or acres. That error must be submitted to, and the intention of the parties as to the subjects really conveyed given effect to, although somewhat in excess or somewhat short of the measurements. This is not, however, a case of that kind. This is a feuing stance conveyed to a feuar by the proprietor, the feu-contract being prepared by the proprietor's man of business, and the subject having been laid off on the ground, and the drawing made by his factor. It happens that the description of the subject by boundaries in the deed does not correspond with the measurements there given and with the plan. The plan, however, or sketch—it is immaterial which it is called, as it is the only kind of plan appropriate here—is one on which the direction and measurement of each line is given and marked down, so that a surveyor, to whom a remit was made by the Sheriff-substitute, had no difficulty in adapting the plan to the ground. His plan gives the very direction and the very dimensions indicated in the sketch, but it is said it does not answer to the description contained in the deed. How? Only in the matter of boundaries, for the measurements are all in accordance with the measurements contained in the feu-contract. It is contended for the proprietor, whose man of business framed the deed, and whose factor drew the sketch or plan, that there is to be an interpretation between the deed and sketch which will give the feuar a different subject both in boundaries and measurements from that laid down in the sketch.

Now, there is a maxim of our law to which I adverted in the course of the argument, and which is, I think, applicable here—verba cartarum fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem. This maxim has been interpreted so as to apply against the man who prepared the deeds. Here the proprietor's man of business is responsible for the deed and his factor for the sketch, and in determining whether the description of the boundaries or the measurements are to be given effect to, I should interpret most strongly against the superior and his man of business and factor rather than against the feuar, who is entirely innocent in the matter. On the whole matter, I am for giving the pursuer the decree he asks.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The pursuer feued a piece of ground from Mr Campbell of Stonefield, the predecessor of the defenders. Before he obtained his feu-disposition he built a house on part of it. His title was ultimately completed in 1882, and the ground was disposed to him with the buildings erected thereon.

In so far as the pursuer has built on the ground his title cannot be disputed.

It appears, however, that a house which belonged to Mr Campbell, and which at the date of the feu-disposition was occupied by Donald Johnston, was pulled down. The pursuer claims a part of the site of this house as being conveyed to him by his feu-disposition. The only question in the case is whether this claim is well founded.

No. 49.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Currie v.
Campbell's
Trustees.

In order to have his right declared the pursuer has raised this action. He asks the Court to declare that he has the sole and exclusive right to the area of ground described in the petition. The boundaries therein given are the same as those contained in the feu-disposition, with one exception. In the disposition the boundary with respect to which the dispute arises is this,—“On the east partly by the house also belonging to the said Colin G. Campbell, and presently occupied by Donald Johnston, fisherman, along which it extends 14 feet 9 inches or thereby, and again on the north by the same house, along which it extends 20 feet or thereby.” In place of this boundary the pursuer introduces into his petition the following words,—“And again on the north by a stone wall erected by the pursuer on the site of said house, along which it extends 20 feet or thereby.” The question is, whether the pursuer is entitled to have decree of declarator in terms of the new boundary which he has substituted for the boundary contained in the disposition.

The portion of the south gable of Johnston's house is known and admitted. It is further conceded by the pursuer that his claim in this action involves a claim to a portion of the site of this house. But he says that his feu was given out according to a plan appended to the disposition, and that the area thereon on the plan, and defined by the measurements contained in the disposition itself, comprehends the ground which he claims in this case.

The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that Johnston's house is the northern boundary of the pursuer's feu, and that no part of that house is comprehended within it.

I take it to be settled law that what is described as the boundary of a feu in the feu-disposition which creates it is by that very fact excluded from the feu. There may be exceptions where the boundary is a river or a wood. But with such exceptions we have here nothing to do. The northern boundary of the pursuer's feu is Johnston's house. Hence I think it clear that according to the disposition no part of that house or of its site was included within the pursuer's feu.

Nor is the plan inconsistent with the disposition. It shews, and I think that it was designed to shew, that Johnston's house was wholly excluded from the feu given out to the pursuer.

The pursuer relies on the measurements contained in the disposition and also transferred to the plan. And there is no question that, according to the view which I take of the case, certain of these measurements are wrong. Johnston's house is the boundary partly on the east and partly on the north, cutting out a corner from what would otherwise be a quadrilateral figure. Measuring along Johnston's house on the east, the true length of the east boundary at that part should be 17 feet 9 inches or thereby, instead of 14 feet 9 as given in the disposition, and of course there is a corresponding error in the other portion of the eastern boundary. I cannot, however, adopt these measurements to the effect of giving to the pursuer ground which I think was plainly excluded from his feu. The boundaries given in the feu-disposition must, in my opinion, prevail. To my mind it is plain, both from the disposition and the plan, that Johnston's

No. 49.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Currie v.
Campbell's
Trustees.

house was wholly excluded from the feu, and as the measurements would include a part of it, I must hold that this was wrong. An error of that kind may easily be made. I cannot hold that the measurements are right to the effect of assigning to the pursuer a piece of ground which the disposition expressly declares to be excluded from it.

For these reasons I think that we cannot give declarator in terms of the prayer of the petition, and therefore that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. In pronouncing this decree we decide the only question which has been raised, and even if it were desirable to pronounce any other form of decree we have not the means of doing so, inasmuch as the parties, when they were before us, renounced all further probation.

LORD LEE.—My opinion is that the Court in this case is not called on either to make a new plan or a new description, and that we ought not to deal with any point excepting that which was raised by the defenders' objection to those words of the prayer which substitute a new boundary instead of Donald Johnston's house. On that point I concur with the majority of your Lordships. We can only gather the intention of parties by construing the contract according to the ordinary rules. It appears to me that the one point clearly ascertained by the terms of the title is, that the feu did not include any part of Johnston's house. That house is not only described as a boundary in the feu-contract, but is also shewn in the plan or sketch referred to as outside the boundary of the feu. Upon this point there is no conflict between the words of the description and the plan or sketch. There is a slight discrepancy elsewhere in the measurement or on the sketch, but as to such discrepancy my opinion is that the description by boundaries according to the usual rule must prevail.

I therefore think that on the only point in controversy the defenders are entitled to prevail.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 8th May 1888, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff on 23d July following: Find that no part of Donald Johnston's house is included in the feu given off by the late Colin George Campbell, author of the defenders, to the pursuer: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the petition: Find them entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court," &c.

R. R. SIMPSON & LAWSON, W.S.—TAWSE & BONAR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 50.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Dick & Stevenson
v. Woodside Steel and
Iron Co.

DICK & STEVENSON, Pursuers (Respondents).—Balfour—Jameson.
WOODSIDE STEEL AND IRON COMPANY, AND JOHN ALLAN AND JAMES ALLAN Junior, Defenders (Appellants).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Ure.

Contract—Executory Contract—Damages—Defence.—An engineer undertook in February 1883 to erect an engine on the premises of a manufacturer for a price payable one-half when the principal parts were delivered, one-fourth on the engine being started, and the remaining one-fourth three months thereafter. On 3d December 1883 the principal parts were delivered, and the first instalment of the price was paid. The engine was started on 30th September 1886, prior to which time part of the second instalment had been paid.

In an action by the engineer for payment of the remainder of this instalment the manufacturer pleaded that he was not liable in the sum sued for in respect that the engine furnished was disconform to contract, and was worth less than the engine contracted for to an extent exceeding the sum sued for. Held No. 50.

 that the statement that the pursuer by supplying an inferior engine had not fulfilled his contract, and that the defender was in consequence entitled to an abatement of the price, was a relevant defence (seeing that the remedy of rejection was not available) to a demand for the whole price, but that as the abatement claimed was more than covered by the last instalment of the price it could not be sustained as an answer to the demand for payment of the second instalment.

Dec. 18, 1888.
 Dick & Stevenson v. Woodside Steel and Iron Co.

Res noviter.—Observations on res noviter.

In February 1883 Dick & Stevenson, engineers, Airdrie, contracted to supply to the Woodside Steel and Iron Company a three cylinder engine with Stevenson's Patent Conical Reversing Rolling Mill Clutches. The contract, which was contained in letters of specification and acceptance, provided that the engine was to be of the best description in materials and workmanship, and to be erected at the Woodside Company's works at Coatbridge on a foundation to be supplied by them. The price, £2830, was to be "one-half payable when the principal parts of the materials of the engine and gearing are delivered at place of erection, one-fourth on the same being started, and the remaining one-fourth within three months thereafter." The date at which the engine was to be delivered was not stated.

2d Division.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
 M.

Dick & Stevenson undertook to uphold the machinery to be supplied for twelve months from the date of starting, and that the whole would be left by them in as good order at the end of twelve months from the date of starting as at first, except ordinary tear and wear.

The contractors proceeded to construct and fit up the engine. The principal parts of the engine and gearing were delivered at the place of erection prior to December 1883, and on 3d December 1883 the Woodside Company paid £1000, and on 16th May 1884 £400, to account of the half of the price payable when the principal parts were delivered, leaving a balance of £15 of that half still unpaid.

Work under the contract thereafter proceeded, and the engine and gearing were started on 30th September 1886, when one-fourth of the contract price, £707, 10s., became payable. On 25th January 1885 an interim payment of £250 had been made by the pursuers, leaving only £457, 10s. of the £707, 10s. payable on 30th September 1886.

In November 1886 Dick & Stevenson raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie against the Woodside Company, and John Allan and others, the individual partners thereof, for payment of £472, 10s., consisting of these two sums of £457, 10s. and £15.

They stated in their condescendence the facts above mentioned, which were admitted. They further stated that the remaining fourth of the price would fall due on 1st December 1886.

The defenders averred (Stat. 1) that "according to the representations of the pursuers, the engine and gearing in question should have been delivered to these defenders in the months of June and July 1883, and should have been started and ready for work by the end of July in that year. In the absence of such representations and assurances, the period between the date of the said contract and the end of July 1883 was a fair and reasonable time to enable the pursuers to make delivery and fit up the engine and gearing contracted for, and these defenders relied upon their so doing."

The defenders further averred that the pursuers did not begin to lay down the engine and gearing in the defenders' works till October 1883, and did not complete the delivery of the principal parts till the spring of 1884; further, that the engine and gearing were not according to contract,

No. 50.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Dick & Stevenson v. Woodside Steel and Iron Co.

in respect that in addition to the six helical wheels with which the engine was to be supplied, the pursuers had supplied three bevel wheels, which increased the friction and tear and wear of the machine; further, that under the contract the engine was to have high-speed governors, and that the pursuers had supplied these but had found that they would not work, and had removed them, with the result that the defenders had been obliged to employ a man night and day to do the work which properly constructed high-speed governors would have done. "The engine and gearing are in these respects worth less by upwards of £472, 10s. than those contracted for." They (the defenders) further averred that they "have sustained loss and damage through the pursuers' delay in completing their contract to the amount of upwards of £4000, which sum these defenders claim to set off against the balance of the contract price."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The engine and gearing in question not being yet completed in terms of the contract, the pursuers are not entitled to any further payments to account. (2) These defenders having sustained loss and damage through the pursuers' failure timeously to implement their contract, they are entitled to set off such loss and damage against the contract price. (3) The engine and gearing not being conform to contract, and the pursuers having refused or failed to complete the same, these defenders are entitled to deduct from the contract price the difference in value to them between the engine and gearing as delivered and said price.

The pursuers pleaded that the defences were irrelevant.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mair), on 16th December 1886, repelled the defences, and gave decree as concluded for, subject to a deduction of £13, 4s., which the pursuers admitted.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff.

When the case was before the Sheriff the defenders obtained leave to lodge a condescendence of res noviter.

They lodged a condescendence, in which they averred, inter alia;—"On or about 19th May 1887, while the defenders were working the engines and gearing in question, they broke down." The parts of the machinery which were broken were then specified. "The said breakdown was the result of the original defect in the engines above stated, viz., that they would not work simultaneously, and of the inadequacy of the remedy for this defect attempted by the pursuers, and shewed that the defenders' objections to accept the engines . . . were well founded.

"On or about 29th August 1887 the collar on the main shaft of the engines . . . became loose. The defenders thereupon discovered that said collar had been shrunk on, whereas it ought to have been forged solid with the shaft, as the whole pressure of the friction clutch depended on the solidity of this collar.

"The defects narrated . . . were discovered, and could only be discovered, by the defenders after the machinery had been tested by work, and on the dates and in the manner above mentioned."

The Sheriff (Berry), on 7th March 1888, refused a proof of the condescendence of res noviter, and adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—Both branches of the defence were relevant. The pursuers were not entitled to decree, because they had not fulfilled their part of the contract by reason of their great delay. The engine should have been ready in July 1883, for though no precise time was stipulated that was a reasonable time, as the defenders were ready to prove, and where parties had not stipulated a precise time for performance of an obligation the Court would hold that a reasonable time was part of the bargain. But the engine had not been delivered as ready till September 1886. In the second place, the pursuers were in breach of contract in having failed to supply the machinery contracted for. The defenders had alleged in detail the points, viz., the bevel wheels and the defective governors, in consequence of which they averred that the engine and gearing were worth less by the whole sum sued for than those they had contracted for. The guarantee clause of the contract implied that the machine was to be complete and ready for work when it was started, and should be kept in good order. But the pursuers were suing for payment of the price without having kept it in good order.

Argued for the pursuers;—The defence was irrelevant. It was simply an attempt to retain the contract price till an illiquid claim for damages could be made liquid. On the question of alleged delay, the cases of McBride<sup>1</sup> and Pegler,<sup>2</sup> which decided that where no time is expressly mentioned within which work is to be completed a claim for damages on the ground that the work was not completed within a reasonable time cannot be pleaded ope exceptionis, were fatal to the defenders. As to the second ground of defence, that the defenders were entitled to an abatement of the price, it could not be sustained, for even assuming it to be good there remained due under the contract another instalment of £707, which exceeded the abatement claimed. The alleged res noviter was not properly res noviter. It consisted of allegations of events which were said to have happened after the action was raised, and ought not to have been added to the record.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK.—The contract does not specify any time within which the engine and gearing were to be delivered. It was therefore conceded by the defenders that they could not retain the instalment of the price sued for in this action against any loss which had been caused by reason of the delivery having been unduly delayed. They took this point to be settled by authority, and we need not further consider it.

But the defenders contended that the engine and gearing were not in various particulars conform to contract, and that they were in consequence of less value by “upwards of £472, 10s. than those contracted for.” The pursuers answered that this was an illiquid claim, which could not be set off against a liquid claim.

In my judgment, the plea maintained by the defenders is not properly a plea of compensation. It is based on the consideration that the article contracted for was not furnished, and that the price is not due. In a proper contract of sale the remedy of the buyer would be to reject. But this remedy is not applicable in the case of an executorial contract like the present. Inasmuch as the article cannot or need not be returned, the remedy must consist in a right to refuse to pay more than its true value. In other words the seller cannot claim the contract price, if the article furnished is not conform to contract, and the buyer must be entitled to deduct the sum which represents the difference between the value of the article contracted for and that actually furnished. The defence therefore is not a plea of compensation. If well founded, it proves that the price sued for is not due.

Nor do I think that the defenders’ claim for abatement can be met by the

<sup>1</sup> McBride v. Hamilton, June 11, 1875, 2 R. 775.

<sup>2</sup> Pegler v. Northern Agricultural Implement Co., Feb. 2, 1877, 4 R. 435; cf. Taylor v. Forbes, Dec. 2, 1830, 9 Shaw, 113.

No. 50.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Dick & Stevenson v. Woodside Steel and Iron Co.

plea that they have their proper remedy under that clause of the contract which provides that the pursuers shall uphold the machinery and make good defects for twelve months from the time of starting. This clause assumes that the contract engine and gearing have been furnished, and imposes on the pursuers the additional obligation of maintenance.

It seems to me therefore that the defenders have so far stated a relevant defence when they say that the article supplied was not according to contract and was of less value than the article contracted for by £472, 10s. They say "upwards" of that sum. But I cannot attach any meaning to that phrase, and for the purposes of this case I must disregard it.

The question now comes to be, whether in the face of that defence the pursuers are entitled to the decree for which they ask; and some important matters have to be considered under this head.

By the contract one-half of the price was to be payable when the principal parts of the materials of the engines and gearing were delivered, one-fourth on the same being started, and the remaining fourth within three months thereafter. The engines were started on 30th September 1886, and the sum sued for is the balance of the instalment which then became due—a portion of that instalment having, it appears, been previously paid. There remains due the fourth instalment, amounting to £707, 10s.

The instalment sued for was thus due at a fixed date, and should have been paid, unless there was a sufficient defence to the contrary. The only defence—which is in any way relevant—is, that the engine as furnished was of less value by £472, 10s. than the engine contracted for. I should have held this to be a relevant defence, to the effect that the defenders could not have been required to pay the whole contract price until their allegations had been inquired into, because, in my opinion, it means that the contract price is not due to the amount above stated. But I do not think that it has any further virtue. For it acknowledges that the contract price is due except to that extent, and considering that another instalment became due in the course of three months, which exceeded the sum which the defenders claim to have abated from the price, I think that the defence is not sufficient, and that the pursuers are entitled to decree. The last instalment more than covers the abatement which they claim.

I have hitherto considered the original defence only. But after the Sheriff-substitute had decided in favour of the pursuers, the defenders were allowed to put in a condescendence of res noviter.

I do not think that discoveries of defects after the instalment was payable form a relevant defence. On the record as it originally stood the pursuers were, in my opinion, entitled to decree. The engine had been started, and the instalment was then due. The only reason assigned against paying it was that an abatement was claimed. But, as has been seen, that abatement was claimed not against the instalment alone, but against the whole price, of which more than the abatement was shortly to become due. As that was, in my opinion, an insufficient defence, the defenders were bound to pay the sum sued for. I think that the additional condescendence should not have been allowed, nor is it relevant; for, in my opinion, the right of the pursuers to recover was to be determined by reference to the defences, which were stated and were stateable when the instalment became due. It is said that the defects in the engine were only discoverable after it had been some time in use. But that means nothing else than that the defenders could not assign other reasons for not paying the instalment which had become due, and their delay in satisfying their obligation cannot I think place them in a better position. No. 50.

I think therefore that the pursuers are entitled to decree. But I decide nothing more than that they are entitled in the meantime to payment of the sum sued for. All claims on either side will be reserved, and if it be eventually found that the defenders are entitled to a larger abatement, the fact that they have paid the sum sued for will form no bar to the just settlement of the claims. The pursuers will be bound to repeat, if it be ascertained that they have received more than is justly due to them.

LORD YOUNG and LORD LEE concurred.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK not having heard the argument gave no opinion.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . dismiss the appeal; affirm the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff appealed against, reserving quoad ultra all pleas hinc inde: Of new ordain the defenders the Woodside Steel and Iron Company, and John Allan and James Allan junior, individual partners of that company, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £472, 10s., under deduction of £13, 4s., with the legal interest of £472, 10s. from 30th September 1886 till paid: Find the said defenders liable in expenses," &c.

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

RACHEL TAWSE OR MORRISON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Sol.-Gen. Darling— No. 51.
Chisholm.

HELEN STEELE OR TAWSE (James Tawse's Executrix), Defender (Respondent).—Rhind—Baxter.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Morrison v.
Tawse's
Executrix.

Husband and Wife—Wife's separate estate—Earnings of wife in business carried on by her—Married Women's Property Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 29), sec. 3.—The Married Women's Property Act, 1877, by section 3 excludes the jus mariti and right of administration of the husband from the wages and earnings of every married woman acquired by her after 1st January 1878, "in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or in any business which she carries on under her own name."

A wife living with her husband carried on in the house in which they lived the business of a washerwoman. She put her own and her husband's earnings, which were about equal in amount, into a common purse, from which the expenses of the household were defrayed, and she placed their savings from their joint earnings in deposit-receipts, repayable "to either of them and the survivor." The husband predeceased the wife. Held (diss. Lord Young) that one-half of the sums so deposited belonged to his widow in her own right, in virtue of the provisions of the Act.

Husband and Wife—Aliment to widow out of husband's estate.—A husband died, leaving a will by which he gave his widow a liferent of his whole estate, with power to appropriate such part of the capital as from time to time she should think necessary for her maintenance. Some months after the husband's death a child claimed legitim. Held that the widow was not entitled in the accounting for legitim to credit for aliment out of the estate from her husband's death till the demand for legitim was made.

JAMES TAWSE, bleacher, Downfield, near Dundee, died on 6th September 1886. He was survived by his second wife, Helen Steele or Tawse, and by one child, a daughter by his first marriage, Mrs Rachel Tawse or Morrison. 2D DIVISION
Sheriff of For-
farshire.
I.

Tawse left a settlement, whereby he nominated his widow his execu-

No. 51.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Morrison v.
Tawse's
Executrix.

trix, and provided that she should have a liferent of his whole estate, and should also be entitled from time to time as she should think necessary to use and appropriate such parts of the capital of the trust-estate as she might require for her own personal use and maintenance. The residue after her death was to be divided into three shares, of which one was to belong to Mrs Morrison.

Prior to his death Tawse had resided in a house which belonged to Mrs Morrison, his daughter, and for which he paid her a rent of about £7 a-year. His widow continued to reside in it.

After the death of Tawse, Mrs Morrison raised the rent to £14.

In July 1887 Mrs Morrison brought an action of accounting against Mrs Tawse in the Sheriff Court at Dundee, and claiming her legitim.

The defender admitted the pursuer's right to legitim, and the questions in dispute related to the amount of the estate of the deceased, and to the credit the defender was entitled to receive for claims made by her in the accounting. She maintained that the estate embraced the half only, and not the whole of certain funds in bank said by the pursuer to belong to the estate, and she also put forward a claim to be alimented out of the estate for the period between the death of her husband and the raising of the action.

The following facts were proved: Tawse was married to the defender in 1868. Shortly thereafter he obtained a legacy of £40 from the estate of his first wife's father, and in February 1870 he received payment of £200 contained in a policy of insurance on the life of a son who died then. It was not proved that he had any means at the date of his marriage with the defender in 1868, and the defender led evidence to the effect that he had not. The defender had at the time of her marriage about £104.

The pursuer's house was repaired at considerable cost by the spouses after their marriage, and a washing-house was added to it. In consideration of these improvements no rent was charged for five years.

After the marriage the defender continued her business as a washer-woman. In her evidence she stated her earnings at 28s. to 30s. per week. Tawse himself continued his own trade, and earned from 20s. to 23s. per week till the beginning of 1886, the last year of his life, when his health failed. Mrs Tawse put into one purse her own and her husband's earnings, out of which their whole expenses, including those of the washing business, were defrayed. The savings of the spouses, together with their other funds, were for some time placed on deposit-receipt with the National Bank, payable "to either and the survivor." In 1881 they uplifted this money, which amounted to £400, and placed it with the Dundee Provident Property Investment Company, on a deposit-receipt repayable "to either or survivor." Thereafter they lodged their savings in two accounts with the Dundee Savings Bank. These accounts were both kept in their joint names, "to be repaid to either of them and the survivor." The amount in these accounts at the death of Tawse was, including interest to the date of the action, £261, 16s. 6d. The Investment Company went into liquidation in March 1884. Their claim against it amounted, with interest, to £414, 16s. 10d. They received a dividend of 2s. 6d. per pound, and a further dividend of 5s. per pound was believed to be recoverable, but had not yet been obtained at the date of this action.

The defender claimed credit, first, for one half the amount in the Savings Bank as being her own money, and maintained that the other half only belonged to the executry estate, and was subject to the pursuer's claim for legitim. She also claimed aliment against the estate for the period from the death of Tawse till the raising of the action—a period of forty-five weeks. This claim at 12s. 6d. per week amounted to £28, 2s. 6d. No. 51.

 She further maintained that one half only of what might be recovered from the liquidator of the Investment Company belonged to the executry estate, and that the other half was her own property.

Dec. 18, 1888.
 Morrison v.
 Tawse's
 Executrix.

The defender pleaded;—3. The defender is, as well (1) in respect of the terms of and circumstances attending the lodgment of the foresaid sums in said banks and with the said Investment Company, as (2) under the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1877,* entitled to at least one-half of the said sums in her own right; and that over and above her legal or conventional rights, and prior to any division for ascertaining the amount, if any, to which the pursuer, Rachel Tawse or Morrison, may be entitled as legitim.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith), on 12th January 1888, found with regard to the "£261, 16s. 6d. due by the Dundee Savings Bank to James Tawse and Helen Steele, his wife, to be repaid to either of them and the survivor, that the defender is bound to give the estate credit for the whole of said sum, and not merely for the half of it, in respect of failure to prove that one-half of said sum had become her property by donation or otherwise, or even to prove that the deceased knew of the distinct terms of the receipt for the money taken by her from said bank, when she, as keeper of the household purse, deposited the money in bank: Finds, with regard to £362, 19s. 9d. of money due by the Dundee Provident Property Investment Company to the said deceased and his said wife, and payable to either or the survivor, that the defender has by facts and circumstances established her title to one-half of said debt—having proved more particularly that at the time of her marriage she was possessed of about £100; that she earned a considerable income by washing and dressing clothes; and that the deceased knew that her written title to said sum was a title joint with his own, and with such knowledge acquiesced in said title: Finds that the widow's claim for aliment falls to be disallowed to the extent of £25: . . . Finds that the estate realised by the defender amounts to £261, 16s. 6d., and that the amount of moneys disbursed by her, for which she is entitled to take credit, is £41, 6s. 11d.: That therefore the estate at present divisible into thirds is £220, 9s. 9d.: Decerns against the defender for one-third of said sum, being £73, 9s. 11d.: Further, finds the pursuer entitled to a sixth share of the debt due to the deceased and the defender by the Dundee Provident Property Investment Company, conform to acknowledgment dated 11th April 1881."†

* The Married Women's Property Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 29), which came into operation on 1st January 1878, enacts (sec. 3),—"The jus mariti and right of administration of the husband shall be excluded from the wages and earnings of every married woman, acquired or gained by her after the commencement of this Act, in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or in any business which she carries on under her own name, . . . and such wages, earnings, . . . and all investments thereof shall be deemed to be settled to her sole and separate use, and her receipts shall be a good discharge for such wages, earnings, . . . and investments thereof."

† "NOTE.— . . . I am not able to see my way to apply the Married Women's Property Act of 1877 to the earnings of a washerwoman who works her business in her husband's premises, burns his coals, and perhaps in her eagerness to earn money neglects to cook his dinner or make his bed. If the wife be free to choose her own occupation, and to keep all her own wages, I think the husband ought to have due warning of the kind of partnership in which he is involved, and ought to have an opportunity of expressing either

No. 51.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Morrison v.
Tawse's
Executrix.

On appeal; the Sheriff (Thomson), on 7th March 1888, recalled that interlocutor to the effect, inter alia, of sustaining the defender's claim for aliment to the amount of 7s. 6d. per week for forty-five weeks, and of finding that by virtue of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, sec. 3, the jus mariti and right of administration of the defender's husband were excluded from the defender's earnings as a washerwoman from 1st January 1878, and appointed the defender to lodge a statement of what she maintained to be the amount of said earnings.

The defender lodged a note of her earnings, whereby she set forth that she had earned £400 between 1st January 1878 and 6th September 1886, the date of her husband's death. Deducting £100 for cost of gas, coals, &c. during that period, she claimed credit for £300.

After considering this statement and answers lodged by the pursuer, the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding that the defender was entitled to credit, inter alia (1) for £175, "being the amount to which" she "was entitled as earnings as a washerwoman from 1st January 1878, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration"; further (2) that she was entitled to credit for £16, 17s. 6d., being aliment at 7s. 6d. per week for the period from the death of her husband to the raising of the action; that the estate amounted to £261, 16s. 6d.; and that after deducting therefrom the various items falling to be credited to the defender, there remained for division a balance of £26, 12s. 1d., to one-third of which balance—£8, 17s. 4d.—the pursuer was entitled, and for which sum he gave decree.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The Married Women's Property Act, 1877, was only intended to apply to cases in which a wife carried on a separate business from her husband, and kept the funds earned in it separate from his funds. A wife might earn money and so have a separate right to it, but might then proceed to employ it for the common purposes of the household, and mix it with the husband's funds. That was to surrender the statutory protection by giving the husband power to treat the funds so earned as his own. That was what the defender had done. She had given her husband, with whom she was living in family, full power over her earnings, and they had been placed on deposit-receipts so expressed as to give him full power to uplift them and apply the proceeds as he pleased. If he had done so there would have been no claim for repetition on the defender's part.

The claim the defender made to be alimented out of the estate, including the legitim fund, could not in the circumstances be maintained. She was executrix, claiming under the settlement, and entitled only to what the settlement gave her after deducting legitim.

Argued for the defender;—The Married Women's Property Act gave a married woman in the defender's circumstances her earnings as her own property. It made no difference that the wife had after earning her separate estate joined her husband in depositing it in bank, and placing there money which she might have kept in her own hands. The joint investment only left the rights of the spouses as they originally stood.<sup>1</sup> The case on the other side was one of a transference of the defender's money to the husband. But even if that had been done as matter of assent or dissent. At all events, if their interest be to be separated, their accounts ought to be kept separate. But in this particular household there were no separate accounts; there was not even a separate purse for husband and wife."

<sup>1</sup> Bank of Scotland v. Robertson, Jan. 12, 1870, 8 Macph. 391, 42 Scot. Jur. 180.

fact by donation, she could have revoked it even after his death.<sup>1</sup> The defender was entitled to aliment out of the estate of her husband as it stood at his death down to the period when the operation of his settlement was disturbed by the raising of the action for legitim, because aliment to the widow until her provisions by will or marriage-contract took effect was a debt of the husband.<sup>2</sup>

At advising,—

LORD LEE.—The question in this case is, what is the amount of the estate of the late James Tawse, for which the defender, as his widow and executrix, is accountable in a question with the pursuer, who claims her legitim?

Two points have been discussed under this appeal which affect that question—the first being whether the defender is entitled to distinguish and separate from her husband's estate the amount of her earnings as a washerwoman since 1st January 1878, when the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, came into operation; and the second being as to her claim to alimony out of her husband's estate up to the term after his death, which occurred on 6th September 1886.

The facts bearing upon the first point are as follows: After her marriage in 1868 to James Tawse, the defender, who was a washerwoman, continued to take in washing and to follow the occupation of a washerwoman. Her husband was a bleacher, earning from 18s. to 24s. a-week. She had brought her husband a little money and a part of it was spent in building a washing-house attached to the house in which they lived; and the evidence clearly shews that her husband allowed her to follow her occupation in this place, and thereby to gain earnings which are proved to have amounted to 24s. per week, and sometimes to as much as 28s. Her earnings in this way (after deducting expenses) appear to have been at least equal to those of her husband. She took charge of his earnings as well as her own, the balance, after paying what was required for the house, being lodged in bank in the joint names of the spouses, "payable to either and the survivor." In 1881 the money so deposited, along with a sum the husband had received under a policy of insurance upon the life of his son, was invested in a building society in the same terms. This investment proved unfortunate. The building society went into liquidation, and a dividend amounting to £51, 17s. is all that has been received upon the joint claim, leaving a balance unpaid of £362, 19s., which is supposed to be worth 5s. in the pound. The earnings subsequently to April 1881 were deposited in the Savings Bank in similar terms, the defender still taking charge of the money and keeping the books. The result has been that over and above the amount due by the building society there are two deposit-receipts, amounting in all, with interest, to £261, 16s. 6d., payable to either of the spouses and the survivor. This sum is the proceeds of the earnings of both of them. Assuming that the house expenses were paid equally out of the earnings of each (and there is no ground for supposing that the wife paid more than half) it is evident that at least one-half of the amount must have arisen from the defender's earnings. The question is, whether the amount of her earnings, so far as not expended, is her property by virtue of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, and is separable by her

No. 51.
Dec. 18, 1888.
Morrison v.
Tawse's
Executrix.

<sup>1</sup> Fraser on Husband and Wife, vol. ii. p. 950; Laidlaw v. Laidlaw's Trustees, Dec. 16, 1882, 10 R. 374.

<sup>2</sup> Baronesse de Blonay v. Oswald's Representatives, July 17, 1863, 1 Macph. 1147.

No. 51.
 Dec. 18, 1888.
 Morrison v.
 Tawse's
 Executrix.

from the amount belonging to her husband's estate? The Sheriff-substitutor answered that question in the negative, holding apparently that the statute was inapplicable to the earnings of a wife unless kept separate. For he decided against the defender "in respect of failure to prove that one-half of said estate had become her property by donation or otherwise," adding in his note that if the interest of the spouses were to be separated their accounts ought to have been kept separate. The Sheriff took a different view, and sustained the defender's claim to the effect of separating her earnings from her husband's estate. My opinion agrees with that of the Sheriff. I think that the statute is not limited to cases where the wife's earnings are kept separate, and that these being protected from the operation of the statute may be claimed by her in so far as they can be traced and distinguished like any other separate estate belonging to a wife, from which the jus mariti is excluded.

There may be cases (like Edward v. Baxter's Trustees, 13 R. 1209, aff'd 13 R. 37, 13 App. Ca. 385) where a wife's separate estate, or the income derived from it, has been so dealt with as to raise a presumption that it has been applied to a purpose of the wife's or to which she was a party. But in the present case the first question is whether the statute applied to the defender's earnings to the effect of saving them from the jus mariti? Upon that question my opinion is that the statute was applicable. It applies to the earnings of any married woman "acquired or gained by her after the commencement of this Act, in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she was engaged." In this case the exclusion of the husband's right of administration was of no consequence, because according to the evidence the husband did not exercise his right of administration. The terms of the deposit-receipts applied to have been settled by the wife with his consent or approval.

The next question is whether the terms of the deposit-receipts imply a renunciation by the wife of her right to these earnings as her own separate estate? This question, I think, must be answered in the same way as if the estate in question had been a separate estate belonging to the wife in any other way; and I see no reason for ascribing to the terms of the deposit-receipts a different or higher effect as regards the wife's separate estate than such a deposit-receipt would imply as to the husband's estate. It does not imply either case donation either de presenti or mortis causa. In both cases it leaves it open to the proprietor to vindicate his or her separate right in so far as the subject of that right is traceable.

If the wife's separate income from her own earnings had been paid over to the husband, or placed to the credit of his bank account, a different question would have arisen. In such a case donation might be presumed. But even in that case the doctrine laid down in the House of Lords in Edward v. Baxter's Trustees, 13 App. Ca. 385, 15 R. (H. L.) 37, would have enabled the defender to reclaim her earnings so far as not consumed. The doctrine as stated in that case is this—"By the law of Scotland, as well as by that of England, a married woman may make an effectual gift of her separate income to her husband, with the difference that by Scotch law she has the privilege, even after her husband's death, of reclaiming the subject of her gift in so far as it has not been bona fide consumed."

In the present case, however, there was nothing, in my opinion, from which a gift can be presumed, and I therefore think that the defender is entitled to have separate from her husband's estate the amount of her earnings included in the deposit-receipts. Upon the evidence my opinion is, as I have already said, that the sum in these deposit-receipts must have consisted of her earnings to the extent of at least one-half—that is £130, 18s. With this variation in amount, I think that the Sheriff's interlocutor allowing a deduction on account of the defender's earnings ought to be affirmed.

No. 51.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Morrison v.
Tawse's
Executrix.

As to the defender's claim in name of alimony, my opinion is that it cannot be sustained. The case of De Blonay v. Oswald, 1 Macph. 1147, which was referred to in support of the claim, appears to me to be adverse to it in the case of a wife who takes her husband's estate under such a settlement as that which in this case has been executed in the defender's favour.

There was one point not argued which does not stand very clear upon the interlocutors of the Sheriffs. I refer to the debt due by the Dundee Investment Company. No part of it has been recovered or intromitted with as yet, but I think that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor goes too far in so far as it sustains the defender's claim to any part of the amount, excepting in so far as it consists of earnings subsequent to 1st January 1878. The £100 referred to by him, and all her earnings prior to 1st January 1878, in my opinion, must have fallen to the deceased jure mariti.

Unless the defender can identify some part of the balance due by the Investment Company as produced by her earnings subsequent to 1st January 1878, when the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, came into operation, I do not see that she can have any claim upon it as not falling into her husband's estate.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brethren. The action is an accounting by an only lawful child against her father's executrix, and for legitim. The pursuer would have been entitled if her father had left a widow but no will to two-thirds of his moveable estate. But as he has left a will, and she has repudiated it, her claim can only be for one-third, the widow taking the remaining two-thirds. The Sheriff by his judgment gives this only child as her legitim a sum of £8, which will be only slightly increased by the judgment your Lordships, who take a different view from him as to the widow's claim of aliment, are to pronounce. The facts of the case on which that judgment—singular in its money result—is to proceed are these. The pursuer's father married the defender—his second wife—in 1868. He was a bleacher, and she was a washerwoman. She, the defender, says, and I accept the statement, that when she married him in 1868 she had a fortune of £104. That passed to her husband jure mariti. So the man had some fortune. In 1870 he got £200 from an insurance on the life of his son, who died in that year. Again, in 1870, he got a legacy of £40. In all he starts in 1870 with a fortune of £344.

During the marriage, which was dissolved in 1886 by his death, he made £1 a-week, or a little more. His wife, the defender, had earnings too. What they were is matter of controversy. But the household was conducted on this footing, that the family lived in a house which belonged to the pursuer, she having succeeded to it from the first wife, her mother. Apparently she allowed her father and stepmother to have it at an easy rent; she explains that she did so in consideration of the repairs they made upon it, and the improve-

No. 51.

Dec. 18, 1888.
Morrison v.
Tawse's
Executrix.

ment effected by the building of the wash-house, and I accept her evidence, because I find it confirmed by this, that the rent was raised after her father died.

Now, the wife, the defender, was taking in washing, and the first question is, whether her earnings as a washerwoman fell under the Married Women's Property Act, 1877. I confess I am strongly inclined to be against the application of that Act (unless the parties acted on the footing that it was to be applicable to their arrangements) to a case in which a man allows his wife, living in family with him, to take in washing or sewing, or keep a shop in the house in which they live. I think it is for him to determine the footing on which that shall be done. I think the intention of the Married Women's Property Act was to prevent an ill-doing husband from interfering with the earnings of a well-doing industrious wife and taking them for his own purposes, as experience shewed had been often done. But the parties whose affairs are here in question I think shewed by their conduct that they were not acting on the footing of the wife carrying on a separate business and earning a separate estate protected from her husband. The case of a wife living in family with her husband, and earning money by charing or serving in a shop, or the like, is not prima facie a case for the application of the statute, unless, as was not the case here, the parties so act as to shew they intend such a case. Here there was a common fund, made up of what the spouses earned and what the husband succeeded to. This money was put in bank, in the joint names indeed, but under a destination which, according to the law of Scotland, would make the husband the proprietor. Of this common fund £400 was put out in a speculation in a building society. It was all dealt with as one fund. That £400 was lost by the failure of the building society in 1884—at least only a dividend will be recovered. But the rest of the common fund, amounting to £261, 16s. 6d., remained in bank when the marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband. Now, that money, the husband understood, he was dealing with by his will. He made his wife executrix, giving her the liferent of all, with power, if need be, to spend the capital, and on her death the money was to go to his children. Was that done on the footing that she was a creditor for £175, that he had in his possession as a borrower £175 of her money, and that his daughter, if she claimed her legal right, could only receive £8? I think he had no conception of such a thing, and neither, I am persuaded, had his widow. But her claim, if a debt, must be capable of being proved as such. It is no case of donation between husband and wife. It is a claim of debt, the same as if she were not the executrix of her supposed debtor. How would she have proposed to establish it? By parole evidence, and by saying that she carried on business in her husband's house as a washerwoman? Would she, by proof of the fact that she took in washing and got payment for it have been held to have established her claim to a debt of £175? I think that is out of the question. My opinion, then, is against the application of the statute to the present case, looking to the nature of the earnings and the conduct of the parties. The husband supplied the house accommodation which they enjoyed together, and bore the expenses of the establishment, and was liable for every farthing of the debts of the household, and when the wife is put to shew that she has a claim for £175 she fails. I cannot in these circumstances agree with a judgment which will give the only legitimate child of the deceased a sum of £8, and which, as I understand your Lordships' opinion, will give the widow £130 as debt due by the estate.

My conclusion is, that the deduction to be made from the £261 is £43, No. 51.
 4s. 5d. Deducting that from £251, we have £218, a third of which is £72, which I should find to be the pursuer's legitim. In short, I concur substantially with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, while I have thought it right to make the observations I have now made as to the application of the statute to the circumstances, and as to the necessity of the wife, in the circumstances, establishing her claim as a creditor.

Dec. 18, 1888.
 Morrison v.
 Tawse's
 Executrix.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK not having heard the argument gave no opinion.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—" . . . Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 12th January 1888, and whole interlocutors subsequently pronounced in the inferior Court: Find that the defender's liability as executrix of the deceased James Tawse to account to the pursuer for her legitim out of the estate of the said James Tawse is not now disputed, and with regard to the amount produced by the defender, and the pursuer's objections thereto . . . Find (2) as to the balance due upon two accounts kept with the Dundee Savings Bank in name of the deceased and the defender 'to be repaid to either of them and the survivor,' that the same consisted to the extent of one-half, or £130, 18s. 3d., of earnings gained by the defender as a washer-woman subsequent to April 1881, and did not form part of the deceased's estate: (3) Find that no part of the balance due by the Dundee Provident Property Investment Company has been recovered or intromitted with by the defender, and that she was not in right of the same except in so far as she might have proved the same to have consisted of earnings by her as aforesaid subsequent to 1st January 1878, and find that she has not proved that any part of said balances was composed of such earnings; subject to these findings approve of the charge side of the account: Find that the defender, as executrix of her deceased husband, has no claim in name of alimony out of his estate; and therefore sustain the objection to the item of £28, 2s. 6d. . . . With these findings remit the case to the Sheriff, that effect may be given thereto, and decern."

D. MILNE, S.S.C.—MENZIES, BRUCE LOW, & THOMSON, W.S.—Agents.

WALTER KIRKWOOD AND ANOTHER (W. & J. Kirkwood's Trustees), Petitioners (Respondents).—Mackay—H. Johnston. No. 52.

MRS MARGARET FORBES OR LEITH, Appellant.—Dundas.

DR BRUCE ALLAN BREMNER, Appellant.—Brodie Innes.

Dec. 20, 1888.
 Kirkwood's
 Trustees v.
 Leith and Bremner.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Nuisance.—In a petition to a Dean of Guild for a warrant for the erection of byres for thirty-two cows within burgh, certain neighbouring proprietors objected that the proposed buildings, if erected, would be a nuisance and injurious to health, as well as otherwise prejudicial. The Dean of Guild found that the answers raised questions which were outwith his jurisdiction, and sisted process to allow of an interdict being applied for. The respondents having failed to apply for interdict, the Dean of Guild granted the warrant craved. On appeal by the respondents, the Court aided process to enable them, if so advised, to apply for an interdict.

Observations (per the Lord President) on the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild in questions of nuisance.

No. 52.

Dec. 20, 1888.
Kirkwood's
Trustees v.
Leith and Bremner.

1st Division.
Dean of Guild
Court, Edinburgh.

M.

THIS was a petition which was presented in the Dean of Guild Court of Edinburgh under the following circumstances, as set forth in the report to the Dean's interlocutor:—"Messrs W. & J. Kirkwood, builders, Edinburgh, are proprietors of certain house property and ground known as Canaan Grove and Wood Grove, Eden Lane, Edinburgh, and having an extent of about two acres. Eden Lane, which is a cul-de-sac, runs down almost the entire west side of this property, and close to its southern extremity gives entrance to certain buildings which occupy the extreme south-west corner of the petitioners' property. These buildings are new and have been for many years, occupied as byres for the accommodation of twenty-four cows. In the wall which forms the southern extremity of the lane there is a private back entrance to Streatham House, the property of the respondent Dr Bremner. This lane also contains various villa residences. The southern boundary of the petitioners' property is a high wall, dividing it from the grounds of Canaan Lodge, the property of the respondent Mrs Leith.

"The petitioners crave warrant to erect byres for thirty-two cows, cart-shed, stable, storage, and other appropriate accommodation, on the south-east corner of their ground, and on their completion to remove the buildings hitherto used for a like purpose on the south-west corner of the property, with the exception of a timber erection.

"The respondents have lodged answers objecting to the erection of the byres. While Dr Bremner in particular objects to the effect on Eden Lane, and Mrs Leith avers that her house will be only thirty yards distant from a proposed manure pit in connection with the byre, in many particulars their objections are identical. They aver that the proposed erections will prejudice the amenity, the feuing value, and the salubrity of their respective properties. They further state that the erection of the byre will be a nuisance to the neighbourhood and injurious to health. They also found upon the following condition both in the petition and in the titles and in their own:—'Not to erect or allow to be erected on any part of the ground hereby feued any house or houses for the carrying on of trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars'; and upon the provisions of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 16 (c) (d) (e), which declare certain things to be nuisances."

The petitioners pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Separatim, The defences raise questions which are not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court.

On 9th August 1888, the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the answers of the respondents raise questions which are not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court: Therefore the process to allow the respondents, or either of them, to apply for interdict against the erection of the proposed buildings, if so advised, reserves all questions of expenses, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.— . . . So far as the objections on the ground of nuisance are concerned, the Dean of Guild does not consider that the respondents' answers are well founded. If the erection of a byre is not prohibited, and is in law, it could not be prevented merely because it might prejudice the amenity of neighbouring properties.—Barclay v. M'Ewen, 7 R. 792.

"With regard to the other grounds of objection, the petitioners' pleadings raise questions which are not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court, and in the circumstances of this case the Dean of Guild has sustained this plea.

"It was argued to the Dean of Guild that he had jurisdiction in the matter of nuisance, which was a part of the subject of neighbourhood, and that

On 25th October following this second interlocutor was pronounced :— No. 52.
 "The respondents having failed to apply for interdict on the ground of

Dec. 20, 1888.

Kirkwood's
 Trustees v.
 Leith and Bremner.

thought that the proposed operations, in the use to be made of them, would prove a nuisance, he could stop them, or order them to proceed upon conditions. In support of this contention the respondents relied on a series of decisions beginning with The Magistrates of Stirling v. the Sheriff, M. 7584. In that case an inhabitant of Stirling raised the side wall of his house, whereby he interfered with a servitude acquired by his neighbour, who complained to the Sheriff. The Sheriff sustained his own jurisdiction, and the Magistrates successfully brought a declarator 'that by virtue of their erection the sole and only jurisdiction in all questions concerning building houses within burgh, taking down and rebuilding thereof, servitudes thereon, and marches and boundaries of the same, belonged to them excluding the Sheriff.' But in that case there was an allegation of direct fault in the structure of the building, and there was no question of the use to which the building was to be put. In Fleming, M. 13,159, the Dean of Guild, on the petition of a lower proprietor, forbade the future letting of an upper floor to a fencing-master, on the ground of nuisance arising from noise. In Proprietors in Carrubber's Close v. Reoch, February 26, 1762, M. 13,175, a wright's shop had been burned, and with it neighbouring houses in a crowded close. The wright proposed to rebuild as before. It was held that the shop was in the circumstances a public nuisance, as being liable to fire, and that the Dean of Guild must deal with it. In this case the question of nuisance was directly connected with questions involving the structure of the building in dispute. In Buchanan, M. 13,178, a Dean of Guild had ordered the removal of water-shades from the front of houses, on the ground that they encroached on the streets, deformed the same, and proved a nuisance to the general public. His proceedings were sustained. Analogous to these are the cases of Vary v. Thomson, M. App., voce Public Police, No. 4, and Charity, M. App., Public Police, No. 6. But all these cases were the subject of judicial consideration in Donaldson v. Pattison, Nov. 14, 1834, 13 S. 27, and that with a result hostile to the view contended for by the respondents. Donaldson was in the habit of raising goods by cranes to his upper storey from the pavement close to the front wall. Pattison, his next neighbour, obtained interdict from the Dean of Guild on the ground that the pavement was obstructed to his prejudice. It was held that the Dean of Guild could not competently entertain the petition, as the subject-matter of the nuisance was not of an architectural nature, and therefore did not fall within his province. Lord Mackenzie explains his reasons for considering that the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction was excluded, and after examination of the cases cited above, he refused to accept the plea that the Dean of Guild could consider not only the structure of a building, but also the use of it, if that was illegal. In the case of Fleming, his Lordship noted that the point of jurisdiction was never raised; while in the other cases not only was illegal use complained of, but also illegal construction of a building.

"So far as the Dean of Guild is aware, there is no other case where the point now under consideration has been the subject of direct decision, but there are more recent cases where important statements have been made as to the law on this head. In Colville v. Carrick, 10 R. 1241, warrant was craved for the erection of a hall behind a house in a street. The house had been used as a school for many years, and the hall was intended as an adjunct thereof. The titles allowed the feuars to build at the back such offices as they might consider necessary for additional convenience, but forbade shops, warehouses, or trading places. The Dean of Guild refused the petition. It was held that the hall was an office necessary to the petitioner's convenience. In the course of his opinion the Lord Justice-Clerk said,—'If the only question is as to a right to use the proposed building in a particular way, I greatly doubt whether the Dean of Guild has any authority to deal with that matter.' Lord Young, inter alia, said,—'I am clearly of opinion that the Dean of Guild has nothing to do with the use to which buildings are to be put.'

"The case of Manson v. Forrest, 14 R. 802, presents many analogous features

No. 52.

Dec. 20, 1888.
Kirkwood's
Trustees v.
Leith and Bremner.

nuisance, on the motion of the petitioners recalls the sist: Finds that the proposed operations are confined to the petitioners' own property, and can be executed without danger: Finds that the proposed premises are structurally of a satisfactory nature: Finds that the objections of the respondents on the ground of amenity are irrelevant, for the reasons explained in the note to the interlocutor of 9th August last: Therefore repels the pleas in law for the respondents; grants warrant to the petitioners in terms of the prayer of the petition and of the plans therewith produced," &c.

The respondents Mrs Leith and Dr Bremner appealed to the Court of Session.

to the present, but it does not throw much additional light upon the question of jurisdiction. In that case the erection of a byre was objected to as a nuisance, but interdict was refused because the petitioner undertook so to manage his business as to prevent the possibility of nuisance. The question of jurisdiction was argued to the Court at an early stage of the case, and the rubric of the case certainly asserts that the Court doubted the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction to entertain this question, but there is no expression of opinion on this point. It is the fact, however, that process was sisted by the Court on the motion of the respondents, who sought to uphold the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction.

"The more recent case of Robertson v. Thomas, 14 R. 822, is more in point. A petitioner proposed to make a large increase of a stable which stood in the centre of a thickly populated square of houses. It was chiefly objected that this would result in nuisance from smell and noise, and in an increased danger of fire. The Dean of Guild allowed a proof in order to ascertain whether the matters embraced in these objections, when established, would or would not be of a character with which he could competently deal. The petitioner appealed on the ground, inter alia, that the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction as to the use of a building or as to a mere question of nuisance. But the Court (Lord Rutherford Clark diss.) refused the appeal, on the ground that it was expedient that the facts should be ascertained before determining whether the subject-matter of the objections was within the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction.

"In this case the Court practically reserved all questions of competency, and it appears to the Dean of Guild that this decision is no qualification of the doctrine that he cannot competently consider a simple question of nuisance, or a question as to the use to which a building is to be put. The whole object of the inquiry in that case was to ascertain whether the facts were such that the Dean of Guild could deal with the objections raised. The Lord Justice-Clerk, inter alia, said:—'I am clearly of opinion that there are cases of nuisance and cases as to the use of buildings which cannot come under the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, because they do not involve questions of the character for which he is the proper judge, but that, on the other hand, it is no answer to say what the appellant says here, if the nuisance is connected with a structural alteration of the building itself, and the use is the use of that building.'

"In the present case the respondents' contention amounts to this, that the Dean of Guild has jurisdiction where the use of a building would naturally, if not necessarily, occasion nuisance. The Dean of Guild does not concur in this view. It appears to the Dean of Guild that he has only authority in the matter of nuisance, when, by the circumstances of the particular case, that matter is connected with questions involving the structural arrangements of the building for which warrant is craved. He thinks that these elements do not appear in the present case.

"The Dean of Guild ought to add that after visiting the premises, and after full consideration of the plans, he is of opinion that the petitioners' proposed operations are confined to their own property, and are structurally of a satisfactory nature.

"The lane, which gives access to various properties, is a cul-de-sac. It is only twelve feet wide, and thus too narrow to admit of two carts or cabs passing each other in it. The cartage for byres for thirty-two cows will be considerable, and will obstruct ordinary traffic."

The Court heard counsel for the respondents, who contended (1) that the Dean of Guild had jurisdiction to entertain the question of nuisance; and (2) that in point of fact the proposed buildings would constitute a nuisance. No. 52.
Dec. 20, 1888.
Kirkwood's
Trustees v.
Leith and Bremner.

The petitioners' counsel were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that in this case we ought to follow the same course as was taken in the case of Manson, 14 R. 802. I am not disposed to lay down any very stringent or definite rule as to how far the Dean of Guild is entitled in a question of lining to entertain an objection such as that which is here taken to the effect that the proposed erections constitute a nuisance. I can understand that in such cases as those to which Mr Innes has referred, where certain kinds of works have been ticketed by law as nuisances, the Dean of Guild may refuse a lining, because the law holds that they cannot be carried on without constituting a nuisance. If, for instance, it was proposed to set up a blubber or a glue work in one of the divisions of Princes Street, the Dean of Guild might refuse a lining because the structure which it was proposed to erect was adapted to the purposes of an unlawful trade, and to such purposes only.

But in regard to other cases which have been mentioned, I confess I am not disposed to do anything which would lead to an extension of the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. Questions of nuisance are often of very great delicacy, and raise points of law which require the intervention of a higher Court than that of the Dean of Guild. Such questions are among the enumerated cases which are sent to trial by jury, shewing plainly the intention of the Legislature that being of such importance they ought to be brought before the highest tribunal only. I think that is a very sound principle, and for these reasons, while I am not disposed to do or say anything which would appear to extend the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, I am not disposed to attempt to define the precise limits of that jurisdiction. That is often a very difficult matter, and its limits will in almost all cases depend upon circumstances. But apart from the ground of incompetency, I have no doubt that expediency requires that a question of nuisance should be tried elsewhere than in the Dean of Guild Court. I therefore think we ought to sist this process in order to enable the appellants to bring an interdict against the erection of these buildings.

LORD MURR, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sist process, to enable the appellants, if so advised, on or before the box-day in the ensuing recess, to apply for an interdict against the erection of the proposed buildings, reserving all questions of expenses."

MENZIES, COVENTRY, & BLACK, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

CATHERINE GALLOWAY OR CUTHBERT, Pursuer (Appellant).—Gloag—Ure. No. 53.

JOHN GALLOWAY WHITTON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).

—Law.

Property—Common interest—Mutual wall.—The proprietor of two houses separated by a wall which formed the end wall of one house and the side wall of the other disposed by his settlement the two houses, one to each of his two daughters, describing each house as bounded by the other. In a question between one of the daughters, who claimed exclusive right to the wall, and the heirs of the other daughter, held that the wall was mutual. Dec. 20, 1888.
Cuthbert v.
Whitton.

No. 53.

Dec. 20, 1888.
Cuthbert v.
Whitton.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of For-
farshire.
M.

JOHN GALLOWAY, plumber in Arbroath, died in 1857. He was proprietor of two houses there, which were divided by a wall, which formed the side of one of the houses and the back of the other house. By his disposition and settlement he conveyed to his daughter Catherine Galloway (Mrs Cuthbert) one of these houses which fronted the High Street and which was described as bounded by that street on the west, "and the tenement hereinafter disposed to Ann Galloway, my daughter, on the east,"—that is, by the other of the two houses.

By a subsequent clause of the settlement Galloway disposed to his daughter Ann Galloway (Mrs Whitton) the other house, which fronted Allan Street, and which was described as bounded "by that tenement hereinbefore disposed, to Catherine Galloway, on the west."

The two daughters thereafter occupied the houses conveyed to them under the settlement as separate subjects.

In consequence of certain disputes between them as to the wall separating the houses, Mrs Cuthbert raised in March 1888, in the Sheriff Court at Forfar, an action against John Galloway Whitton and other representatives of Mrs Whitton, concluding to have it found, inter alia, "that the wall dividing the property of the pursuer from the property of the defenders, situated in Allan Street, Arbroath, is a mutual wall."

The defenders denied that the wall was mutual.

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson), on 13th June 1888, allowed the action and thereafter found "that the pursuer has failed to shew that the wall in dispute is mutual," and assoilzied the defenders.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Thomson), on 20th June, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The fact that the wall had been common to the two houses when in possession of the common author was conclusive in her favour. No proof should have been allowed, the disposition of the common author being sufficient for the decision of the case. There could be no question of servitude, since the two subjects formerly belonged to the common author.

The defenders argued that the wall was exclusively theirs, subject to servitude of support in favour of the pursuer's house. Further, that the pursuer had an interest to maintain their exclusive property in it, for if it were mutual the pursuer might propose to introduce vents into it, and so into the defenders' house.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—These sisters have between their houses a wall about 15 inches in thickness, which is a sustaining wall of both houses. The father owned the two houses. One of them was built with its end against the side of the other. He left by his settlement the one house to the daughter and the other to the other, without so expressing his deed as to the wall to either. The question is whether each daughter has a common right in the wall. It is not in the strict sense of the words a mutual gable, but nothing turns on that. The Sheriff-substitute has gone into a discussion of the law of mutual gables, and the Sheriff has observed that he is "unable to find any of the usual features or marks which are looked for in a mutual gable. Now, it seems to me that that is scarcely the way to deal with the case.

* "NOTE.—I am unable to find any of the usual features or marks which are looked for in a mutual gable. It has not been built so as to suit the purposes of the two properties in the same degree, and such equality of right is of the essence of a mutual gable is, from the mode in which the wall was erected, impossible."

houses belonged to one man. There could be no right of servitude in the one property over the other while they were both one man's property, and so far as appears they were never in separate hands till he gave one of them to each of his two daughters. I think that when he did so he gave an equal right to each in what was necessary to both. It is said that there may be danger to one house from a vent being put into this wall by the owner of the other. If the mutual wall is about to be so treated, the question of whether the operation is dangerous will be one for the Dean of Guild Court at the time, on the footing that it is a mutual wall.

No. 53.

Dec. 20, 1888.
Cuthbert v. Whitton.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The case as it occurs to me is simple. The father, the proprietor of houses which adjoined in the sense of having a wall between them of which the one house used one side and the other house the other side, gave by his will one house to each of his two daughters. He describes each as bounded by the other, the conveyances being in the same terms. The question is to whom the wall between them, used by each, belongs. There is no reason for including the wall in the property of one daughter and excluding it from that of the other. It is said, but it is nothing to the purpose, that one house was built before the other. That might have been material if there had been two separate feudal properties, with a division in a certain line between them, but so far as we know, they were never separate properties before the father of the parties here divided them. He conveyed them, then, one to each daughter, by identical conveyances. I think that is an end of the case. There was no use for leading proof, as was done in the Sheriff Court. I think that the pursuer is entitled to declarator that the wall is mutual.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I also concur. I agree with Lord Young in thinking that the question depends on the interpretation of the settlement of the common author, and that proof was unnecessary.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 13th June 1888 and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 20th June following: Find and declare that the wall dividing the property of the pursuer from the property of the defenders, situated in Allan Street, Arbroath, is a mutual wall: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—DUNCAN SMITH & M'LAREN, S.S.C.—Agents.

ALEXANDER PHILIP, Objector (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie.
ALEXANDER ROXBURGH, Respondent.—R. V. Campbell.

No. 54.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Philip v. Roxburgh.

Election Law—County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Service Franchise—Dwelling-house—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3 and sec. 7, subsec. 4).—The manager of a farm, of which his mother was tenant, had the exclusive use and occupation of a bedroom in the farm-house, by virtue of his employment. His mother and sisters also resided in the farm-house, and he took his meals along with them in another room in the house.

No. 53.

Dec. 20, 1888.
Cuthbert v.
Whitton.2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of For-
farshire.
M.

JOHN GALLOWAY, plumber in Arbroath, died in 1857. He was proprietor of two houses there, which were divided by a wall, which formed the side of one of the houses and the back of the other house. By his trust-disposition and settlement he conveyed to his daughter Catherine Galloway (Mrs Cuthbert) one of these houses which fronted the High Street, and which was described as bounded by that street on the west, "and by the tenement hereinafter disposed to Ann Galloway, my daughter, on the east,"—that is, by the other of the two houses.

By a subsequent clause of the settlement Galloway disposed to his daughter Ann Galloway (Mrs Whitton) the other house, which fronted Allan Street, and which was described as bounded "by that tenement hereinbefore disposed, to Catherine Galloway, on the west."

The two daughters thereafter occupied the houses conveyed to them by the settlement as separate subjects.

In consequence of certain disputes between them as to the wall separating the houses, Mrs Cuthbert raised in March 1888, in the Sheriff Court at Forfar, an action against John Galloway Whitton and others, representatives of Mrs Whitton, concluding to have it found, inter alia, "that the wall dividing the property of the pursuer from the property of the defenders, situated in Allan Street, Arbroath, is a mutual wall."

The defenders denied that the wall was mutual.

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson), on 13th June 1888, allowed proof, and thereafter found "that the pursuer has failed to shew that the wall . . . in dispute is mutual," and assoilzied the defenders.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Thomson), on 20th June, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The fact that the wall had been common to the two houses when in possession of the common author was conclusive in her favour. No proof should have been allowed, the disposition of the common author being sufficient for the decision of the case. There could be no question of servitude, since the two subjects had formerly belonged to the common author.

The defenders argued that the wall was exclusively theirs, subject to a servitude of support in favour of the pursuer's house. Further, that they had an interest to maintain their exclusive property in it, for if it were mutual the pursuer might propose to introduce vents into it, and so injure the defenders' house.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—These sisters have between their houses a wall of about 15 inches in thickness, which is a sustaining wall of both houses. Their father owned the two houses. One of them was built with its end against the side of the other. He left by his settlement the one house to the one daughter and the other to the other, without so expressing his deed as to give the wall to either. The question is whether each daughter has a common right in the wall. It is not in the strict sense of the words a mutual gable, but nothing turns on that. The Sheriff-substitute has gone into a discussion of the law of mutual gables, and the Sheriff has observed that he is "unable to find any of the usual features or marks which are looked for in a mutual gable." Now, it seems to me that that is scarcely the way to deal with the case. The houses belonged to one man. There could be no right of servitude in the one property over the other while they were both one man's property, and so far as appears they were never in separate hands till he gave one of them to each of his two daughters. I think that when he did so he gave an equal right to each in what was necessary to both. It is said that there may be danger to one house from a vent being put into this wall by the owner of the other. If the mutual wall is about to be so treated, the question of whether the operation is dangerous will be one for the Dean of Guild Court at the time, on the footing that it is a mutual wall.

* "NOTE.—I am unable to find any of the usual features or marks which are looked for in a mutual gable. It has not been built so as to suit the purposes of the two properties in the same degree, and such equality of rights as is of the essence of a mutual gable is, from the mode in which the wall was erected, impossible."

No. 53.

Dec. 20, 1888.
Cuthbert v.
Whitton.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The case as it occurs to me is simple. The father, the proprietor of houses which adjoined in the sense of having a wall between them of which the one house used one side and the other house the other side, gave by his will one house to each of his two daughters. He describes each as bounded by the other, the conveyances being in the same terms. The question is to whom the wall between them, used by each, belongs. There is no reason for including the wall in the property of one daughter and excluding it from that of the other. It is said, but it is nothing to the purpose, that one house was built before the other. That might have been material if there had been two separate feudal properties, with a division in a certain line between them, but so far as we know, they were never separate properties before the father of the parties here divided them. He conveyed them, then, one to each daughter, by identical conveyances. I think that is an end of the case. There was no use for leading proof, as was done in the Sheriff Court. I think that the pursuer is entitled to declarator that the wall is mutual.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I also concur. I agree with Lord Young in thinking that the question depends on the interpretation of the settlement of the common author, and that proof was unnecessary.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 13th June 1888 and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 20th June following: Find and declare that the wall dividing the property of the pursuer from the property of the defenders, situated in Allan Street, Arbroath, is a mutual wall: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—DUNCAN SMITH & M'LAREN, S.S.C.—Agents.

ALEXANDER PHILIP, Objector (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie.
ALEXANDER ROXBURGH, Respondent.—R. V. Campbell.

No. 54.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Philip v.
Roxburgh.

*Election Law—County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Service Franchise—
"Dwelling-house"—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict.
c. 3), sec. 3 and sec. 7, subsec. 4.*—The manager of a farm, of which his mother was tenant, had the exclusive use and occupation of a bedroom in the farm-house, by virtue of his employment. His mother and sisters also resided in the farm-house, and he took his meals along with them in another room in the house.

No. 54.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Philip v.
Roxburgh.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Sheriff of Roxburgh,
Berwick, and Selkirk.
B.

Held that the whole farm-house was inhabited by the person under whom he served, and therefore that he was not entitled to be registered as an "inhabitant-occupier of a dwelling-house" in respect of his occupancy of the bedroom.

ALEXANDER ROXBURGH, farm-manager of the farm of Thorneylee, Selkirkshire, of which his mother was tenant under a lease from Lady Reay, claimed to have his name entered in the register of voters for the county of Selkirk. The franchise claimed was that known as the "service franchise," introduced by the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.*

Alexander Philip, solicitor, Peebles, objected to the claim on the ground that on a sound construction of the Act, as applied to the facts of the case, the "dwelling-house" inhabited by the claimant was also inhabited by the person under whom he served, viz., his mother, and that therefore he was not entitled to be entered on the roll.

The Sheriff (Jameson) admitted the claim, on the ground that by subsection 4 of section 7 of the Act the expression "dwelling-house" is defined to mean "any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling," that the said room of which Roxburgh had the exclusive use fell within the definition, and that the room was not inhabited by the person by whom Roxburgh was employed.

Philip craved a case, which was accordingly stated by the Sheriff.

These facts were set forth:—"Roxburgh inhabits, and has the exclusive use and occupation of a bedroom in the farm-house of Thorneylee, by virtue of his employment as farm-manager for his mother. His mother and sisters also reside in the farm-house, and Roxburgh takes his meals along with them in another room of the farm-house. He has occupied the bedroom for the requisite length of time to entitle him to be put on the roll of voters, if his qualification is otherwise sufficient."

The question of law was,—“Whether in respect of the foreshaid facts the said Alexander Roxburgh is entitled to be entered on the roll in respect of the qualification set forth in the 3d section of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3?”

Argued for the objector;—The claimant was not an "inhabitant-occupier" in the sense of the Act, for the franchise intended by the Act was limited to cases where a "house or part of a house was occupied as a separate dwelling-house," and was not inhabited by the person under whom he served. It was meant to apply to cases where a man lived in a one-roomed house, complete in itself, or occupied the whole house. What was in the view of the Legislature was that a man who occupied the same residence as his employer might be subject to that employer's influence. In Stribbling v. Halse<sup>1</sup> the franchise was given to Marshall & Snellgrove's shopmen, who lived on the premises, and were not interfered with by their employer. In Ballingall v. Menzies<sup>2</sup> it was given to a person who was looked upon as an independent clerk in the employment of a hydro-pathic company. In another case it was given to a coffee-house keeper.<sup>3</sup> This was, however, clearly a case outside the statute. The claimant simply occupied a bedroom, while his employer resided in another part of the house.

* 48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3.—“Where any man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant.”

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 2, 1885, L. R., 16 Q. B. Div. 246.

<sup>2</sup> Nov. 26, 1886, 14 R. 127.

<sup>3</sup> M'Lean v. Pritchard, Nov. 29, 1887, L. R., 20 Q. B. Div. 285.

Argued for the respondent;—His qualification was his exclusive right by virtue of his contract to occupy a particular room in the house. That room was a dwelling-house in the sense of the Act. It was not occupied by the person under whom he served. To argue that his qualification was destroyed by the occupation by his mother of the rest of the house, was to give two meanings to "dwelling-house" in the same clause, which was illegitimate. The case of Ballingall was directly in point, and only differed from the present in the fact that the employer there was a company.

At advising,—

LORD LEE.—My opinion on the facts stated is, that the claimant's mother (who is tenant and occupant of the farm) inhabits the whole farm-house, and that therefore the claimant's occupancy of a bedroom in that house by virtue of his service is not sufficient under clause 3d of the Act of 1884 to qualify him as an inhabitant-occupier of a dwelling-house in respect of that room. There is some difficulty in reading the clause along with the interpretation clause—a difficulty that was avoided in the Act of 1868 by the condition of separate rating. But I think that that difficulty is solved by observing that a man cannot (under the terms of the clause) be said to inhabit a dwelling-house by virtue of service if such dwelling-house, either as a whole or as part of a larger dwelling-house, is de facto inhabited by the person under whom he serves. This is the view which appears to have been taken in the case of Stribbling, L. R., 16 Q. B. D. 346.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and recalled the judgment of the Sheriff.

PHILIP, LAING, & Co., S.S.C.—THOMAS DALGLEISH, S.S.C.—Agents.

HUGH WATT, Objector (Appellant).—Maconochie.
JOHN M'GUIRE, Respondent.—Patten.

No. 55.

Election Law—County Franchise—"Inhabitant-occupier"—Imprisonment during a portion of the qualifying period—Constructive residence—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), secs. 2 and 7 (4)—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 3.—Held that where a man occupied a dwelling-house as the ordinary habitation of himself and his family during the qualifying period, his compulsory absence in prison during a portion of that period did not interrupt the continuity of his inhabitancy, to the effect of preventing his acquiring a qualification to vote as an "inhabitant-occupier" in the sense of the Representation of the People Acts, 1868 and 1884.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Watt v. M'Guire.

JOHN M'GUIRE was entered on the roll of voters in the county of Mid-Lothian as tenant at a rental of £5 of a house in Slateford in the parish of Colinton from 31st July 1887 to 31st July 1888.

Hugh Watt objected, on the ground that M'Guire had been convicted of an assault on 23d April 1888, and in respect of that conviction had suffered imprisonment in the prison of Edinburgh for four calendar months from that date. Watt therefore maintained that M'Guire was not personally resident at his house during the four months, and was therefore not entitled to be registered as an "inhabitant-occupier" in the sense of the provisions

Registration
Appeal Court.
Sheriff of the Lothians.
B.

No. 55. of section 3 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868,* and sections 2 and 7 (4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.†

Dec. 21, 1888.
Watt v.
M'Guire.

The Sheriff (Crichton) having repelled the objection, Watt craved a case, in which the above facts were set forth. It was further admitted at the bar that while M'Guire was in prison his wife and family continued to reside in the house, which contained his furniture, and that on the expiration of the term of imprisonment he had returned and had since resided there.

The question stated for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether John M'Guire, having been imprisoned in the prison of Edinburgh for the period from 23d April 1888 to 23d August 1888, is entitled to be retained on the roll in the above enrolment?”

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The question to be decided was whether the respondent had been for the requisite period “an inhabitant-occupier of a dwelling-house,” when, in point of fact, he had been absent from the house, without the power of returning to it, during a large portion of the qualifying time. The residence was interrupted by such absence. It was admitted that a temporary absence, whether on pleasure, or for the health of the voter or any member of his family, would not interrupt residence in the sense of the statutes,<sup>1</sup> but the voluntary nature of the absence, and the power of return at will, had been recognised in Scotland as the test on the matter.<sup>2</sup> It had been expressly decided in England in the most authoritative way that temporary absence during the qualifying period was fatal to the vote, if the voter had voluntarily,—e.g., by committing a crime for which he was subsequently put in prison,—put it out of his own power to return during the term of his absence. This had been decided both as regarded cases of imprisonment<sup>3</sup> and the absence of soldiers on duty even for so short a time as twenty-one days.<sup>4</sup> These last cases arose in connection with the service franchise, and Powell v. Guest under the Reform Act of 1832 (where the words to be construed were practically the same as those in the section here under consideration), but the principle of Powell v. Guest had been declared to be applicable, and was given effect to in cases which rose under section 3 of the Representation of the People (England) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 102), where the words to be construed were precisely the same as here, viz., “inhabitant-occupier.”<sup>5</sup>

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 3,—“Every man shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter . . . who . . . (1) is of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, and (2) is and has been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July an inhabitant-occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house within the burgh.”

† 48 Vict. c. 3, sec. 7 (4),—“The expression ‘a household qualification’ means, as respects Scotland, the qualification enacted by the 3d section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, and the enactments amending or affecting the same, and the said section and enactments shall, so far as they are consistent with this Act, extend to counties in Scotland, and for the purpose of the said section and enactments the expression ‘dwelling-house’ in Scotland means any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling

<sup>1</sup> Stewart v. Doull, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 330, 41 Scot. Jur. 193.

<sup>2</sup> Manson v. Sinclair, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 329, 41 Scot. Jur. 193; Nicholson, 1, p. 112, and 2, p. 8; Cay, 559, et seq.

<sup>3</sup> Powell v. Guest, Nov. 22, 1864, 18 C. B. (N.S.), 72, 34 L. J., C. P. 69.

<sup>4</sup> Ford v. Hart, Nov. 21, 1873, L. R., 9 C. P. 273; Atkinson v. Collard, Ford v. Barnes, and Ford v. Elmsley, Nov. 5, 1885, L. R., 16 Q. B. D. 254, et seq.; Spittal v. Brook, Dec. 4, 1886, L. R., 18 Q. B. D. 426.

<sup>5</sup> Tanner v. Castor, and Banks v. Mansell, Nov. 30, 1885, 55 L. J., Q. B. D. 27, see Cave, J., p. 30.

If the Sheriff's decision were to be upheld it would come to this, that soldiers and criminals would be in a worse position with regard to the franchise in England than they were in Scotland. Where was the line to be drawn with regard to the length of the time during which the absence must continue in order to be fatal to the vote? Could a soldier be away on duty, or a criminal be shut up in jail during the whole of the qualifying period, and yet be held duly qualified? (2) With regard to the analogy of constructive residence within the meaning of the poor-law, it was admitted that if the poor-law cases were to rule the present case, the Sheriff's judgment must be affirmed.<sup>1</sup> But it was submitted that there was no analogy. The Poor-Law Act proceeded on a recognition of the fact that every person, not able-bodied, was entitled to be kept from starvation by the State, and therefore it came to be a question between third parties as to what parish was bound to pay for a pauper's maintenance; but the enfranchising Acts conferred a favour—the right to vote—on persons who had fulfilled certain conditions, and the question as to whether a person had done so was personal to himself. At all events, if the analogy were to be recognised at all, it must be pushed as far as it would go, viz., to this, that residence once acquired may be entirely constructive,<sup>2</sup> so that a man might be sent to penal servitude for five years, and yet, if he had once been qualified to vote on a house, and his wife and family continued to reside there during his absence, the assessor could not strike him out of the list, and he could vote when he came out of prison. (3) No assistance could be got from cases arising under section 6 of the Act of 1868, which was an entirely different franchise, and had nothing to do with inhabitancy, or, in other words, residence. All that was there required was occupancy of "lands and heritages," which could of course be by servants or by the tenant's family; e.g., in a case where a man had two farms in different counties, he could personally occupy one and constructively occupy the other.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The qualification was to be found in sections 2 and 7 (4) of the Reform Act, 1832, which imported section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832. What was required by these sections was, that the respondent should have been "for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July an inhabitant-occupier as owner or tenant" of his dwelling-house. The terms of that qualification fell to be contrasted with the terms of the qualification contained in the 11th section of the Reform Act of 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 65), which required that the claimant should not be entitled to be registered, "unless he shall have resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July, within such city, burgh, or town, or within seven statute miles of some part thereof." The words "occupancy" and "residence" fell therefore to be contrasted with one another, and the decisions upon the earlier statute were not in point here. The decisions upon the meaning of the term "actual personal occupancy," required by the 6th section of the Representation of the People Act, 1832, were more appropriate to the present case.<sup>3</sup> The English decisions which had been founded upon on the other side were all under the Reform Act of 1832, and upon a construction of the provision in that Act which required residence for six months prior to the last day of July. In the case

No. 55.

Dec. 21, 1888.

Watt v.

M'Guire.

<sup>1</sup> Roger v. Maconochie, July 5, 1854, 16 D. 1005, 26 Scot. Jur. 549; Hay v. Croll, &c., Feb. 5, 1858, 20 D. 507, 30 Scot. Jur. 272; Beattie v. Leighton and Mitchell, Feb. 20, 1863, 1 Macph. 434, 35 Scot. Jur. 260.

<sup>2</sup> Deas v. Nixon, June 17, 1884, 11 R. 945.

<sup>3</sup> Johnston v. Buchanan, Nov. 6, 1879, 7 R. 7; Lunan v. Allan, Nov. 13, 1880, 8 R. 13.

No. 55.
—
Dec. 21, 1888.
Watt v.
M'Guire.

of Powell,<sup>1</sup> special stress was laid upon the fact that the claimant had been in prison for a great portion of these six months. Ford's case<sup>2</sup> was under the same statute. The cases of Atkinson v. Collard, &c., and of Spittal v. Brook,<sup>3</sup> were all cases under the service franchise, and could not be said to be authorities in the present question. The cases of Tanner and Banks<sup>4</sup> raised the question of the right of undergraduates at Oxford and Cambridge to vote, and, as to them, it must be borne in mind that there the claimants could only be said to be inhabitant-occupiers for six months in the year, while for the other six they lived necessarily elsewhere. In order to sustain the objection here, the argument must be pushed to this length, that if a man were confined in a police cell for a single night he was thereby disqualified, for the principle on which the disqualification was said to rest was involuntary absence on the part of a person sui juris. And it was further to be observed that, looking to the opinions of the English Judges in Powell v. Guest, if a sentence of imprisonment were accompanied by the option of a fine, no disqualification was involved. That shewed the extravagance of the proposition which was maintained upon the other side, and even on the assumption that these decisions could be looked at as authorities in England upon the interpretation of the term "inhabitant-occupier," which they could not be, for they had proceeded more or less upon the case of Powell v. Guest, from which they were clearly distinguishable, still they ought not to be followed in Scotland. What must be affirmed, if the appellant was to succeed, was (1) that the respondent had had a residence in the prison during the time he was there, and (2) that he had no animus revertendi. If imprisonment were to be held to be a disqualification, one would naturally have expected to have found it included under the head of statutory disqualifications applicable to minors, fatuous or insane persons, aliens, and such like. It implied such an incapacity as one would have expected the Legislature to have provided for directly; and the Legislature not having so provided, it was not readily to be implied. (2) An analogy, which was quite in point, was to be found in the Scottish poor-law cases, where it had been conclusively settled that imprisonment did not operate an interruption to continuous residence.<sup>5</sup> There was also this consideration, that by the Act 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 3, the owner was now entitled to let the qualifying subjects for four months without it interrupting the period of residence.

At advising,—

LORD MURE.—This case relates to a person who is enrolled as tenant of a house at Slateford at a rental of £5 a-year, and it is objected to his remaining on the roll that he was in prison for assault several months in the year during which he required to occupy that house in order to enable him to retain his qualification.

The facts on which the question depends are clearly and shortly stated in the case, with this important additional explanation, which was agreed on by the parties at the bar, that during the period the respondent was imprisoned his

<sup>1</sup> Powell v. Guest, 34 L. J., C. P. 69.

<sup>2</sup> Ford v. Hart, L. R., 9 C. P. 273.

<sup>3</sup> Atkinson v. Collard, &c., L. R., 16 Q. B. D. 254; Spittal v. Brook, L. R., 18 Q. B. D. 426.

<sup>4</sup> 55 L. J., Q. B. 57.

<sup>5</sup> Roger v. Maconochie, 16 D. 1005; Deas v. Nixon, 11 R. 945; Manson v. Sinclair, 7 Macph. 329.

wife and family continued to reside in the house of which he was tenant, and that on the expiry of his imprisonment he returned to his family at Slateford, and has since then resided with them there. The Sheriff has repelled the objection, and the question thus raised for decision is, whether in the circumstances stated the fact of the respondent having been so imprisoned destroyed his qualification. No. 55.
Dec. 21, 1888.
Watt v. M'Guire.

The case therefore raises one of those questions of constructive residence which have been so frequently considered and decided under the operation of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act of 1845, and with reference also to the "personal occupancy" clauses of the Reform Act of 1832, and of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Acts of 1868 and 1884. It is unnecessary to refer to these cases in detail, for the result of the leading decisions as the law now stands cannot, I think, be doubted, and appears to me to be this, that when a party is temporarily absent from the house in which he is in use to reside, in the pursuit of his business or ordinary calling, or even in search of work, or through any other necessary cause, but with the intention of returning to that house as soon as he conveniently can, such temporary absence is not sufficient in law to break the continuity of his residence either under the "continuous residence" provisions of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act, or under the "personal occupancy" clauses of the Acts which regulate the qualification of voters. In cases of both descriptions the party who has been temporarily absent will be held to have been resident constructively for the requisite period in the house occupied during his absence by his family or by his servants as the case may be.

Now, I did not understand it to be maintained on the part of the appellant that if during the four months' absence the respondent had been engaged in some work which required him to reside for a time in the locality where he was employed, his absence could have been held to affect the continuity of his residence at Slateford, and so to destroy his qualification. But it was contended that as his absence was compulsory, and brought about by his imprisonment for a criminal offence, this absence must be deducted from the period of his occupancy. No decision in this country was referred to in support of this proposition, and I am not aware that any such decision was ever pronounced. But a decision to a directly contrary effect was pronounced in the case of Roger, July 5, 1854, 16 D. 1005, in which it was held that absence under two consecutive imprisonments of considerable duration, the one for assault and the other for desertion when serving in the militia, did not break the continuity of a party's residence under section 76 of the Poor-Law Act. This, in the view I take of it, was a very important decision, and has, I believe, been considered to regulate the rules of the law of Scotland on constructive residence ever since its date, not only in questions of continuous residence under the Poor-Law Act, but also in questions of occupancy when dealing with the franchise.

In that decision there was no indication of any difference of opinion among the Judges who were called upon to deal with it. It originated in the Sheriff Court, where the Sheriff-substitute held that the continuity of the residence was not interrupted. His interlocutor was adhered to by the Sheriff, who laid it down distinctly that compulsory absence in respect of imprisonment could not be regarded as an interruption of the residence. Upon an advocacy, the reasons of advocacy were repelled by the Lord Ordinary, whose judgment upon the matter now in question was unanimously affirmed by the First Divi-

No. 55. sion of the Court, whose views were shortly expressed by the Lord President (Colonsay), in delivering the opinion of the Court.
 Dec. 21, 1888.
 Watt v.
 M'Guire.

Such being the character of the decision, it is plainly a binding authority in all poor-law cases, and I can see no reason why it should not be acted upon in questions of the present description. For it appears to me to lay down the rules of the law of Scotland which are to be applied in dealing with the clauses of any Act of Parliament relative to residence or occupancy which require or admit of the application of the doctrine of constructive residence as that doctrine is known in Scotland, and they are, I conceive, specially applicable in cases under the Registration of Voters Acts, in which, as Lord Benholme remarked in the case of Manson, 7 Macph. 329, to which we were referred during the discussion, this Court is in use to "receive assistance from the analogy of poor-law decisions." I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

We have been referred to cases in the law of England on the subject, which I do not think it necessary to examine in detail, as our own law relative to constructive residence or constructive occupation is, in my opinion, very clear and distinct. The only one of these cases which related to the effect of absence during imprisonment was that of Powell v. Guest, 18 C. B. (N. S.) 72. But that decision, as I understand it, seems to have proceeded to some extent on the circumstance that there was no Act of Parliament which provided that in such questions time spent in prison was not to be deducted. In the view, however, which has been taken on questions of constructive residence in Scotland it has never been held to be necessary that there should be some express provision in an Act in order to authorise the Court to lay down the rules they have done. They seem, on the contrary, to have considered themselves entitled to construe the provisions of the Acts in order to ascertain whether on a fair construction those provisions admitted of the rule being applied in the case where a party during a temporary absence from his home left his family there till his return. So construing the Acts, the conclusion they came to was that the absent party was to be considered as being constructively resident in the house where he had left his family, which was in reality his home, and that the rule applied in cases of compulsory as well as of voluntary absence, and in the result of those decisions I entirely concur.

The other cases were those of officers and soldiers absent on duty with their regiments, and in most of these the English Courts seem latterly to have come to the conclusion that parties so absent were disqualified. Those decisions have, however, no direct bearing, I think, on the present question, and I shall abstain from giving any opinion upon the important questions thus raised, as we may hereafter be called upon to decide them. At present I have only to say that when that time comes it will, I conceive, be necessary to examine other decisions given in England on similar questions, and more particularly the case of Mitchell, 10 East, 511, in which Lord Ellenborough, with the concurrence of the other Judges of the Queen's Bench of that day, appears to have taken a quite different view of the meaning of the word "inhabitant-occupier" from that laid down in the cases to which we have been referred.

LORD LEE.—The question in this case is whether the name of John M'Guire, a voter on the roll for the county of Midlothian, ought to be struck off in respect of his having been for four months prior to 23d August 1888 confined in the prison of Edinburgh under a sentence of imprisonment for assault.

His qualification, if not destroyed by such imprisonment, is the household qualification provided by clause 2d of the Representation of the People Act, 1884—that is to say, the same qualification (apart from condition of rating) as was provided in regard to burghs by the 3d section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, which conferred the franchise upon every man who, when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his right to be inserted or retained on the register of voters, is of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, and is and has been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July an “inhabitant-occupier” as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house.

No. 55.

Dec. 21, 1888.

Watt v. M'Guire.

There is no allegation of legal incapacity.

It is not disputed that when the Sheriff proceeded to consider his right to be retained in the register M'Guire was an inhabitant-occupier as tenant of the dwelling-house mentioned in the case. Nor is it disputed that during the whole period of twelve months preceding the last day of July he was possessed of such a qualification unless his confinement in the prison between the 23d April and 31st July prevented the retention of it.

It was admitted at the bar (though it is not stated in the case) that M'Guire occupied his house as tenant for the whole period. For it was explained that while he was in prison his wife and family continued to reside in the house, and that it was occupied by his furniture. But it was argued that he was not an inhabitant-occupier because he did not, and could not, personally reside in it during the period of his imprisonment.

I did not understand it to be contended that constant personal residence was required, but it was argued that there must be throughout the whole twelve months residence on the part of the voter, either actual or constructive, and that there could be no constructive residence in a house which the voter was not free to inhabit.

This argument upon the necessity of continuous residence, and the impossibility of allowing constructive residence where the power to reside and the fact of residence were both wanting for three months, was supported by reference to a series of English decisions, commencing with Powell v. Guest (18 Scott's Rep., C. B. (N. S.) 72).

I think it would be unsafe to apply these decisions to the household qualifications conferred upon inhabitant-occupiers by the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868.

They turned upon a construction of the condition of residence attached to the occupation franchise in boroughs under the Reform Act of 1832; and it appears from the judgment in Ford v. Hart (L. R., 9 C. P. 273) that there was thought to be a material distinction between inhabitancy and residence. It was by taking that distinction that the judgment in Mitchell's case (10 East's Reports, 511) was got over. I do not presume to criticise any of these judgments. I assume that they are all in accordance with the English law. But the case of Mitchell seems to be the most applicable to the present case.

The question then is, whether an interruption of the voter's personal residence in the house of which he is admittedly the occupant by reason of imprisonment for three months in the twelve is inconsistent with his being regarded as an inhabitant-occupier within the meaning of the statute?

I put aside the cause of his imprisonment, because it is not said, and cannot be said, that conviction of crime affects the franchise in this case. It is the

No. 55. fact of absence without the power of returning that is founded on. The question then comes to be, whether absence from home by reason of detention in prison for a portion of the year extending to three or four months is fatal to inhabitancy. It is said that such absence must be fatal unless it was terminable at the pleasure of the voter as well as temporary in its character.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Watt v.
M'Guire.

This objection, if well founded, appears to me to reach far beyond cases of temporary imprisonment. I quite understand that a man could not be said to be qualified as an inhabitant-occupier of a dwelling-house if he had not inhabited that dwelling-house at all during the period required for a qualification. But there are very many cases in which the inhabitant-occupier of a dwelling-house may be absent from home for considerable periods of each year without the power or liberty of returning when he pleases. The case of a man who joins the militia during the year, and goes out for eight weeks' training, is an example of that. It occurs to me as strange that if such an objection be tenable it should not have been raised and sustained and applied in practice during the years which intervened between the Act of 1868 (when the household qualification was introduced in burghs) and the Act of 1884. During that period the qualifications were closely scrutinised, and not less keenly contested than they appear to be now, and my experience as a Sheriff in the revisal of the registers for the burghs of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Perth, is that such an objection was unheard of where the voter's occupancy was clear and the dwelling-house in question was his only or ordinary habitation during the twelve months. The case of Manson, 7 Macph. 329, was the case of a man who had voluntarily abandoned his dwelling-house in order to take employment elsewhere. It decided no such question as is raised here.

I regard the objection, therefore, as one which cannot be sustained without introducing a new principle in the administration of these enfranchising statutes, and my opinion is that it is not well founded. I think that if a man is bona fide the occupier of a dwelling-house, and if that dwelling-house is, as in this case it was, his ordinary and proper habitation during the twelve months required by the statute, his temporary absence during a portion of the twelve months, caused by confinement either in a prison or in a hospital for infectious diseases, does not prevent him acquiring a qualification as an inhabitant-occupier. The continuity of his residence or inhabitancy does not appear to me to be affected by such compulsory absence during a portion of the period of twelve months. Upon this point I think that the case of Roger, 16 D. 1005, has a distinct bearing.

I concur therefore in thinking that the determination of the Sheriff in this case was right.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship. But the ground on which I prefer to rest my judgment is that the Representation of the People Act, 1868, does not require continued residence for any specified period as a qualification for voting, and therefore I do not find it necessary to consider whether imprisonment for the period of four months out of twelve would break the continuity of residence if that had been, which I think it is not, one of the conditions which the statute provides for the qualification of a voter. What we have to consider is whether this voter is or is not what is ordinarily meant by an inhabitant-occupier, and for the reasons given by Lord Lee, apart from his observations on the Poor-Law Amendment Act, I think that

McGuire is an inhabitant-occupier of the house in question. I do not think that in coming to that conclusion we are doing anything at all different from what has been done by the English Courts in any of the cases cited to us. I think that the decisions of the English Court upon the construction of the Statute of 1884 should be received with great respect, and if on the construction of that statute we had found they had come to a decision different from that at which we were inclined to arrive, that would have given me great difficulty. But I do not find that any of the decisions of the English Court are inconsistent with the judgment which your Lordships propose.

No. 55.

Dec. 21, 1888.

Watt v.

McGuire.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—J. & A. PRIDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN MATTHEW KLENCK, Petitioner.—D.-F. Mackintosh—J. C. Lorimer. No. 56.
EAST INDIA COMPANY FOR EXPLORATION AND MINING, LIMITED, Respondents.—Murray—Ure.

Dec. 21, 1888.

Klenck v.

East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

Company—Shares—Issue at a discount—Memorandum of Association—Illegal provision—Companies Acts, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), and 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 131)—Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 17)—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. c. 118).—Held that it is ultra vires of a company registered under the Companies Acts to issue its shares at a discount.

The memorandum and articles of association of a company registered under the Companies Acts contained provisions to the effect that the company might issue its shares "at par, or at a discount, or at a premium." A person to whom new shares had been allotted at a discount presented a petition to the Court for rectification of the register of the company by the deletion of his name therefrom, and for an order on the company for repayment of the amount paid by him on his shares. The Court granted the prayer of the petition on the ground that the provision in the memorandum of association with regard to the issue of shares at a discount was illegal, and that such issue of shares was ultra vires of the company under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867.

Observations on Trevor v. Whitworth, 1887, L. R., 12 App. Cas. 409, and on Almda and Territo Company, 1888, L. R., 38 Chan. Div. 415.

Observations (per Lord Shand) on the power of companies which have adopted the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, to issue shares at a discount.

On 31st May 1888 John Matthew Klenck presented a petition to the 1st Division of the Court of Session against the East India Company for Exploration and Mining, Limited, in which he prayed the Court to ordain that "the register of said company be rectified by deleting therefrom the entry of the petitioner's name, as holder of the 300 shares of the capital stock of the said company (part of the shares issued in July 1887) standing in his name in the said register; and to direct that due notice of such rectification be given to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies in Scotland; and further, to interdict and prohibit the said company from making or enforcing any call or calls upon the petitioner in respect of the said shares, or from charging him for any alleged price in respect thereof, or from in any way holding or treating him as a shareholder of the said company in respect of the said 300 shares; and further, to decern and ordain the said company to make payment to the petitioner of the sum of £15, paid by him in respect of said shares, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from the 25th day of July 1887."

B.

The following statements were set forth in the petition:—The East

No. 56. India Company for Exploration and Mining, Limited, with its registered office at 146 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, was formed in 1881. The capital of the company was £100,000 in 100,000 shares of £1 each, of which 99,900 were taken up.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

By special resolution, passed on 6th January 1886 and confirmed on 5th February 1886, it was resolved that the capital of the company should be increased from £100,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £1 each, to £300,000, divided into 300,000 shares of £1 each. That resolution was registered on 16th May 1886.

By special resolution, passed on 13th June 1887 and confirmed on 30th June 1887, and registered 8th July 1887, it was resolved, inter alia, "(1) That the directors be, and they are hereby authorised to issue 150,000 shares of £1 each, quoad 123,270 shares at a discount of not more than 12s. 6d. per share. (2) That 99,900 only of these shares be offered to the shareholders, being in the proportion of one share for each one of their present holdings. (3) That the directors be, and they are hereby authorised to arrange for discharge or payment of the debenture debt of £9900 by the issue of not more than 26,730 fully paid-up shares in connection therewith. (4) That the directors be, and they are hereby authorised to make such arrangements with third parties as they see fit for the subscription of shares."

In pursuance of that resolution, the company caused a prospectus to be issued, offering the 123,270 shares at a discount of 12s. 6d. per share, and John Matthew Klenck, then a shareholder of the company, on 24th July 1887, addressed to the directors letters of application for 300 shares, and at the same time sent them the sum of £15, being 1s. per share thereon, and, on or about 26th August 1887, he received notice that the shares had been allotted to him, and he was entered in the company's register as holder of the said 300 shares.

The petitioner further averred,—“Said application [for shares] was made by the petitioner, and was accepted by the company, on the condition that on each share 12s. 6d. was to be credited as paid up, and that each share was to be subject only to a liability of 7s. 6d. thereon.

“That said issue of shares at 12s. 6d. discount per share is ultra vires of said company, and that consequently the allotment of said shares to the petitioner and the entry of his name on the register were also ultra vires and illegal. The petitioner has since applied to the company to have his name removed from the register, and for repayment of the £15 paid by him in respect of said shares, but the company has refused to comply with his request.”

The petition was presented in terms of secs. 35 and 36 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89).

The respondents answered;—“Admitted that the special resolutions were passed and registered as stated. Explained that, by the memorandum of association and also by the articles of association, the company has power to issue shares at a discount.

“Admitted that the petitioner, on 24th July 1887, applied for 300 shares and paid £15, and received notice that said shares had been allotted to him, and that he is on the register as the holder thereof, all as stated.

“Admitted that the company refuse to remove the petitioner's name from the register.

“It is denied that the issue of shares at a discount, and the allotment to the petitioner, and the entry of his name on the register were illegal. The said shares were issued in terms of the memorandum and articles of association, and of an agreement between the company and Mr James Napier and the Goldfields Prospecting Company, Limited, dated 24th and 27th May 1887, and of said resolutions. The petitioner and the other shareholders further agreed with the company that the said shares should be so issued; and the agreement to this effect, dated 25th October 1887, was duly registered in terms of the Companies Act, 1867, section 25, before the shares were issued. Numerous obligations have been incurred by the company on the faith of the petitioner and the other persons in the same position being shareholders. Both the company and the creditors relied on the petitioner and the said other persons being shareholders. The petitioner applied for and accepted the shares in question in full knowledge of the terms of the memorandum and articles of association."*

No. 56.
Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration
and Mining,
Limited.

Argued for the petitioner;—It was illegal for a company registered under the Companies Act to issue their shares at a discount, and if it were stipulated that the company should have power to do so in their memorandum or articles of association, the stipulation was of no avail.<sup>1</sup> To allow a company to issue their shares at a discount would be to set at naught the whole scheme of the Companies Acts, which proceeded on the ground that shareholders should be liable for the company's debts up to the total amount of the shares held by them individually, i.e., in this case up to £1. Here, however, the condition on which the petitioner was allotted shares was that each share allotted to him should only be subject to a liability of 7s. 6d., 12s. 6d. being credited on each share as having been paid up. The public were entitled to rely on the credit of each shareholder up to the full amount of £1 per share. Every member of the public in dealing with the company was entitled to assume, notwithstanding anything he found on the register, that the whole subscribed capital was in the company's coffers, either in money or money's worth, except in so far as it appeared that it had been reduced by legitimate use. The case was on all-fours with the Almada case (L. R., 38 Chanc. Div. 415), with this exception, that there there was no power taken by the company in their memorandum of association to issue shares at a discount. That was, however, an illegal stipulation, as it was inconsistent with the provision of sec. 8 of the Companies Act, 1862,† viz., that the memorandum should set forth the amount of the capital of the company, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. In the case of Trevor v.

* The memorandum of association contained the following clause:—"The objects for which the company is established are . . . P. From time to time to make the shares of capital, original, increased, or reduced, or any part thereof, ordinary or preferred, or guaranteed or deferred shares, and to convert the same into shares of different nominal amount, . . . and to issue all or any of such shares at par or at a discount, or at a premium, or as paid up or as partly paid up."

Article 8 of the articles of association provided,—“The company may from time to time by special resolution increase the capital by the creation of new shares.”

Article 9.—“Such increased capital may be issued as ordinary shares or preferred or guaranteed or deferred shares, or partly by one of these modes and partly by another or others, and may be issued at par, or at a discount, or at a premium . . .”

<sup>1</sup> Almada and Territo Co., 1888, L. R., 38 Chanc. Div. 415; Trevor v. Whitworth, 1887, L. R., 12 App. Cas. 409; In re Financial Corporation, 1867, L. R. 2 Chanc. App. 714—see Lord Cairns, pp. 732, 733; Ashbury Railway Carriage Co. v. Riche, 1875, L. R., 7 Eng. and Ir. App. 653—Lord Cairns, at p. 672; Railways Timetables Publishing Co., Dec. 7, 1888, Weekly Notes, 239.

† The sections of the various Acts referred to are quoted in the opinions of the Lord President and Lord Shand.

No. 56. Whitworth (L. R., 12 App. Cas. 409), it was expressly stated by Lord Macnaghten that such a power, when found in a memorandum of association, would be null and void. The principle on which Trevor v. Whitworth was decided by the House of Lords (where the legality of a company buying and continuing to hold its own shares was in question) ought to be applied here, namely, that in either case the memorandum would not shew the public what was the amount of the capital of the company. Both operations had the effect of reducing the apparent amount of the company's capital. With regard to the argument maintained on the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, assuming that under sec. 63 (quoted by Lord Shand) the company had power in issuing new shares to issue them "on such terms as the company shall think fit," e.g., at a discount, that power was not carried on into the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, but, on the contrary, was directly in contrast with the words of secs. 7 and 8 of the Act of 1862, which provided that the amount of the capital of the company, divided into shares of a fixed amount, should be set forth in the memorandum. Sec. 25 of the Act of 1862* had nothing to do with the issue of shares at a discount, but merely recognised that shares might be bought for money's worth, and not only for hard cash.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—The memorandum and articles of association gave the company power to issue shares at a discount. These documents were open to the inspection of anyone who dealt with the company. The liability of the shareholders to the company was fixed by the terms of the memorandum and articles, and they were also the measure of liability to creditors.<sup>1</sup> There was nothing illegal in the company taking the power of issuing shares at a discount in their memorandum. Such issue of shares was directly recognised in section 25 of the Act of 1862.<sup>2</sup> If, when money's worth was taken for shares, there were other shares in the market at a discount, the purchaser would never give full money's worth in goods, and yet it had been decided that an inquiry into the question whether full money's worth had been given would not be allowed by the Court.<sup>3</sup> In this case the petitioner had given an amount of money which the company had agreed to accept as fair value for the £1 shares, just as in Pell's case the company contracted to take certain property as equivalent to the value. The contract being registered, the Court would not inquire into the question whether the consideration given was full value for the share<sup>4</sup> unless the transaction were attacked on the ground of fraud.<sup>5</sup> By the Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 17), power to railway companies, &c. to issue shares at a discount was clearly given.† Under sec. 63 of that Act when a company augmented its capital, and its

* Sec. 25 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that the register of the company shall contain "in the case of a company having a capital divided into shares" "a statement of the shares held by each member, distinguishing each share by its number, and of the amount paid or agreed to be considered as paid on the shares of each member."

<sup>1</sup> Waterhouse v. Jamieson, March 13, 1868, 6 Macph. 591, 40 Scot. Jur. 306, affd. May 24, 1870, 8 Macph. (H. L.) 88, 42 Scot. Jur. 466.

<sup>2</sup> Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co., 1882, L. R., 23 Chanc. Div. 542.

<sup>3</sup> Palmer's Company Precedents, p. 39; Pell's case, 1869, L. R., 8 Eq. 222, rev. 1869, L. R., 5 Chanc. App. 11; Anderson's case, 1876, L. R., 7 Chanc. Div. 75; Buckley, p. 525.

<sup>4</sup> Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 1878, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1004—see Lord Blackburn, p. 1025.

<sup>5</sup> Pell's case, supra; Anderson's case, supra.

† The sections of this Act which were cited are given in Lord Shand's opinion.

No. 56.

shares were not at the time at a premium, the new shares might be issued "of such amount, and in such manner, and on such terms as the company shall think fit." The objects of that Act were very similar to those of the Companies Acts, and unless anything directly contrary to that section could be found in the Companies Acts, the spirit of the Companies Clauses Act should be read into the later statutes. Now, nothing directly contradictory could be found in those Acts; on the contrary, section 25 of the Act of 1862 seemed to favour this view. In Table A annexed to the Act of 1862 words very similar to the words of section 63 of the Companies Clauses Act occurred. In section 27 of Table A it was provided that where a company was increasing its capital, and existing members of the company declined to take up the new shares, after a certain time the new shares might be disposed of by the directors "in such manner as they think most beneficial to the company." There was no reason why a more restricted meaning should be put on the words "in such manner" in that schedule, than on the words "in such manner, and on such terms" in the Act of 1845. In the Almada case the attention of the Court was not called to the 25th section of the Act of 1862, or to section 27 of Table A appended to that Act. The fact that here the memorandum and articles of association contained a power to issue shares at a discount was a further and very important element of difference between that case and the present.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Explora-
tion and Mining, Limited.

At advising,—

Lord President.—This is a summary petition presented under the authority of the 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862 against a company called the East India Company for Exploration and Mining, Limited, which has its registered office in Glasgow, and the registered capital of which was 100,000 shares of £1 each. The company resolved in the year 1886 to increase its capital from £100,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £1 each, to £300,000 divided into 300,000 shares of £1 each. That was simply an increase of capital exactly upon the same terms and footing as the original capital of the company, and is quite unobjectionable. But there followed upon that in the next year, 1887, a special resolution of the company, by which it was resolved "that the directors be and they are hereby authorised to issue 150,000 shares of £1 each upon 123,270 shares at a discount of not more than 12s. 6d. per share"; and that was followed by certain other resolutions as to the proportions in which these new shares were to be offered to the existing partners of the company. Now, in pursuance of that resolution the company caused a prospectus to be issued offering these shares, 123,000 odds, at a discount of 12s. 6d.; and the petitioner applied for 300 of these shares and had them allotted to him, and he was entered in the company's books as the holder of 300 shares accordingly, upon the footing and condition, although that was not expressed in the register, that he was to be credited with 12s. 6d. per share as paid up, and consequently that each share held by him was to be subject only to a liability of 7s. 6d.

The petitioner maintains that the issue of the shares at a discount is ultra vires of the company and void, and consequently that the allotment of shares to him was also ultra vires of the company, and that he is entitled to have his name removed from the register, and to have the money which he paid for these shares, which amounted only to £15, repaid to him. The answer that is made on the part of the company is, in the first place, that the issue of these shares was perfectly legal and within the competency of the company, and secondly, that the petitioner having applied for and accepted the shares in the full knowledge of

No. 56. the terms on which they were issued, is barred from insisting in this petition and from having his name removed from the register.

Dec. 21, 1888.

Klenck v.

East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

The question whether this resolution of the company was illegal, and whether the issuing of the shares at a discount was ultra vires and therefore void, is a question of very great importance, and depends, I think, truly upon the clauses of the Companies Acts, particularly upon the clauses of the Act of 1862. The 7th section of that statute prescribes the mode in which the liability of members of a company may be limited, and it must be observed that the limitation of liability is a statutory privilege purely. There is no such thing as limited liability at common law, and therefore no company can have limited liability that does not comply with the conditions upon which that privilege is granted. The 7th section is in these terms—"The liability of the members of a company formed under this Act may, according to the memorandum of association, be limited either to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares respectively held by them, or to such amount as the members may respectively undertake by the memorandum of association to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up." The latter is what is called limitation by guarantee, with which we have nothing to do in the present case. The limitation that we are dealing with here is a limitation which is "to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares respectively held" by the members. The 8th section provides that "where a company is formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares, hereinafter referred to as a company limited by shares, the memorandum of association shall contain the following things"—the name of the proposed company, with the addition of the word "Limited" as the last word in such name; the place where the registered office of the company is to be situated; "the objects for which the proposed company is to be established; a declaration that the liability of the members is limited"; and lastly, "the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount." Now, I do not think there can be said to be any ambiguity in these two clauses. The limitation is to the amount unpaid on the shares. Nobody can have a greater amount of limitation of liability than is prescribed here; and the limitation is this, that he shall not be called upon to pay more than remains unpaid upon the amount of his shares. Supposing the share to be £1, he never can be called upon for more than £1 for each share, and if any portion of that £1 has been paid, then his liability is limited to what remains unpaid. But that his liability extends to every shilling that remains unpaid is clear. In connection with this it is also necessary to consider the 12th section of the same statute, which provides that "any company limited by shares may so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum of association, if authorised to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution in manner hereinafter mentioned, as to increase its capital by the issue of new shares of such amount as it thinks expedient, or to consolidate and divide its capital into shares of larger amount than its existing shares, or to convert its paid-up shares into stock, but, save as aforesaid, and save as is hereinafter provided in the case of a change of name, no alteration shall be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association."

Now, keeping in view that the leading condition of the memorandum of association is to be in all cases that the liability of members is limited to the unpaid portion of the shares which they have taken, and is not and cannot be extended further, it appears to me that sec. 12 affords an additional confirmation of the importance attached to the rule established by sections 7 and 8, because, with the exceptions enumerated in section 12, no alteration can be made by the company on the conditions contained in the memorandum of association. Now, the conditions contained in the memorandum of association are that the capital shall be divided into shares of a certain fixed amount, and that the liability of members shall extend to the whole amount of these unpaid shares, and no further.

The 25th section of the Act of 1867 was also referred to in argument, and quite properly, because it must be construed also in connection with the sections of the Act of 1862 that I have read. It provides that "every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares." The evil which this enactment was intended to remedy was very well known. There were a number of transactions of rather a doubtful kind entered into between persons contracting with the company for works and the like, by providing that they should be paid by giving them fully paid-up shares, or shares held to be fully paid-up, and the like, and to check these irregular transactions this section provided for payment of the shares in cash only, unless it shall have been otherwise determined by a contract made in writing before the issue of the shares—that is to say, the contract made in writing must specify and publish the consideration which the company takes in place of cash for the shares. So that that section I think does not at all advance the argument in support of the issue of shares at a discount, because the issue of shares at a discount involves this, that whereas the share capital of the company is all divided into £1 shares, that being in this case the "certain fixed amount" prescribed in section 8 of the Act of 1862, in point of fact the company has given a discharge to those who took the shares at a discount of a considerable portion of that which ex facie of the share they are bound to pay. That seems to me to be exactly the same thing in principle as the company buying its own shares. It is just a diminution of the apparent capital of the company. In the one case—the case of purchasing its own shares, and holding them without re-issue—the company just returns to the shareholder the whole or a portion of the capital which he has paid; and in the other, instead of returning a portion of the capital which he has paid, they fail to lay him under an obligation to pay up the unpaid portion of the shares, or rather they grant him a discharge of it, without consideration, to a certain amount. In short, both cases violate the principle of the statute exactly in the same way. The memorandum sets out—and is bound to set out—the precise amount of the capital of the company divided into shares of a certain fixed amount, and the effect of that is to shew to the public and the creditors dealing with the company, what is the amount of the fixed capital upon which they are entitled to rely in so dealing with the company. But if by either of the means that I have suggested—either the purchase by the company of its own shares, or the issuing of shares at a discount—the public and the creditors are misled entirely, then the memorandum is set at naught, and the provision of the memorandum is for all the purposes for which it was intended practically useless. These are the grounds upon which it appears to me that the issue of shares at a discount cannot possibly be maintained to be legal.

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration
and Mining,
Limited.

This is the first time that the question has occurred for decision in this Court, but there have been some cases in the English Courts upon the subject, and there has been apparently a good deal of variance of opinion among the English Judges. However, there was a case cited to us in which the Court of Appeal in England seems to have come to a unanimous decision, precisely to the effect that I have now indicated, and it is very satisfactory, especially after the apparent differences of opinion that existed among the English Judges, to find at least something like an authoritative judgment upon the question. I shall only say that the case of the Almada Company (L. R., 38 Chan. Div. 415) appears to me to be upon all-fours with the present. It is very difficult to conceive two cases more nearly the same. I forbear from quoting the judgments of the learned Judges in that case, because your Lordships have them before you, but I am happy to be able to say that I concur not only in the judgment at which the Court of Appeal arrived, but in the reasons which are given by the learned Judges for their opinions. But there is another and perhaps still more authoritative guide which we have in the present case, and that is the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth (L. R., 12 App. Cas. 409). That was a case where the company had purchased up its own shares and held them without re-issue, and the House of Lords found that that was an entirely illegal and void transaction, and must be set aside upon the ground which I have already indicated as being the ground of judgment in the present case, that this was just a defeating of the object of the memorandum of association in that part of it where it is required to set out the precise amount in money of the capital of the company divided into a certain number of shares of a certain fixed amount. The two cases—the case of the purchase of shares by the company, and the case of issuing shares at a discount—I think depend entirely upon the same principle.

There is just one other point to which it is necessary to advert in disposing of this petition. It is maintained upon the part of the respondents that they are entitled to issue shares at a discount, because they have a power to do so within the memorandum of association itself, whereas in the cases that have been decided, both in the Almada case and in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth, the power was not in the memorandum of association, but in the articles of association. I do not think that that makes any difference in the case at all, because if the power to issue shares at a discount be inconsistent with setting forth the precise amount of the capital of the company, divided into a certain number of shares of fixed amount, then that is to superadd to the memorandum of association something that takes away its value, or rather something that utterly contradicts its most important provision. The point was dealt with, and very ably dealt with, by Lord Macnaghten in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth, and as expressing my own views of the question, although it did not actually arise for decision in Trevor v. Whitworth, I am prepared to adopt Lord Macnaghten's views as there expressed. He says,—“It seems to me that if a power to purchase its own shares were found in the memorandum of association of a limited company it would necessarily be void”; and further on he says,—“It seems to me that one way of trying whether it is permissible or not would be to read it,”—that is, the power—“into the memorandum in connection with the condition which states what the capital is to be”; and then he puts it in this form,—“The condition would then run thus—‘The capital of the company is £150,000, in 15,000 shares of £10 each, but the board may buy back shares whenever they think it desirable for the purposes of the company to do so.' It seems to me that a condition so qualified would be repugnant and contradictory to itself. At anyrate, the qualification would have the effect of reducing one of the statutory conditions of the memorandum to an empty form." I cannot better express my own opinion than in the words there used by the noble and learned Lord. I think that if you add to the memorandum of association anything that derogates from or annuls one of its statutory requisites, that must necessarily be an illegal condition. Upon these grounds I am for granting the prayer of this petition, removing the petitioner's name from the register of shareholders, and ordering the company, as I think we may by the 35th section, to repay the £15.

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration
and Mining,
Limited.

LORD MURE.—I entirely agree in the grounds on which your Lordship has so very clearly based your judgment in this most important case, and I have nothing to add.

LORD SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I adopt your Lordship's judgment upon all the points with which it has dealt.

I consider that this case is really decided by the case of Trevor v. Whitworth. Looking at the question which was there settled, and the grounds of the decision, I think we have practically the same question raised in this case. In Trevor v. Whitworth the company had bought back a number of its own shares, and in that way the capital was diminished. The Court held that that was illegal and ultra vires, because the company had no power to diminish the capital, which was specified in the memorandum. It appears to me that what was done here, although not done in the same way, has precisely the same effect. The Court in Trevor v. Whitworth expressed a strong view that the creditors were entitled to look to the capital as it was defined in the memorandum, and that the shareholders and directors of the company could not, unless under special conditions, and with the sanction of the Court under the Statute of 1867, reduce that capital by any process, and of course buying back their shares was practically reducing their capital. Now, can it possibly be said that if £1 shares are issued at a discount of 12s. 6d. that is not reducing the capital? In the one case the capital is paid back; in the other the obligation of the shareholder to pay his share of capital is discharged. The operation in the one case has precisely the same effect as in the other, although it is done in a different form, and therefore I hold the case of Trevor v. Whitworth to be decisive of this case, except on the point to which your Lordship last alluded, that here the power to issue shares at a discount is contained in the memorandum, but on that matter also I agree with your Lordship. A power to issue shares contrary to the express provisions of the statute cannot be given by a provision in the memorandum.

Counsel for the respondents maintained an argument upon the Companies Clauses Acts, and as to what could be done with reference to the issue of a railway company's stock at a discount, and it is right to notice the argument that was so presented. It was maintained with reference to the provisions of these statutes, in the first place, that it was obvious that the Legislature did not consider that it was in all cases an illegal proceeding to issue shares at a discount; and, in the second place, that if we applied the analogy of these statutes to the present case, it would be found with reference to issuing shares at a discount that a company under the Companies Acts really had that power. It was said

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

that that power would be found to exist in the case of railway and other companies which come under the Companies Clauses Acts, and that the statutes with which we have here to deal are substantially the same.

Now, it appears to me that the argument succeeded so far. I think Mr Murray was able to shew us—at least he satisfied me—that in the case of companies which come into operation under the Companies Clauses Acts of 1845 and subsequent statutes there is power to issue shares at a discount, subject to certain conditions and restrictions. But I think the argument entirely fails to shew that the clauses which allow of that power in the case of railway companies, and other companies adopting the Companies Clauses Acts, are at all the same either in terms or in effect as the clauses which we have to deal with in the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867. In the Companies Clauses Act of 1845, section 6 provides that “the capital of the company shall be divided into shares of a prescribed number and amount, and such shares shall be numbered in arithmetical progression,” and section 38 contains this provision as to the liability of shareholders, that “if any legal diligence or execution shall have been issued against the property or effects of the company, and if there cannot be found sufficient whereon to levy under such diligence or execution, then such diligence or execution may be used against any of the shareholders to the extent of their shares respectively in the capital of the company not then paid up; and for the purpose of ascertaining the names of the shareholders” access shall be given to the register. Now, if these had been the only provisions in that statute affecting a question of this kind, it appears to me that the result would have been precisely the same as under the Acts we are dealing with. There would have been limited liability, but I think there would have been no power to the company to purchase its own shares or to issue shares at a discount. But we were referred to the special provision touching this matter contained in section 63 of the Companies Clauses Act of 1845, which deals with unissued capital authorised to be issued by the conversion of the power to borrow money into a power to issue capital stock. Section 61 provides—“If at the time of any such augmentation of capital taking place by the creation of new shares, the then existing shares be at a premium or of greater actual value than the nominal value thereof, then, unless it be otherwise provided by the special Act, the sum so to be raised shall be divided into shares of such amount as will conveniently allow the same to be apportioned among the then shareholders in proportion to the existing shares held by them respectively,” and they are to be offered to existing shareholders accordingly. But section 63 provides that “if at the time of such augmentation of capital taking place the existing shares be not at a premium, then such new shares may be of such amount, and may be issued in such manner and on such terms as the company shall think fit.” Now, I am disposed to hold, and I think the subsequent course of legislation shews, that by that clause with its wide powers having reference to augmentation of capital where the existing shares are not at a premium the new shares may be issued at a discount. But that is, I think, because of the very special terms of this particular clause, which provides that the shares may be issued “on such terms as the company shall think fit.” The power of issuing the shares on such terms does, I think, include the power to issue shares at a discount, and subsequent legislation on the subject shews that the Legislature had taken that view of the section, because in the Act of 26 and 27 Vict. c. 118, sec. 21, which follows on a number of sections providing for the issuing of new shares, and new stock in the case of a railway company, provides that, subject to the foregoing provisions, the company "may from time to time dispose of new shares and new stock at such times to such persons on such terms and conditions, and in such manner as the directors think advantageous to the company," but it goes on to enact—"But so that not less than the full nominal amount of any share or portion of stock be payable or paid in respect thereof." This clause, it may be observed, directly prohibits the issuing of shares at a discount, and accordingly if the enactments had stood there, in the case of railway companies that could not have been done.

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration
and Mining, Limited.

But by two subsequent statutes, the latter being the Act 32 and 33 Vict. c. 48, sec. 5, it was provided, with reference to the section which I have now read,—"Section 21 of the Companies Clauses Act of 1863 shall, with respect to any company to which it is applicable under the provisions of this or any other Act, be read to have effect as if the following words—that is to say, 'but so that not less than the full nominal amount of any share or portion of stock be payable or paid in respect thereof,' had not been inserted in that section." So that the prohibition to issue shares at a discount was removed by the Legislature, and apparently in certain limited cases the shares of railway and other companies which have adopted the Companies Clauses Acts may be issued at a discount.

But while the argument goes this length, I do not think it goes a step further. The mode in which that authority is given in certain limited cases is by the provision of the statute that the directors may issue the shares on such terms as they think fit. There is nothing of that kind in the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867. The only reference to which counsel for the respondents could appeal upon this matter is contained in Table A relating to the articles of association, which may be adopted by any company. Table A, sec. 27, provides that "subject to any direction to the contrary that may be given by the meeting that sanctions the increase of capital, all new shares shall be offered to the members in proportion to the existing shares held by them, and such offers shall be made by notice specifying the number of shares to which the member is entitled, and limiting a time within which the offer, if not accepted, will be deemed to be declined, and after the expiration of such time, or on the receipt of an intimation from the member to whom such notice is given that he declines to accept the shares offered, the directors may dispose of the same in such manner as they think most beneficial to the company." Now, the distinction between the two classes of cases is two-fold. In the first place, the Companies Clauses Act of 1845 itself in one of its enactments gives the power. We have no such power given in the Companies Act of 1862, and even if a power of that kind were inserted in the articles of association, or indeed in the memorandum of association, it would not be effectual as against the provisions of the statute, which directly prohibit any such proceeding. But further, when we turn to the articles of association we find there is no such wide power given as to authorise directors to issue shares "on such terms" as they think fit, and the absence of these words, I think, makes all the difference between the two cases. On these grounds it appears to me that the argument founded upon the Companies Clauses Acts has no material bearing on the question which we are to decide, and that under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867 the issue of shares at a discount is ultra vires.

LORD ADAM.—I concur for the reasons now stated by your Lordships, and

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Klenck v.
East India Co.
for Exploration and Mining, Limited.

for the reasons stated by the English Judges in the Almada case. The only difference between this and the Almada case that I can see is that in this case the company has taken power by its memorandum of association to issue shares at a discount, or they have attempted to do so. Nobody disputes that there must be certain conditions inserted in the memorandum of association, and that these are essential conditions under the Act. If that be so, it has always appeared to me to be a very clear proposition that in the same memorandum of association you cannot insert valid conditions which will give power to the company, if exercised, to destroy all or any of the essential conditions required by the Act to be in the memorandum of association. Take, for example, the first condition which must be inserted, viz., that the name of the company shall be followed by the word "limited": would it be possible to insert a valid condition in the same memorandum of association giving the power to the company to alter the name of the company by the omission of the word "limited"? The thing would be absurd. And so you might go through every one of the essential conditions, and take power in the memorandum which would enable the company to destroy every one of the statutory essential conditions, and so reduce the memorandum to a nullity. This would be out of the question, and I quite agree with the reasoning of Lord Macnaghten on that point.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grant the prayer of the petition: Ordain the said respondents to rectify the register of the company, and to delete therefrom the entry of the petitioner's name as holder of 300 shares of the capital stock of said company (part of the shares issued in July 1887) standing in his name in the said register, and direct that the respondents give due notice of such rectification to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies in Scotland: Further, interdict and prohibit the said company from making or enforcing any call or calls on the petitioner in respect of said shares, or for charging him for any alleged price in respect thereof, or from holding or treating him in any way as a shareholder of said company in respect of the said 300 shares, and decern: Further decern and ordain the said company to make payment to the petitioner of the sum of £15 paid by him in respect of said shares, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent, from the 25th day of July 1887."

J. C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 57.

GENERAL PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY, AND LIQUIDATOR, Pursuers (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Salvesen.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and
Liquidator v.
Matheson's
Trustees.

Mrs ALEXA URQUHART OR MATHESON AND OTHERS (Matheson's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Sir Charles Pearson—C. S. Dickson.

GENERAL PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY AND LIQUIDATOR, Petitioners.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Salvesen.

Mrs ALEXA URQUHART OR MATHESON AND OTHERS (Matheson's Trustees), Respondents.—Sir Charles Pearson—C. S. Dickson.

Public Company—Power to purchase its own shares—Ultra vires—Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 35.—Held (in conformity with Trevor v. Whitworth, July 11, 1887, L. R., 12 App. Cas. 409) that it is ultra vires of a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, to purchase its own shares, and that such a purchase is not only voidable but void.

A, a shareholder in a limited company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862 and 1867, sold his shares to the company in 1876, there being a provision in the articles of association binding him to offer them to the company in the first instance. A transfer was executed, and his name removed from the register. The company was successful for some years afterwards, and paid large dividends. Subsequently calls were made, and the whole nominal capital was exhausted; and ten years after the sale, and nine after A's death, the company went into liquidation. Proceedings were thereafter taken by the liquidator to have A's transfer reduced, and the names of his representatives placed upon the list of contributories, and the calls which had been made paid by them, in respect that it was ultra vires of the company to purchase its own shares. It appeared that the shareholders generally were aware that the company was in the habit of purchasing its own shares, that other purchasers than the company could easily have been found for the shares in question, and that a considerable amount of debt, still outstanding, had been incurred before as well as after the sale. Held that the transfer fell to be reduced as being ab initio void, and that in terms of the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, "the justice of the case" required that the names of A's representatives should be placed upon the list of contributories.

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees.

Question as to the liability of A's representatives to pay calls made after the transfer, and as to their right to dividends after that date.

Observations per Lord Shand on the case of The Silkstone Coal Company, in re Dronfield, 1880, L. R., 17 Chanc. Div. 76.

THE GENERAL PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, on 3d February 1876, the object of the company being to purchase heritable property, and any rights secured over heritable property within the United Kingdom, to hold, manage, build upon, lend upon, feu, or sell the same, and do all such other things as were incidental to the attainment of such objects. The capital of the company consisted of 4250 shares of £10 each. It had no power under its memorandum of association to purchase its own shares.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
B.

The articles of association of the company contained, inter alia, the following.—"IV. No shareholder shall transfer his shares until he has first made offer of them to the company at the then market price. V. Any shares acquired by the company may be retained as the property of the company, or disposed of in such manner as the company in general meeting thinks fit to direct."

The company did a considerable business for some years, and in 1877, 1878, and 1879, it paid dividends of 12 per cent. Subsequently to 1879 it paid no dividend, and on 24th November 1886 an order for its winding-up was pronounced on a petition at the instance of the company and three of its directors. David Myles, accountant in Dundee, was appointed liquidator.

Mr Robert Matheson, architect, was an original shareholder of the company to the amount of 250 shares, which he transferred to the company by transfer, dated 23d June and 7th October 1876, bearing to be granted "in consideration of the sum of £254, 11s. 10d. paid to me" by the company. The transfer was signed by Mr Matheson, and by three directors, and the secretaries of the company.

On 2d November 1887 the company and its liquidator brought an action of reduction of that transfer, and of an entry in the company's books, dated 31st October 1876, of the name of the company as holder of the 250 shares. There was also a conclusion for payment of £3066, 10s., being (1) the £254, 11s. 10d. above mentioned; (2) £2250, the amount of five calls made upon the 250 shares from 10th May 1876 onwards—the last being one of £1 per share on 30th June 1887, after the company had gone into liquidation; and (3) interest at five per cent

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and
Liquidator v.
Matheson's
Trustees.

on the £254, 11s. 10d. from the date of its payment by the company on the calls from the dates when these were respectively made.

The action was brought against Mr Matheson's trustees, he had died on 5th March 1877.

The pursuers averred that the sale and transfer of the 250 shares illegal and invalid, and in violation of the provisions of the Companies Acts, and that it was not known to the shareholders or creditors of the company that the transfer had been executed or accepted by the directors. They further alleged that the dividends of 1877, 1878, and 1879 had been paid out of capital.

The defenders stated that Mr Matheson had originally taken the shares in question on the understanding that he was to be architect and valuator of the company, but that in consequence of a Government appointment which he held he had to decline to act; that on 19th March 1876 he offered the shares in question to the directors, and informed them that if they did not take them another buyer was ready to purchase them; that they were accordingly bought by the directors, and the sale was approved and homologated by the shareholders, in whose knowledge the shares were also re-allocated to other persons; that since 1876 neither the name of Mr Matheson nor of the defenders had been entered in the register of shareholders, nor in any of the company's books, nor in its annual statutory return; that the defenders could not have held the shares after Mr Matheson's death, and that if they had been informed of the illegality of the transfer, they would at once have disposed of them. The defenders denied that the dividends had been paid out of capital.

They further averred that "the defenders were not called to attend the meetings of the company at which the question as to liquidating the company was considered, and they never received any notice whatever of any of the meetings of the said company, or of the liquidation proceedings or proceedings therein. . . . It is impossible for the pursuers to make restitutio in integrum, in the event of the said transfer being reduced, and the present claim now made by the pursuers in this action, if sustained, would involve great hardship and injustice and loss to the defenders and the trust-estate. The said claim is inequitable and contrary to the justice of the case."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The sale and transfer of shares by Mr Matheson to the company condescended on, being illegal and invalid and inconsistent with and in violation of the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867,—(a) The said transfer should be reduced as concluded for; and a Decree should be pronounced in terms of the petitory conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defenders should be absolved, in respect of the lapse of time since the transfer was granted and accepted, and of the actings of parties and the change of circumstances, condescended on. (4) Restitutio in integrum being impossible the defenders should be absolved. (5) No notice of any calls having been given to the defenders or Mr Matheson, and the said calls not having been duly made, so far as the defenders are concerned the defenders should be absolved from the conclusion for payment of calls. (6) The company and the shareholders and creditors thereof having acquiesced in and adopted and homologated the said sale and transfer the pursuers are barred from now maintaining their present claims.

A lengthy proof, both documentary and oral, was led, from which it appeared that of the 4250 shares 1250 were from first to last acquired by the company. A number of these were re-issued—but not those originally held by Mr Matheson—but 758 stood in the name of the company.

it went into liquidation. The minutes and balance-sheets of the company shewed that the fact of the company's holding its own shares must have been known to the shareholders.

There was evidence (quoted by Lord Shand, infra, p. 291) to shew that some of the company's existing liabilities had been incurred prior to May 1876, when Mr Matheson transferred his shares.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 10th March 1888, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that it was ultra vires of the General Property Investment Company to purchase from the late Robert Matheson the 250 shares mentioned on record, and that the transfer of said shares, now sought to be reduced, was illegal: Finds, further, that the pursuer, as liquidator of said company, is entitled to recover, and that the defenders are bound to make payment to him of the sum of £254, 11s. 10d., being the amount paid by said company to the said Robert Matheson, in respect of said transfer, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent from the date of citation to this action till paid: Quoad ultra supersedes further consideration of the cause in hoc statu: Grants leave to reclaim."*

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers in this case seek decree against the defenders, the representatives of the late Mr Robert Matheson, in the first place for reduction of a pretended transfer by Mr Matheson to the company of 250 of the company's shares; and secondly, of a pretended entry in the books of the company, dated 1st October 1876, of the names of the company as holders of the 250 shares. These reductive conclusions are followed by a conclusion for payment of over £3000, made up of £254, 11s. 10d. paid by the company to Mr Matheson in respect of the transfer, and the balance of calls made on, and said to be payable in respect of, the 250 shares in question. The defenders say that no notice of any calls has ever been given to them, and that they should be absolved from the conclusions relating to the calls.

"The last of the calls is one made since the company went into liquidation, and it is quite obvious that with that I cannot meddle; that is a matter that must be disposed of in the liquidation. With regard to the other calls, I am not in a position to pronounce any judgment at present. No argument whatever has been addressed to me on one side or the other with regard to the question raised by the defenders' fifth plea. It is stated by the defenders that no notice was sent to them or to Mr Matheson that the calls in question had been made, and I might almost assume that to be true, because at the date of the respective calls Mr Matheson's name was not on the register of the company, having been removed in respect of the transfer now sought to be reduced.

"What effect the absence of due notice may have upon the question of the defenders' liability for the calls is a matter I may have to consider and determine. But I think it advisable to supersede consideration of that matter at present, for a nice question has been raised by the defenders as to whether in the whole circumstances of this case they are now subject to be put upon the register of the company as representing Mr Matheson, and thereby made liable as contributories. The defenders' argument is based upon certain words in the Companies Acts of 1862, and undoubtedly may give rise to some difficulty. At all events, it involves some nice considerations, and I am not disposed to throw any difficulty in the way of the defenders pleading that right which they have, if it is a right to exemption, before the Judge who is taking charge of the liquidation.

"Therefore, at this moment desiring not to prejudice anybody's rights, I am to supersede consideration of this case quoad the calls, to enable either the pursuer to apply to the Judge in the liquidation to have the defenders put upon the register of shareholders, or to allow the defenders, if they think right, to take any steps for their own protection against such liability as would thereby

No. 57. The defenders reclaimed.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees.

On 25th February 1888 the liquidator of the company had presented a note to the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), before whom the liquidation depended, to have the list of contributories varied, and the names of Mr Matheson's trustees placed thereon in respect of the 250 shares. Answers were lodged by the trustees, and the parties having agreed that the evidence in the reduction process should be held as evidence in this cause also, the Lord Ordinary thereupon, of consent, reported the cause to the First Division.

Both causes were heard together.

Argued for the reclaimers (defenders in the reduction process, and respondents to the note in the liquidation);—I. It was immaterial to them in which of the two processes the questions which had been raised were decided, provided they were not deprived of the benefit of the 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862.* That section fell to be read along with the 98th section of the same Act, which provided for the collection and application of assets after an order for winding up had been made. Under the 35th section it was for the liquidator to satisfy the Court "of the justice of the case." Prima facie, the present application for rectification was a most unjust one. Matheson had only been on the register for a few months when he transferred his shares at their market value to the company, and their name was substituted for his upon the register. Matheson himself had died within a year after the transfer of the shares, and nothing more was heard of the matter, and no notice of calls or of meetings had been made by the company until this claim was made by the liquidator ten years later. Matheson had been bound by the company's articles to offer the shares to the company in the first instance, and if they had not taken them he could have disposed of them to a third party. Even after Matheson's death his representatives might have sold the shares if they had known that the transfer could not stand. Besides, the fact that the company held a number of its own shares, even if not previously known, had been brought to the notice of the shareholders in the balance-sheet of 1882, from which it appeared that it at that time held 508 of these shares, and the shareholders had thereby homologated the transfer. All these were circumstances which the Court be imposed. What I propose to do in the meantime is to find that the transfer in question was illegal and invalid, and that the defenders are liable in repayment of the sum paid by the company in respect of that transfer. It might have been supposed that, on that finding, I should at once have proceeded to the logical conclusion of reducing the transfer; but I do not do that in the meantime, because if I were to reduce the transfer, it might have the effect of restoring Mr Matheson's name to the register, and that might be settling the whole question against him, and practically against his representatives, and I do not desire to do that in the meantime. All that I shall do is to find that the transfer was illegal; that the defenders are bound to repeat the price; and quoad ultra, supersede consideration of the case."

* The 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862 provides,—“If the name of any person is, without sufficient cause entered in or omitted from the register of members of any company under this Act, or if default is made or unnecessary delay takes place in entering on the register the fact of any person having ceased to be a member of the company, the person or member aggrieved, or any member of the company, or the company itself, may . . . as respects companies registered in Scotland, by summary petition to the Court of Session . . . apply for an order of the Court that the register may be rectified; and the Court may either refuse such application . . . or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register. . . .”

would take into consideration in judging of the "justice of the case." No. 57.
 This case was distinguishable from that of Trevor v. Whitworth.<sup>1</sup> That was a case where a shareholder who had sold his shares to a company immediately before its liquidation sued the liquidator for payment of the balance of the price, and it was an inchoate transaction, very different from the present. If proceedings had been taken against Matheson or his representatives de recenti, it must be admitted that the transaction could not have been supported. But Lord Macnaghten's opinion in the case of Trevor, in dealing with the judgment in the Dronfield Silkstone Coal Company<sup>2</sup> was in point, where his Lordship seemed to hold that the actings of a company subsequent to the repurchase of its own shares might operate as a bar to their obtaining the remedy which they sought here. Upon the question of the liability for calls it could not be pleaded, looking to the case of Ferguson,<sup>3</sup> that although notice of calls was required under sec. 4 of Table A of the Companies Act, 1862, the want of such notice was of itself fatal to the demand now made. But this was a matter which must be taken into account in considering "the justice of the case," because, if notice had been given, the defenders, as had been already said, might have got rid of the shares. Further, it was proposed to make these calls available to pay not only those who were creditors at the date of the transfer but subsequent creditors also.
 At any rate interest could not be claimed upon these calls. Besides, credit must be given for the dividends which the company had paid, and if the liquidator succeeded in his demand for payment of the calls, that payment must suffer deduction by the amount of the dividends which had been earned by the shares after their re-purchase. It was attempted to say that these dividends had not been earned, and that they had been paid out of capital, but that had not been proved. II. What was asked implied that there must be restitutio in integrum, but that was impossible.
 Ten years after Matheson's name had been removed from the register the company had gone into liquidation, and it was proposed to restore matters in integrum by offering his representatives 250 shares in a bankrupt concern. The company being in liquidation restitutio in integrum was impossible.<sup>4</sup> III. Assuming the liquidator to be entitled to a remedy, the proper course was to place upon the register the names of the directors and secretaries of the company who had signed the transfer.<sup>5</sup>

Argued for the liquidator;—I. The transfer by Matheson to the company of his 250 shares was not only voidable, but was ab initio void, and it was not in the power of the company to bar themselves from making good a challenge of it. The case of Trevor put this beyond doubt,<sup>6</sup> and the legal result was that the contract of sale must be regarded as never having been executed. The dicta of Lord Macnaghten in reference to the Silkstone Coal Company case in his opinion in Trevor's case, which had been founded on upon the other side, were merely obiter, and were not necessary to the decision. The Master of the Rolls (Jessel), in giving

Dec. 21, 1888.
 General Property Investment Co. and
 Liquidator v.
 Matheson's
 Trustees.

<sup>1</sup> 12 App. Cas. 409.

<sup>2</sup> Dec. 20, 21, 1880, 17 Chanc. Div. 76.

<sup>3</sup> Ferguson v. Central Halls Co., July 20, 1881, 8 R. 997.

<sup>4</sup> Addie v. Western Bank, June 9, 1865, 3 Macph. 899, revd. H. of L., 5 Macph. 80; Graham v. Western Bank, Feb. 2, 1864, 2 Macph. 559, March 8, 1865, 3 Macph. 617, Lord Curriehill, p. 631.

<sup>5</sup> Gardiners v. Victoria Estates Co., Limited, July 18, 1885, 12 R. 1356.

<sup>6</sup> Trevor v. Whitworth, July 11, 1887, L. R., 12 App. Ca. 409, Lord Watson, p. 428; cf. also the Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, 1875, Eng. and Ir. Appa. 653, Lord Cairns, p. 672.

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and
Liquidator v.
Matheson's
Trustees.

his judgment in the Silkstone case<sup>1</sup> had held that the transaction being void, no lapse of time could make any difference. Besides, even assuming Lord Macnaghten's views on the Silkstone case to be sound, there was a material distinction between the facts of that case and of the present. There the company had the object of getting rid of a troublesome shareholder, and the shareholders authorised the transaction. Here the liquidator had an equitable claim so far as regarded those who were creditors for debts due by the company prior to the date when Matheson ceased to be a shareholder. The words of the 35th section, "if satisfied of the justice of the case," merely meant "if the case was quite clear," and their application was not restricted to the case of a liquidation. They applied equally to the common law action.<sup>2</sup> It might be that in so far as the liquidator could be said to represent shareholders who had ratified the transaction he was barred from questioning it. But here was a corporation which represented not only existing shareholders, but future shareholders and creditors, and if on looking back it appeared that the company or any of the shareholders had been acting beyond their powers, redress might be had at any distance of time. The corporation could not bar itself when the act in question was an illegal act. Neither could the directors nor the general body of shareholders bind the company to anything outwith its powers. No real distinction could be drawn between cases where those who were interested were creditors prior to the illegal transaction complained of, and others where those interested became creditors subsequently to the transaction. The cases which had been decided upon the subject of promotion-money were in point. No distinction of that kind had ever been taken in these cases between one set of creditors and another, and where a shareholder had paid up his shares in kind and not in cash, when this was discovered—however long afterwards—payment in cash might be demanded.<sup>3</sup> It might have been different if the proposition, that a call could not be enforced unless notice were given at the time, was sound. But it had been held that a liquidator might give notice of and enforce a call even after the liquidation had commenced.<sup>4</sup> II. A demand for restitutio in integrum could only be pleaded where a contract was voidable. Where there was a radical nullity that doctrine had no place.<sup>5</sup>

At advising,—

LORD SHAND.—The General Property Investment Company, with reference to certain of whose shares the present question has been raised, was incorporated under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867 in February 1876, with a capital of £42,500, the shares being divided into 4250 shares of £10 each. The object of the company was practically to speculate in land. They proposed to purchase lands which were likely to rise in value, to hold them for a time, and then to sell them as advantageously as they could, and they carried on business

<sup>1</sup> In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., 1880, L. R., 17 Chanc. Div. 76.

<sup>2</sup> In re National and Provincial Marine Insurance Co., 1867, L. R., 2 Chanc. App. 685; In re Gresham Life Assurance Society, ex parte Penney, 1872, L. R., 8 Chanc. App. 446.

<sup>3</sup> In re Canadian Oil Works Corporation (Hay's case), 1875, L. R., 10 Ch. App. 593; Huntington Copper Company v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, 4 R. 294, aff. Nov. 29, 1877, 5 R. (H. L.) 1.

<sup>4</sup> Stone v. City and County Bank, 1877, L. R., 3 C. P. Div. 282.

<sup>5</sup> Graham v. Western Bank, Feb. 2, 1864, 2 Macph. 559, March 8, 1865, 3 Macph. 617; Clarke v. Dickson, April 26, 1858, 27 L. J., Q. B. 223; Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, March 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 53.

for about ten years, till November 1886, when they became insolvent. This No. 57.

Court then pronounced an order for winding up the company, and Mr Myles was appointed liquidator. It appears that during the existence of the company a number of the company's own shares were purchased by the directors, one of the articles of association purporting to confer on them a power to make such purchases. Part of these shares were re-allocated, mainly, if not altogether, to existing shareholders, but when the liquidation came into force the company had in their hands no fewer than 758 shares of their own stock. The late Mr Matheson had been an original shareholder of the company to the extent of 250 shares. He paid the deposit upon these shares, but shortly after having done so he found that the reason which had induced him to connect himself with the company no longer existed, because, while he had anticipated professional employment as a valuator for the company, he found that his engagements otherwise would not admit of his taking such employment, and accordingly an arrangement was made between him and the directors that the company should purchase his shares. This they agreed to do, and to repay the deposit of £1 on each share, with interest at 5 per cent to date. The company accordingly accepted a transfer of the shares. A call, I believe, had been resolved on by that time, but of course it was not enforced, the transfer having been accepted before it became payable, and it appears that Mr Matheson's name was removed from the register or stock ledger, and the shares carried to an account of shares re-purchased by the company. Mr Matheson died in 1877, and for ten years, and indeed until this liquidation occurred, no more was heard of these shares by anyone representing him. The company went on doing business, paying large dividends for one or two years, but these dividends ceased, and then calls were made, and I believe an additional call of £1 has been made since the liquidation commenced, exhausting the whole nominal capital. It appears, I think, that Mr Matheson might, and probably would have sold his shares to a third party in the market, or to some other shareholder, if the company had not bought them, and his executors after his death had no reason to anticipate any responsibility in connection with them, so that undoubtedly the case now presented, viz., that the contract must be set aside, and Mr Matheson's trustees placed on the register of the company, is one of very great hardship. There can be no question of that. But on the other hand, the liquidator, founding, as he was bound to do, on the strict principles applicable to joint stock companies under the statutes, has taken proceedings for two purposes. In the first place, he has brought an action of reduction to have the transfer by Mr Matheson set aside, and the price which he received repaid to the company with interest, with a conclusion also for payment of the calls made by the company and by the liquidator. That action depended before Lord Trayner, who has given findings to the effect, first, that it was ultra vires of the company to enter into the transaction with Mr Matheson; and second, that the pursuer is entitled to recover the sum of £254, being the amount paid by the company to Mr Matheson, and interest. In addition to that action there is before us a note presented to Lord Kinnear, in which his Lordship, as Judge in the liquidation, is asked to put the trustees and executors of Mr Matheson on the register, in respect of their holding of these shares, and there again there is a claim made for the payment of calls. That note has been simply reported to the Court to be taken up with the action of reduction, and we have now to deal with both proceedings.

So far as regards the action of reduction, I think that although a defence was

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees.

urged against any decree for payment of calls, on the ground of the lapse of time that has taken place, and the actings of parties, it was scarcely maintained that there was any legal ground upon which the defenders could resist the conclusions in so far as the Lord Ordinary has given effect to them. His Lordship has found that it was ultra vires of the company, under the Joint Stock Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, to become purchasers of their own shares, and upon that ground he has found that the transaction was illegal, and that the price must be repaid. If there was any argument against that view of the Lord Ordinary, I have only to say that I think the point has been clearly settled by the decision in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth (L. R., 12 App. Ca. 409), shortly before this action was raised, and as we have already had occasion to refer to that case very fully in the case of Klenck (ante, p. 271), I shall say no more than this, that I think it clearly decides that a transaction of this kind is not merely voidable, but is void, as being ultra vires of the company. It is a transaction which not only the directors had no right to enter upon, but which even the company themselves at a meeting of all the shareholders could not adopt, because it was directly in the teeth of the Statute of 1862. It is to be observed with reference to the opinions given by the learned Judges in the House of Lords that the judgment is the result of a careful examination of the provisions of the Statutes of 1862 and 1867, and is strongly placed upon the ground that creditors dealing with companies limited under the Companies Acts are entitled to look to the capital as disclosed in the memorandum of association as the fund to meet their debts, and that a company cannot cut into that capital by any such proceeding as purchasing back its own shares any more than they can by issuing shares at a discount. Now, that being so, it appears to me that we must plainly adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary so far as it goes.

But the further questions under the conclusions for reduction and the petition have now to be disposed of. The first question is, is the transfer to be reduced?—and I think it follows from what I have said that there must be decree of reduction of that transfer. The next question is whether Mr Matheson's representatives are to be put upon the register as the holders of these shares. That is resisted by the executors on the ground, as I have said, of the lapse of time, and of the circumstances I have already referred to. It is stated, and I think it is made out upon the proof, that at least a number of the shareholders were aware that the company was purchasing its own shares. We have the fact that in the books of the company the shares after the delivery of the transfer were no longer in Mr Matheson's name, or in the name of his executors, but that they stood in the name of the company, and the balance-sheets circulated among the shareholders, at least after 1881, made it clear that the company had purchased and themselves become holders of a large number of their own shares. It was further said that, but for the conduct of the company, Mr Matheson would have sold his shares to a third party, and in any view, that his executors would have so sold them shortly after his death in 1877. That being so, it was contended that, under section 35 of the Statute of 1862, which, in dealing with the amending of the register by putting on a shareholder's name, uses the expression that the Court shall do so "if satisfied of the justice of the case," it would not be in accordance with "the justice of the case" that we should adopt that course here, and place the name of Mr Matheson's executors, as representing him, upon the register. On the other hand, it appears from the proof that there has been a very large amount of debt incurred by the company, and that there is one special debt of very considerable amount which was incurred before the transaction with Mr Matheson for the purchase of his shares took place at all. Mr Myles is examined on that point, and he says,—“There is a bond to H. R. Cunningham for the sum of £3000, which is not all paid up. The money was received on 15th May 1876. Then there is £800 of Clarke’s trustees’ bond. No claim has been made in respect of that—indeed that has been paid up by a sale of the property by the bondholders since the liquidation. (Q.) With regard to Cunningham’s bond, there is a deficiency in the subject of security? (A.) Upwards of £1100 is the amount of the claim in the liquidation. (Q.) The heritable subjects not having been sold? (A.) They are interested in the property that has been sold by Clarke’s trustees, but they will get nothing out of it. (Q.) To some extent the security over which their bond extended has been realised? (A.) Yes, but by a prior bondholder, and they get no benefit. I am quite satisfied that the deficiency is not overstated in the claim that has been made; I think it will probably be more.” So that we have an existing debt of upwards of £1100 incurred before Mr Matheson sold his shares to the company, and a number of debts incurred afterwards.

No. 57.
Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson’s Trustees.

In that state of matters, the question is whether the liquidator is to be precluded from the remedy which he asks, of putting Mr Matheson’s execution on the register. I do not think the defenders can successfully resist the liquidator’s demand to that effect. If the legal right of the company be clear, then it follows that the justice of the case requires that effect shall be given to that right. Now, the ground on which the case of Trevor v. Whitworth was decided was that the purchase of the shares was ultra vires of the company. The transfer is therefore an absolute nullity, and when it is maintained for the defenders that the company have adopted or homologated what was then done, the reply is obvious, that a company of this kind, carried on under the statutes with the limited powers which these statutes confer, can no more by adoption or homologation make a proceeding of this kind legal than they can lawfully enter into the original transaction itself. It is a nullity originally, and the company cannot homologate or adopt a nullity, for that is equally ultra vires. And so upon that ground I think the case for the defenders fails. It is clear also that there are creditors who are not satisfied—creditors to a large amount, whose debt existed before this transaction took place,—and they are entitled, through the liquidator, to have it found that the proceeding, whether originally or by adoption, was ultra vires and could not prejudice them. Then there are creditors for large amounts whose debts were afterwards contracted. I do not express any final opinion, but the leaning of my opinion is to the effect that even later creditors are entitled to get behind a transaction of this kind, because it is within their right to say that they must have the whole capital of this company in the condition in which the shares were issued to the shareholders, in so far as the shareholders have not validly transferred their shares, and to be put in a position to realise that capital, and, through the liquidator, to cut down a transaction of this kind. The views that I have now stated as to this transaction being clearly ultra vires of the company, and as to the effect of a transaction of that kind being such that it cannot be adopted even by homologation, I think are strongly borne out by the decision of the Court in the case of the Ashbury Railway Carriage Company, which has been so often referred to in cases of this kind, regarding the powers of joint stock companies. There was a reference in the argument for Mr Matheson’s executors to an im-

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and
Liquidator v.
Matheson's
Trustees.

portant part of the opinion of Lord Macnaghten in the case of Trevor v. Whitworth, where he discusses the judgment in the case of the Silkstone Colliery Company, and where his Lordship indicates a strong opinion that although the judgment was bad in so far as it was held that the company could purchase back its shares, he indicates very strongly that he thinks it was well decided in the result, because of the actings of the company subsequent to the re-purchase of its own shares, and because of the position in which the company was when the claim to put the shareholders again on the register was first made. I shall only say with reference to the views his Lordship expressed on this point that this case differs materially from that of the Silkstone Colliery Company in this important particular, that in that case there was no creditor claiming who had been a creditor when the re-purchase of the shares was made by the company. The creditors all claimed on debts subsequently incurred. But further, his Lordship's dicta on this point were obiter, not entering into the grounds of judgment, and it appears to me that if it be just as much ultra vires of a company to homologate a transaction of this kind as it was to enter into it originally, the actings of the company subsequent to the transaction cannot make it effectual and binding on the company in liquidation. If the case had been one of a shareholders' liquidation only, there might be room for the argument that shareholders, and certainly shareholders who were parties to a transaction of this kind, would be barred from insisting on a former shareholder being brought on the register after all that had occurred, but the case does not bring any point of that kind up for consideration. Then, although it may be quite true that had this question been raised at a much earlier date, Mr Matheson or his executors might have sold the shares to a third party, this can be no answer to the liquidator's claim, for his reply is that the nature of the transaction being void it was open to challenge under the statutes at any time, and the shareholder was bound to know that this was the law. What I have said now leads, I think, first, to our proceeding a step further than the Lord Ordinary has done, viz., to the granting of a decree of reduction of the transfer, and, in the next place, to the putting of Mr Matheson's executors on the register.

But there remain questions about two matters which have not been fully discussed, and which, in any judgment that we now pronounce, must be reserved for consideration. I refer to the question as to the liability for calls, and also as to the right to credit for dividends. On that matter I should like to say that it appears that the calls were never intimated to Mr Matheson's executors, and naturally they could not be intimated because they were not treated as shareholders. It is clear, therefore, that in the absence of intimation till the service of the summons of reduction, an important question must, in any view, arise in regard to the interest which can be debited on account of calls. On the other hand, Mr Matheson's executors say that all the other shareholders during the period which elapsed after the re-purchase by this company of the shares in question received large dividends for some years, and they claim credit for these dividends, with interest applicable to them. In regard to these dividends, the liquidator has intimated that he is to maintain that they were paid out of capital and not out of profits. I must say I was not satisfied on the argument I heard that this has been made out on the proof, but that question remains for consideration, and all I shall say about it now is, that it will not do to say that property has come down greatly in value during subsequent years to look the question in the light of that great depreciation as the leading element to guide us with reference to what the directors did at a time when there was no such depreciation, and when property was rising in value. They may have been sanguine, but if they honestly believed that the properties had largely risen in value so as to warrant the payment of dividends, the very purpose of the company was to take advantage of such rise in value, and to pay dividends accordingly. But a second point may further be urged for Mr Matheson's executors, that, if they are to be put in the position now of having to come into this company and to pay calls as if they had been in the company all along, they would have got dividends as the other shareholders did, and it is very hard to say that they shall not get the benefit of the profits, which in the case supposed would have been so much money in their pockets. I mention these matters for the purpose of leading up to this, that I think all that might very properly form a subject for settlement as between the parties. Equitable considerations fairly come in in questions of this kind. Of course Mr Myles must do his duty as liquidator, but it appears to me that there are materials, on the grounds I have now stated, for an arrangement with reference to the interest on these calls, and with reference to the dividends, and I hope parties may ultimately see their way, instead of spending more money in litigation, to arrange these matters without further proceedings.

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Prom-
erty Investment Co. and
Liquidator v.
Matheson's
Trustees.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the view which Lord Shand has now expressed, for I can see no sufficient answer to the objection taken to the purchase of the shares by the directors from Mr Matheson. The sale was null and void from the first, and must therefore be set aside. That involves the affirmance of the Lord Ordinary's findings in fact, and the pronouncing of a decree as Lord Shand proposes. It also involves this, that the names of Mr Matheson's executors must be placed on the register. It is a hard case unquestionably in the circumstances, and if I could see my way to any course which would save Mr Matheson's representatives from the loss which this will lead to, I should be very glad to adopt it. But having regard to the nature of the transaction, and to the fact that the question is raised with creditors, I see no ground for relieving them to any extent at present.

I sympathise very much in the suggestion Lord Shand has thrown out as to the questions that may hereafter occur. If this question had been raised by the shareholders alone, and were not a question with creditors, there are, I think, words in the statute which appear to give the Court a discretionary power of dealing with such a question, because the shareholders were equally to blame in what was done. But these questions do not arise here, and when they do arise the consideration as to how far justice and equity may not require a modification of some of the demands that may then be made will also arise, but that is a matter upon which I am not in a position at present to offer any opinion.

LORD ADAM.—With reference to the first question here, I think that, upon the authorities and upon the reason of the case, there can be no doubt that the sale must be reduced and set aside, because I think it was a clear and absolute nullity—a sale which the company had no power whatever to enter into. Therefore, upon that point, I concur with Lord Shand, and the sale being a nullity, I should have thought that it followed almost as a matter of course that Mr Matheson's representatives should go upon the register. But it has been urged to us that the words of the 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862 apply, viz., that the Court may, if "satisfied of the justice of the case," make an order for the rectification of the register. In this case I am satisfied, on the grounds stated by Lord Shand, that it is in accordance with "the justice of the case" that the representatives should go upon the register; and I do not think it is necessary to consider what the particular force of these words in the 35th section may be, because I am satisfied, in any view of the case, that the register must be rectified by the representatives going on it. But it is obvious that after they are put upon the register, questions may arise as to the liability to calls, and as to interest. On these matters I reserve my opinion.

No. 57.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur with all your Lordships in holding that the judgment of the House of Lords in Trevor v. Whitworth necessarily rules this case so far, and that we must hold upon that authority that the sale of shares by Mr Matheson to the company, and the acceptance of that transfer by the company, was a nullity.

With regard to the special circumstances of the case which have been founded on by Mr Matheson's executors, the lapse of time during which Mr Matheson's name has been off the register, and the conduct of the company in dealing with these shares as no longer belonging to him, and so forth, I can only say that I have never been able to understand how a statutory company can confirm a nullity, and if they could not by direct resolution confirm a nullity, I do not see how that can be done rebus et factis. Acquiescence is nothing at all, unless it amount to confirmation or be equivalent to confirmation, and if it be impossible for a statutory corporation to confirm a nullity by direct resolution, it certainly cannot do so in any other way.

The judgment proposed, I think, is quite right, in so far as we advance a step further than the Lord Ordinary in the reduction has done, and pronounce decree of reduction, and also pronounce decree for repayment of the price, viz., £254, 11s., paid to Mr Matheson by the company. But the other question which is raised both by the conclusions of reduction and by the application of the liquidator is a question of novelty, and, I think, of very great importance, and it is one upon which hitherto we have heard no argument. Whether your Lordships will be inclined to remit the hearing of that to the Lord Ordinary in the reduction, or to the Lord Ordinary in the liquidation, or to keep it here and dispose of it directly, I am not disposed to offer any very confident advice, but that would require to be determined before we adjust the terms of our interlocutor. If the parties find themselves in a position to negotiate upon this subject, we might allow the matter to stand over. On the other hand, if there is no prospect of any settlement, perhaps the best plan would be to remit the matter to the Lord Ordinary in the reduction, for it is more directly and properly raised there than anywhere else.

In the action of reduction, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note by Mrs Alexa Urquhart or Matheson and others (Matheson's trustees and executors), against Lord Trayner's interlocutor, dated 10th March 1888, and heard counsel for the parties, adhere to said interlocutor: Refuse the reclaiming note, and decern in terms of the reductive conclusions of the libel; also decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £254, 11s. 10d. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of citation to this action till paid, reserving all questions of expenses."

In the note the Court ordered the names of the respondents to be placed on the list of contributories, but reserved the question of the respondents' liability for calls, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties thereon. No. 57.

The case was ultimately compromised as regarded the questions reserved.

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—HORNE & LYTELL, W.S.—Agents.

Dec. 21, 1888.
General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees.

J. R. CUNNINGHAM, Pursuer (Respondent).—Asher—Salvesen.
COLVILS, LOWDEN, & Co., Defenders (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Ure.

No. 58.

Ship—Seaworthiness—Charter-party—Exception—"Error or negligence of navigation"—Onus.—The charter-party of a steamship freed the owners from liability for "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind, during the said voyage." The vessel was lost through failure of steam-power, in consequence of which she drifted on a lee shore. In an action at the instance of the charterers against the owners for damages for the loss of the cargo, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) held (1) upon the evidence that the failure of steam-power was attributable to the water having been allowed to run too low in the boiler, so that the metal surfaces of the crowns of the wing furnaces and some of the boiler tubes were denuded of water, with the result that they contracted unevenly, and consequently leaked, when cold sea-water was admitted into the boiler, and (2) that the loss fell under the exception of "errors or negligence of navigation" in the charter-party, and that therefore the owners were not liable in damages.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co.

Observations per Lord Shand on the incidence of the onus of proof in a question between charterer and shipowner where cargo is not delivered owing to the loss of the ship.

Opinion per Lord Shand that in a charter-party under which a vessel sails to a certain port to take in cargo and convey it away there is an implied undertaking not only that she shall be seaworthy when she leaves for the port, but also when she sails from it, after the cargo has been taken on board.

(See Seville Sulphur and Copper Co., Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co., 1st Division. Lord Kinnear. M. March 20, 1888, 15 R. 616.)

By charter-party dated 2d September 1886, it was mutually agreed between Colvils, Lowden, & Co., owners of the s.s. "Ethelwolf," and J. R. Cunningham, merchant, Glasgow, inter alia, "that the said ship, classed 100 A1, and being tight, staunch, strong, well manned, victualled, equipped, and in every way seaworthy, and well fitted for the voyage, shall, with all possible speed, sail and proceed to Seville, Spain, and after being well and sufficiently ballasted with ore or lead if required, and not sand or mud, or anything which may be prejudicial to the cargo, the said master shall take and receive on board the said ship, from the agent of the said charterer, a cargo of fruit, say not less than 3000 H/chests oranges, or other lawful merchandise which the said charterer agrees to ship, not exceeding what she can safely stow and carry, over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture. . . . The cargo being thus loaded, the said owner engages that the said ship shall proceed therewith with all possible speed direct to one of the undernoted ports (as ordered on signing bills of lading), and there deliver the said cargo at the place and in the manner directed by the consignees, to whom the ship is to be addressed. . . . Penalty for non-performance of this agreement: estimated amount of freight (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, <sup>&c.</sup> errors or negligence of navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, during the said voyage, always excepted)."

In pursuance of this charter-party the "Ethelwolf" sailed from Swansea

No. 58. to Seville, and on 4th December 1886, Mr Cunningham's agent shipped at — Seville, on board the "Ethelwolf," 3200 boxes of Seville China oranges.
 Dec. 21, 1888. The bill of lading bore;—"Shipped in good order and well conditioned Cunningham by J. S. Macdougall, in and upon the good ship or vessel called the
 v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co. "Ethelwolf," whereof Cargill is master for the present voyage, and now lying in the harbour of Seville, and bound for Antwerp, 3200 boxes best Seville China oranges, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the fore-said port of Antwerp, act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever excepted, unto order or to assignees; freight for the said goods as per charter-party, with primage and average accustomed."

The "Ethelwolf" sailed on 5th December from Seville for Swansea and Antwerp, but was lost, with her cargo, on the coast of Spain near Vigo, on the 10th of that month.

In October 1887, Mr Cunningham raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Messrs Colvils, Lowden, & Co., concluding for damages to the extent of £1536, in respect of the loss of his goods on board the "Ethelwolf."

The pursuer averred in his record:—(Cond. 4) "When the 'Ethelwolf' sailed from Seville, as above stated, she was not in a condition fitted for the voyage, but was in an unseaworthy condition. In particular, her boilers and machinery were defective and out of order, the boilers leaking and the boiler-pumps out of order, and unable to supply the boiler properly with water. The feed-pump was leaking, and the water-gauge was defective and out of order. The bilges were full of dirt, and the bilge-pumps choked with dirt, so that they could not pump the water out of the bilges, and the air-pump valves were broken. She was further unseaworthy, in respect that, prior to leaving Seville, the boiler was filled with excessively muddy water. Such water is very injurious to boilers, and apt to derange the boiler connections, and to lead to injury to the furnace crowns. The sails were old and defective, and insufficient in number, and no spare sails were provided, and her bridge steering-gear was out of order and useless."

The defenders answered:—(Ans. 4) "Denied. Explained that the vessel was in all respects seaworthy when she left Seville. Her loss was due to perils of the sea, or to error and negligence in navigation, or to both of these causes combined."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having failed to deliver the goods in question in terms of their contract, and the pursuer having thereby sustained loss and damage to the amount sued for, decree ought to be granted as craved. (2) Said goods having been lost in consequence of the unseaworthiness of the "Ethelwolf" when she sailed on the voyage in question, decree should be granted as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (2) The loss of the "Ethelwolf" having been due to causes falling under the exceptions specified in said charter-party, the defenders ought to be assolized.

The case was appealed for jury trial, but on 16th November 1887, the Court of consent appointed the cause to be heard without a jury, and remitted to Lord Kinnear (Ordinary) to proceed with it.

Proof was led in the cause, from which, and from the evidence in the case of the Seville Sulphur and Copper Company, Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Company, above referred to* (which by joint minute was

* In that cause the pursuers, who were charterers of a cargo of ore, shipped admitted as evidence in this cause), the following facts appeared:—The “Ethelwolf” left Swansea on 20th November 1886 and arrived at Seville on 27th November. On 5th December (the bill of lading having been signed on the 4th) she sailed from Seville with a cargo of 3200 boxes of oranges to be delivered at Antwerp. Seville is situated about sixty miles from the sea on the Guadalquivir, a sluggish and muddy river. About thirty-six hours before the vessel sailed her boiler was filled, as was customary with steamers at that port, with water from the river, there being no hydrant or other means for supplying clear water. At the time when the boilers were filled it was high tide, the river being thus in its least muddy condition. The boiler and crowns of the furnaces had been cleaned after the arrival of the ship at Seville. On her way down the river, and when she was about ten miles from the sea, the vessel grounded on a mud or sand bank, and remained fast for about an hour or an hour and a-half. During that time she was going alternately ahead and astern with a view to getting off the bank. It was not disputed that some water was taken into the boiler at this point, and that that water was muddy. When the vessel reached the sea the engineer did not blow out the muddy water from the boiler, and refill it with salt water, as is often done when muddy water has been taken into the boiler of a steamer, and it was proved that that was a simple and effective method of getting rid of mud from boilers. The weather continued fine during the 6th and 7th, but on the 8th the wind rose, and a high sea was lifted. Early on the morning of the 8th the assistant engineer noticed that the gauge-glass was shewing muddy water, owing to the fact that “the rolling had turned up the mud.” He reported this to the engineer, who stated that he could then “have got the supplementary feed to work and put in sea water, and blown out the river water and the mud along with it. That, however, did not occur to me at the time. . . . I did not do so, because I did not know there was any mud in the boiler to the extent of being a source of danger.” On the afternoon of that day, at about 4.30, the crowns of the wing furnaces came down. There were three furnaces, the crown of the central furnace being lower than those of the two wing furnaces. On noticing this the engineer, to prevent an explosion, drew the fires. The wind was at this time on shore, and the captain seeing that the vessel was in danger of being blown ashore, ordered the engineer to relight the fires. This he did at about 6.30, after refilling the boiler with sea water. In consequence, however, of leakage in the boiler sufficient steam pressure could not be got up to keep the vessel off the shore, and she was wrecked on the coast of Spain, near Vigo, on the 10th. It was not disputed that the cause of the wreck was the failure of steam pressure. The evidence as to the way in which the failure was caused was conflicting, and is fully given in the opinion of Lord Adam. The Court was of opinion that it was proved that the cause was that the engineer had allowed the water to fall too low in the boiler, thus exposing some of the boiler tubes and the crowns of the wing furnaces, which were higher than that of the centre furnace. The result of this was that the cold water drawn from the sea came in contact with the heated metal of the wing furnace crowns and of the boiler tubes, which being of unequal thicknesses con-

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colville,
Lowden, & Co.

on board the “Ethelwolf,” under a charter-party and bill of lading the same, mutatis mutandis, as in the present case, sued the owners for the value of their ore lost with the ship. On 20th March 1888 the Second Division of the Court of Session, affirming the decision of the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), found in law,—“That the cause of the loss of the ore does not fall under any of the exceptions of the charter-party and bill of lading, and that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in payment of the value of the said goods.”

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

tracted unevenly and thus caused leakage. The engineer admitted that on the 8th December (the precise hour was not proved) he had shut off the main feed of the boiler, and consequently the supplementary feed, and that he had noticed prior to 4.30 P.M. a diminution in the steam pressure. During the whole of the day (8th) the gauge-glass had been shewing "false water," which misled the engineer as to the amount of water really in the boiler. This arose from the clogging of the gauge-valve with mud. About 4 P.M. he had ordered the fires to be cleaned "so as to try to get more steam." The evidence with regard to the pursuer's theory that the loss of pressure was due to the presence of mud in the boiler is fully given in the previous case (15 R. 616) against the owners of the vessel and in the opinions of their Lordships in the present case. Their theory, shortly stated, was that the mud in the boiler had settled down at the bottom of the boiler on the crowns of the furnaces so as to form a non-conducting crust which prevented the heat from the furnace reaching the water. The evidence led for the first time in this action was chiefly skilled evidence directed towards shewing the effect of mud in boilers, and of the water in boilers being allowed to run too low.

On 17th February 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) granted decree against the defenders for £1536, with interest, being the sum sued for.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action against a shipowner for damages for failure to deliver a cargo shipped at Seville on board the defenders' steamship 'Ethelwolf.' The contract is contained in a charter-party, by which it is stipulated that the penalty for non-performance shall be 'the estimated amount of freight, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, and fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind during the voyage always excepted'; and the only question is whether the defenders have proved that the loss of their vessel and their cargo was due to one or other of these excepted causes.

"The 'Ethelwolf' sailed from Seville on the 5th of December 1886. On the afternoon of the 8th, while she was off the coast of Spain, and in very rough weather, the crowns of the furnaces were found to be sinking, and the engineer considered it necessary to draw the fires in order to prevent an explosion of the boiler. But the ship could not make headway under sail; and, as the only means of keeping her off shore, the master ordered steam to be got up, while the boiler was not yet cool enough to allow of its being filled with cold water without injury. The boiler was filled accordingly by pumping water from the sea; and the natural effect of that operation was to cause serious leakage, so that it was found impossible to get up steam enough to work the engines. The ship drifted towards the shore, and ultimately went on the rocks, and was abandoned by the master and crew, and became a total loss.

"In these circumstances, there can be no question that the loss was caused by a peril of the sea, in the ordinary sense of these words; and it has been decided by the House of Lords in the case of the 'Xantho,' L. R., 12 Appl. Cases, 503, that the words must have the same meaning in a contract of affreightment as in any other maritime instrument. But that decision does not affect the general rule that a stipulation for exemption from enumerated risks will not relieve the shipowner of his obligation to provide a ship that shall be seaworthy, and in every way well fitted for the voyage which he engages that he shall perform. Nor does it alter the rule that if he fails to deliver the cargo the burden lies upon him to prove that his failure is attributable to a cause for which he is not responsible under his contract. The defenders therefore must prove that the failure of the boiler which occasioned the loss of the ship was attributable to causes arising subsequently to the departure of the ship from Seville. If it was attributable to the negligence during the voyage of persons in their employment, they will not be responsible, because they have expressly stipulated that they incur no liability for the consequences of such negligence. But if it is to be ascribed to anything in the condition of the boiler before the sailing of

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The questions to be determined No. 58.
were (1) was the ship seaworthy, and (2) was she lost through error or

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

the ship, the ship was not seaworthy, because, owing to the state of her boiler, she was not, to use the language of Lord Cairns in the case of Steel v. the State Line Steamship Company, 'in a condition to encounter whatever perils of the sea a ship of that kind, and laden in that way, might be fairly expected to encounter,' upon the voyage she was required to perform.

"The evidence as to the condition of the boiler before the departure from Seville is not altogether satisfactory. There is evidence that the tubes were leaking, and also that a dangerous crust or scale might have been deposited, which, if it existed when the ship came into harbour at Seville, was not removed before she sailed on the voyage in question. On the other hand, there is evidence that the leakage was not greater than might reasonably be expected, and not sufficient to affect the soundness of the boiler, and that the ship had not been long enough at sea since the last occasion when the boiler was scaled to allow of a fresh accumulation of salt water crust. But there was another source of danger on which the pursuer lays greater stress. The boiler was filled with muddy water from the Guadalquivir, and this is said to have been done so long before the departure of the ship that the mud had time to settle in the bottom of the boiler, so that it could not be got rid of by blowing off the muddy water at sea, as might have been done if the mud had still been held in suspension, and refilling the boiler with water from the sea. The evidence as to the time when the boiler was filled is not satisfactory ; but, according to the only witness who speaks to the time, it was done on Friday evening, and the ship did not sail till Sunday morning. If this evidence is correct, the mud was in the boiler for thirty-six hours before the ship sailed, and the defenders, upon whom the burden lies, are not in a position to dispute the accuracy of a statement which they might have disproved, if it is erroneous, by the evidence of their engineer. The theory is that the mud having settled, so that it could not be cleared out at sea, was afterwards set in motion by the rolling of the ship ; that it would naturally settle on the heated surface of the furnace crowns, and by preventing the transmission of heat, would ultimately cause the crowns to collapse. The defenders make three separate points in answer to this hypothesis—first, that if there was mud in the boiler, it must have been taken in during the voyage, because the ship took the ground in going down the river, a certain quantity of steam was lost in getting her off, and fresh water was taken in to supply the deficiency, while the propeller was working and necessarily stirring up the mud ; secondly, that the boiler should have been cleared of the muddy water when the ship got to sea, and if this were not done, any mischief arising from the presence of mud must be ascribed to negligence during the voyage ; and thirdly, that if the mud were set in motion, as the pursuer suggests, it would have settled on the crown of the centre furnace which is lower than the other, and not upon the side furnaces which alone collapsed. It does not appear to me that these answers are satisfactory. The opinion of the experts examined for the defenders as to the probability of mud being taken in while the ship was aground is not given with sufficient reference to the facts in evidence. The contrary opinion is that the mud stirred by the propeller must have been carried away from the pumps by the tide which was running up the river, and this does not appear to me to be effectually displaced by the evidence for the defenders. But further, the quantity of water taken in on this occasion was very small in proportion to the contents of the boiler, and if it had contained any considerable proportion of mud, this must probably have been detected at once by the presence of mud in the gauge-glass, whereas the gauge-glass was clear for the first two days, and only shewed mud on the morning of the 8th of December. The objection that the boiler might have been cleared at sea does not meet the pursuer's case, if it is otherwise well founded, because this operation could not have been performed if the mud had already had time to settle before the ship sailed. The third objection does not appear to me to be established, because while there is a conflict of skilled opinion on the subject, the evidence of the defenders' wit-

No. 58.
Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvile,
Lowden, & Co.

negligence of navigation, which were among the exceptions in the charter-party? The onus of proving unseaworthiness lay on the pursuer, there being a presumption of loss by perils of the sea.<sup>1</sup> The prima facie cause of the accident here was a peril of the sea, viz., the storm and high sea, and that being so, the pursuer must shew that that was really only the prima facie and not the real cause.<sup>2</sup> The presumption was for seaworthiness, and therefore anyone impugning it must prove his contention.<sup>3</sup> Expressions such as "perils of the sea," &c. must be read in the sense in which they would be read if they occurred in a policy of insurance.<sup>4</sup> There was no question here that the ship was in herself seaworthy when she left Seville. She had had a good passage out, and her boilers had been cleaned when there. The word "seaworthy" must be taken in its ordinary sense, viz., being fit to go to sea, and the words "error or negligence" covered cases of error or negligence in preparation for the voyage as well as faults when the ship was actually in motion.<sup>5</sup> Further, the voyage must be held under the charter-party to have begun at Swansea, nesses comes to no more than this, that, other things being equal, the mud would have a tendency to settle upon the centre furnace crown rather than upon the others. But whether in the particular case it would adhere to one rather than another, or bring down one sooner than another of the crowns to which it did adhere, might depend to a material extent upon the antecedent condition of the various furnace crowns, as to which there is no satisfactory evidence.

"But it is a more material consideration that the pursuer is not required to establish the cause to which the accident must be ascribed. He has suggested a probable cause. But it is not enough for the defenders to shew that the cause so suggested has not been sufficiently proved. The fact is that their boiler failed; and the inference is that when the ship sailed it was not in a fit condition for the voyage, unless they can prove by affirmative evidence that the failure is to be ascribed to some specific cause arising during the voyage. I think there is no evidence sufficient to displace the inference arising from the fact of the failure. The only cause suggested by the defenders is that the engineer, by an error of judgment, shut off the feed, and so allowed the water to evaporate without supplying the place of what was lost. The opinion of the experts examined for the defenders upon this point proceeds upon the assumption that the feed was entirely shut off for a period of four hours. But there is no evidence for this. The only evidence tending to prove it is that of the engineer, William Thomson. His evidence is not, in my opinion, satisfactory. But he does not say, and there is nothing else in the evidence to prove, that the feed was shut off for the time that is indispensable to support the defenders' theory.

"On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that they have not explained by any satisfactory evidence the failure of the boiler, which undoubtedly was the direct cause of the loss of the ship; and therefore that they have failed to prove that their ship was seaworthy when she sailed from Seville.

"I do not think it proved that she was unseaworthy in any other respect, except from the condition of her boiler. But in the view I have taken it is unnecessary to examine the evidence upon other points in detail."

<sup>1</sup> Boyson v. Wilson, 1816, 1 Starkie, 236.

<sup>2</sup> Moes, Moliere, & Tromp v. Leith and Amsterdam Shipping Co., July 5, 1867, 5 Macph. 988, 39 Scot. Jur. 546.

<sup>3</sup> Pickup v. Thames Insurance Co., 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. D. 594; Bell's Comm. (7th edit.) vol. i. pp. 597, 663, 664; Czeck v. Steam Navigation Co., 1867, L. R., 3 C. P. 14.

<sup>4</sup> "Xantho," 1887, L. R., 12 App. Cas. 503; Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co., Limited, v. Hamilton, Fraser, & Co., ibid. 484; Hamilton, Fraser, & Co. v. Pandorf & Co., ibid. 518.

<sup>5</sup> The "Warkworth," 1884, L. R., 9 Prob. Div. 145.

and anything done at Seville fell under the exceptions therein mentioned.<sup>1</sup> The charter-party, and not the bill of lading, ruled the contract. It was said that the fact that the ship had taken in muddy water at Seville rendered her unseaworthy before she started. It was, however, proved that it was customary for ships to take in the river water there (in fact they had no choice), and no evil results had, so far as the evidence shewed, occurred from that cause in other cases. Then it was proved that the ship went aground after she had started on her voyage, and when moving about on the mud-bank had taken in some quantity of muddy water. It was more likely, if the presence of mud in the boiler was really the cause of the accident, that it was the mud taken in on the voyage that caused the loss than that taken in at Seville. If so, the defenders were freed by the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading. But further, if there were mud present in dangerous quantities when the ship arrived at the sea, the engineer should have blown it off, as it was proved he could easily have done, and as he would have done if he had followed the ordinary course. That he did not do so was error and negligence on his part, and was therefore covered by the exception of "error or negligence of navigation."<sup>2</sup> The fault could easily have been rectified, which distinguished this case from that of Steel & Craig v. State Line Steamship Co.<sup>3</sup> where, through error in loading, a port-hole through which the sea was entering could not be reached, and consequently the plea of unseaworthiness was sustained. But on the merits it was maintained that the mud in the boiler could not have been the cause of the final breakdown of the steam pressure. That was the direct result of the wing furnace crowns coming down. Now, the wing furnace crowns were higher than the centre furnace crown, which did not come down, and if a layer of mud on the crowns was the cause, the layer would necessarily be thicker on the lower crown than on the two higher, and besides a layer of mud could not settle to any appreciable thickness on the crowns when the ship was rolling heavily and the action of boiling was going on in the water of the boiler. The true cause of the accident was that the water was allowed to run too low in the boiler, and when cold sea water was admitted after the fires had been drawn the inevitable consequence was leakage from the unequal expansion of the metal of the denuded tubes and furnace crowns. That the water was allowed to run so low was the result of an error on the part of the engineer in thinking that because the gauge-glass was full there was too much water in the boiler. If that was the real cause of the accident, it was covered by the exceptions, and the loss was not caused by unseaworthiness of the vessel, but by error or negligence.

Argued for the pursuer;—The onus in the first place lay on the ship-owner to account for the fact that a cargo was not delivered. When it was shewn or admitted that prima facie the loss was due to peril of the sea, that being an excepted cause, the onus was changed, but when it was further shewn that the efficient cause of the loss was not an excepted cause, the onus again shifted. That was the case here, and it therefore was the duty of the owners to prove seaworthiness, and not of the pursuer to prove unseaworthiness. The contract was constituted by the charter-

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colville,
Lowden, & Co.

<sup>1</sup> Scrutton on Charter-Parties, p. 67; Hudson v. Hill, 1874, 43 L. J., C. P. 573; Bruce v. Nicolopulo, 1855, 11 Hurl. & Gordon, Exch. Rep. 129; Nelson v. Dahl, 1879, L. R., 12 Chan. Div. 568.

<sup>2</sup> Good v. London Steamship Owners Mutual Protection Association, 1871, L. R., 6 C. P. 563; "Argo," 1887, L. R., 19 Q. B. D. 242.

<sup>3</sup> Steel & Craig v. State Line Steamship Co., July 20, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 103.

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

party and the bill of lading taken together, and the liability of the owners must be settled by a reference to their terms, seaworthiness being a condition precedent of the contract.<sup>1</sup> In the bill of lading the charter-party was referred to, and it contained the words "during the said voyage." The question therefore came to be, was the loss caused by anything which occurred "during the voyage," i.e., the voyage for which the parties were preparing when the bill of lading was entered into. The duty of the owners was to provide a seaworthy ship at the time she started.<sup>2</sup> That duty they failed to fulfil owing to the boilers being filled with muddy water at Seville thirty-six hours before the "Ethelwolf" started. The lapse of time between the filling of the boilers and the start must have necessarily allowed the mud to settle in the boiler on the furnace crowns. In all the cases cited by the defenders in which the exception of error or negligence had been given effect to, the effective cause of the loss had emerged during the voyage from port to port, and none of them touched the question whether mishaps at the port of loading could be held to have taken place "during the voyage." The amount of mud taken in when the vessel was on the bank must have been very small, as very little water at all was taken in there. There was evidence that when the ship left Seville, and up to the time when she began to roll heavily, the mud did not shew in the gauge-glass. It must have collected at the bottom of the boiler and on the crowns, and only have remixed with the water when the sea rose. If that was so, it would not have been possible (as, indeed, was said by several witnesses) for the engineer to have blown off the mud when he reached the sea; he could at most have only blown off a little round the small aperture of the blow-pipe. Then when the sea rose, and the mud mixed with the water, the gauge-glass got choked, and the engineer could not have told how much water or mud he was blowing off; at all events, it would have taken, as it was said in Steel & Craig's case,<sup>3</sup> "considerable trouble" to get rid of the cause of danger, if, indeed, it could have been got rid of at all by "blowing off" from the boiler, and therefore this case fell under the rule of that case, or rather (if it was impossible to blow off the mud) was a fortiori of it. With regard to the engineer's act in shutting off the feed from the boiler, he was not acting negligently, because the state of the gauge-glass (which shewed false water when he did so) would lead any engineer to do the same. It was the proper thing to do under the circumstances. A gauge-glass full to the top shewed that there was too much water in the boiler. With regard to the theory that if mud, settled on the wing furnace crowns, brought them down, it would have brought the centre furnace crown down first—the natural currents in the boiler would account for the wing furnace being coated first. Further, when the ship had been under weigh for some time, oil leaking from the condenser would have mixed with the mud in the boiler and made it so viscous that it would adhere much more readily to the surface of the furnace crowns, and would have rendered it more difficult to blow it off. Apart from that, if a ship had anything within her at the time she started on her voyage which required only moderately bad weather to become a source of danger, she was in the eye of the law unseaworthy.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cohn v. Davidson, 1877, L. R., 2 Q. B. D. 455; Kopitoff v. Wilson, 1876, L. R., 1 Q. B. D. 377; Smith v. Dart & Son, 1884, L. R., 14 Q. B. D. 105.

<sup>2</sup> Worms v. Storey, 1855, 11 Hurl. & Gordon's Exch. Rep. 427.

<sup>3</sup> 4 R. (H. L.) 103.

<sup>4</sup> Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 1884, L. R., 12 Q. B. D. 297.

At advising,—

No. 58.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by the charterer of the steamship "Eihelwolf" against the owners for payment of the sum of £1536 in respect of their failure to deliver a cargo of oranges shipped by the charterer on board the steamship at Seville.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

By charter-party, entered into between them of date 2d September 1886, it was agreed that the said ship being tight, staunch, strong, well manned, victualled, equipped, and in every way seaworthy, and well fitted for the voyage, should, with all possible speed, sail and proceed to Seville, Spain, and that the master should take and receive on board the said ship from the agent of the charterer a cargo of fruit, say not less than 3000 H/chests oranges.

It was further thereby agreed that the master should sign bills of lading at any freight required by charterer, but without prejudice to the charter-party.

The charter-party further contained a clause in these terms,—“Penalty for non-performance of this agreement: estimated amount of freight (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other danger and accidents of the seas, rivers, and errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind during the said voyage always excepted).”

The vessel left Swansea on the 20th November, and arrived at Seville on the 27th November 1886. She then shipped 3200 boxes of oranges, for which on 4th December the master signed a bill of lading, which bore that the said oranges were to be delivered at the port of Antwerp,—“Act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted.”

It will be observed that the bill of lading does not except “errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind during the voyage” as the charter-party does, but it was not disputed by the charterer that he was bound by the clause of exception as contained in the charter-party.

The vessel sailed from Seville on her voyage to Antwerp on the morning of the 5th December. Seville is on the River Guadalquivir, about sixty miles from the sea. Some time after leaving Seville the vessel grounded on a bank in the river, where she remained about an hour, more or less. On getting off she proceeded on her voyage, and got to sea on the same evening. The weather was fine during the 6th and 7th, and all went well, but on the 8th it began to blow hard with a very high sea. About 4.30 on the afternoon of that day the crowns of the wing furnaces of the boiler came down. When this occurred the engineer, to prevent an explosion, drew the fires. The captain, finding the ship was being blown on a lee shore, ordered the fires to be relighted. The engineer accordingly about 6.30 refilled the boiler with water from the sea and relighted the fires. The boiler however leaked to such an extent that sufficient steam pressure could not be maintained to prevent the vessel from being driven on shore, and she and her cargo were lost on the coast of Spain, near Vigo, on the afternoon of 10th December. There is no question that the vessel was wrecked in consequence of the failure of steam power, and that this failure is to be attributed to the coming down of the crowns of the furnaces, which accompanied the drawing of the fires.

The loss of the ship was undoubtedly caused “by the perils of the sea,” and falls within the risks excepted in the charter-party. But the charterer maintains that the ship was unseaworthy when she left Seville, and that this unseaworthi-

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

ness caused the loss of the ship. No doubt, if this be so, the owners will be liable. The owners, on the other hand, maintain that the ship was in every respect seaworthy, and that the injury to her boiler was caused by the error or negligence of the engineer, and that they are not liable in respect of the exception of "error or negligence of navigation" contained in the charter-party. These, therefore, are the questions for decision in this case, and the first is the question of fact, whether the vessel was seaworthy when she sailed from Seville and commenced her voyage.

The charterer sets forth in the 4th article of his condescendence several particulars in respect of which he alleges that the ship was unseaworthy, but the only one about which there is, I think, any room for serious controversy is thus expressed,—“She was further unseaworthy in respect that prior to leaving Seville the boiler was filled with excessively muddy water. Such water is very injurious to boilers, and apt to derange the boiler connections, and to lead to injury to the furnace crowns.”

The facts as to filling the boiler with water at Seville appear to be as follows.—The boiler had been blown down (that is, emptied of water) after the ship arrived at Seville for the purpose of making some repairs. These having been finished, the crowns of the furnaces were cleaned and the boiler washed out. Then about 10 o'clock on the night of Friday the 3d December, or about thirty-six hours before the vessel sailed, the boiler was filled with water from the river. This time was chosen because it was then high-tide, when the water of the river would probably be freest of mud.

The question is, whether the taking in of this water rendered the ship unseaworthy. There is no doubt, I think, that the presence of mud in the boiler of a steamer, in large quantity, may be an element of danger. But I think it is proved that when water is taken in from a muddy river, such as the Guadalquivir, it may be objectionable as tending to produce priming, and to clog the valves and their connections, but that it is not a source of danger to the boiler by forming a deposit on the furnace crowns or otherwise.

It is proved that there are no hydrants, or other facilities, at Seville by which steamers which have blown down their boilers can refill them except with water from the river. It is proved that it is the regular practice of such steamers to do so, and that no injury has resulted to them from doing so. There is no contradictory evidence as to this. It is also proved that it is the practice of steamers to do so in rivers of a like character to the Guadalquivir, such as the Seine and Garonne. If this be so, it would be difficult to hold that all such steamers are thereby rendered unseaworthy.

But it is said that in this case the muddy water was taken in so long before the vessel sailed, about thirty-six hours, that the earthy matter in suspension would be precipitated, and so cause danger to the boiler. There is, however, no evidence that it was anything out of the usual course to fill the boiler so long before sailing, or that the earthy matter would not have been as completely precipitated in six as in thirty-six hours. There are no questions asked on the subject. It does not appear to have occurred to the pursuer, when the witnesses were being examined, that there was anything objectionable in the matter. I do not myself see that the mud constituted a greater element of danger, lying at the bottom of the boiler, than when in suspension in the water, and in fact the pursuer's case is, that the mud was stirred up from the bottom by the rolling of the ship, and in this way, and not till then, became a source of danger.

But the defenders have another answer on this part of the case. They say that if the presence of the mud in the boiler constituted such an element of danger as to produce unseaworthiness if not removed, yet it could and ought to have been removed as soon as the vessel got to sea by blowing it out of the boiler and taking in sea water. This, they say, is a method quite simple, and known to every engineer, and that if the vessel was lost by reason of the presence of the mud she was not lost because of unseaworthiness, but because of the error or negligence of the engineer in not blowing it out of the boiler. In my opinion the defenders are right in this contention, and it is supported by the principles laid down in the House of Lords in the case of Steel & Craig, 4 R. (H. L.) 103. In that case, where a ship sailed with an open or insufficiently secured port-hole, by which the water entered and damaged the cargo, it was suggested that whether the ship was or was not seaworthy depended on the position of the port-hole; if it was easily accessible, and could be easily closed, the ship would be seaworthy; but if it was not so accessible, but would cost much time and trouble to get access to it in order to put it right, the ship might be unseaworthy. So here, if the steamer was not in any danger from the mud in the boiler so long as she was in the Guadalquivir river,—and it is not suggested that she was,—and if the mud could have been easily removed on reaching the sea, then I think she was in a seaworthy condition, and perfectly fit for her voyage when she left Seville, and the danger, if any, from the state of the water arose from the engineer's not having removed it.

Now, I think it is proved that the muddy water in the boiler could have been easily removed. One of the witnesses, Mackenzie, thus describes the operation,—"It could easily," he says, "have been cleared out afterwards, when the vessel got out to sea—that could have been done by blowing or scumming the boiler. The bottom blow-off cock could have been turned on, and the water taken in from the sea alternately until the water in the boiler was found to be perfectly clear. That is the proper method, and is well known to engineers." Six or seven of the defenders' witnesses speak of this as being a common and simple method of getting rid of mud in boilers.

But the pursuer has examined three witnesses—Messrs Neish, Donaldson, and Darling—who say that it would not have been practicable in this case, because the mud had had time to settle in the bottom of the boiler. Neish says, "that if the mud in the water had thirty-six hours to settle before steam had been got up, I don't think you could blow it off after steam had been got up. The mud would settle down in the bottom of the boiler, and get comparatively hard with the cold water, and get quite quiescent. There would be no inducement for it to be blown off, except just round about the orifice of the blow-off cock," and Messrs Donaldson and Darling agree with him.

Mr Neish, however, says, at another part of his evidence, that the particles forming the mud would be in the condition of loose soft sludge, and if this was its condition, I do not see why it should not be easily blown off. I do not think it is proved that the mud would get into any such hardened condition as here described. The evidence shews that the mud was in such a condition that, when the ship began to roll, it mixed with the water, which had theretofore been clear. Roger, the assistant engineer, is asked,—“Did anything unusual occur during your watch? (A.) Yes, the water in the gauge-glass got very muddy about three in the morning” (that was of the 8th). “(Q.) What was wrong? (A.) The wind had got abeam, and the rolling had turned up the mud. When I saw the

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.

Cunningham

v. Colvile,

Lowden, &amp; Co.

No. 58. mud I blew the gauge-glass down." He then says he did this several times, and reported it to the engineer at six o'clock, when he was relieved from his watch. He came back at eight, when he noticed that the water in the gauge-glass was very muddy, and he says that he kept blowing it down.

Dec. 21, 1898.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

The pursuer's witness Donaldson is asked,—“If an engineer could not get better water than muddy water, and had then to take it out, his duty would be to blow down the boiler, and thereby blow out the muddy water when he got to sea? (A.) Yes, I should think it would be his duty to do so. I think he could not get the whole out in that way which had settled as a deposit. (Q.) But if the vessel began to roll, so as to mix the mud with the water, he could blow it off then? (A.) Yes, he could get rid of it then, when mixed with the water. I think that if mud was moving about in the boiler in such a way that it could reach the furnace crowns, or shew itself in the gauge-glass, it could have been blown off. (Q.) Is it not a perfectly familiar operation to engineers of ordinary skill to blow muddy water out? (A.) Yes.”

It appears to me therefore to be proved that there could have been no difficulty in this case in blowing out the mud, either when the ship first reached the sea, or, at anyrate, later, when it was moving about in the boiler.

The two engineers of the ship, who ought to have known best, are of that opinion. Roger says so, and Thomson, the engineer, says,—“I could have got the supplementary feed to work and put in sea water, and blown out the river water and the mud along with it. That, however, did not occur to me at the time”; and he says,—“We could have blown off the mud after we started if we had tried. I did not do so because I did not know there was any mud in the boiler to the extent of being a source of danger.”

On this part of the case therefore I am of opinion that the ship was seaworthy when she sailed on her voyage from Seville.

The defenders maintained further, that if the ship was unseaworthy because of mud in the boiler, it was not the muddy water taken at Seville that rendered her so, but mud taken in when she was aground on the bank in the river, in which case they say the vessel was lost from dangers of navigation during the voyage.

It is not necessary in the view I have taken of the case to consider that matter at length, but my opinion is that the quantity then taken in can have made no appreciable difference on the amount of mud already in the boiler due to the water taken in at Seville, and can have made no difference in the result.

It is also right to state that it was maintained by the owners that on a sound construction of the charter-party and bill of lading the voyage must be held to have commenced at Swansea, and not at Seville; that consequently, if the taking in of the muddy water at Seville rendered the vessel unseaworthy, that was caused by error or negligence of navigation during the voyage, for which under the charter-party they are not liable. In the view, however, which I take of the facts, it is not necessary to determine that question either.

The next question to be considered is the cause of the collapse or falling down of the furnace crowns. The falling down of the furnace crowns was undoubtedly caused by the over-heating of the metal, and this again is attributable to one or other of two causes, either to the deposit thereon of a non-conducting crust, which prevents the transmission of heat from the metal to the water in the boiler, or to the water in the boiler having been allowed to fall below the level of the crowns.

The facts bearing on this part of the case appear to be as follows:—Nothing went wrong with the engines or boilers until about 11.30 on the morning of the 8th, when the gauge-glass instantly filled with water. This, no doubt, was caused by the gauge-valves, or their connections, becoming clogged with mud. About 4.30 the crown of the port furnace collapsed, and a few minutes afterwards that of the starboard furnace. Thereupon the engineer drew the fires and reported the fact to the captain. The captain, however, finding that he was drifting on a lee shore, shortly afterwards ordered steam to be got up again. The boiler was refilled from the sea, and the fires relighted about 6.30. In consequence, however, of the cold water coming in contact with the still heated metal of the boiler, such an amount of leakage took place that steam of a sufficient pressure in the boiler could not be got up to enable the vessel to make headway enough to keep her off the land, and hence the catastrophe.

I think the collapse of the crowns of the furnaces was caused by the water in the boiler having been allowed to fall below the level of their crowns. The engineer is of that opinion now, and he was of that opinion at the time. This is clear from Captain Cargill's evidence. He says—"I remember about 4.30 in the afternoon of the 8th having a conversation with the engineer. He told me that he would have to withdraw the fires. (Q.) What reason did he give? (A.) That the water had got so low in the boiler that he could not keep up the steam." And further down he is asked—"Did you remonstrate or say anything to him? (A.) Yes, I said the ship is in a very dangerous position to do that. Could he not keep steam on till I got the ship perhaps eight or ten miles from the land? (Q.) Did he draw the fires? (A.) He came back and said that he must draw them, there was nothing else for it. The ship might be blown up. He did draw them." In cross-examination he is asked—"You have told us that the engineer reported to you that he had to draw the fires because the water was so short? (A.) That is so. I am sure that that is the report he made to me."

Then the fact that the crowns of the two wing furnaces, which were higher than that of the centre furnace, and consequently would be first denuded of water, came down, while the centre one remained intact, indicates that the reason was want of water. Again, the boiler was refilled with water from the sea before the fires were relighted. But this would not have been necessary, and would not have been done, had the boiler been fed with water in the usual way, as in that case the boiler would have been full. Then, again, the result which followed from filling with cold water the still heated boiler was exactly what was to be anticipated. The cold water coming in contact with the heated metal of the plates and tubes of the boiler, which were of different thicknesses, was certain to cause unequal contraction of the metal and consequent leakage. The result was, that whereas the normal working pressure before the fires were drawn was from sixty to seventy pounds, a greater pressure than from twenty-five to thirty could not be afterwards obtained.

Nor is there any difficulty in accounting for the water having been allowed to fall so low in the boiler. The engineer is asked—"Did you ever shut off the main feed?" The answer is—"Sometimes I have done it. (Q.) Did you do it on 8th December? (A.) I believe I did, but I do not remember. I thought there was too much water in the boiler from the indication of the steam packing and the engine priming. I cut off the main feed in that way, believing that that was the right thing to do." It will be observed that by shutting off the main feed he shut off all water from the boiler, as it had also

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888,
Cunningham
& Co.,
Lowden, & Co.

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colville,
Lowden, & Co.

the effect of shutting off the supplementary feed. He is not asked if he turned the main feed on again. But I do not doubt that he would have said so if he had, because he could not fail to know that if he did not do so, the whole blame of the loss of the ship must rest on his shoulders. That he should have neglected to turn the feed on again is perhaps to be explained by his attention having been taken up by his endeavours to rectify the gauge-glass. But however that may be, if he turned off the main feed at the time that he says that he did, and did not turn it on again, then it is proved that the crowns of the furnace collapsed about the time they might have been expected to do so.

There is one circumstance which is said to be proved, and is strongly insisted on by the pursuer as shewing that the collapse of the furnace crowns could not have been caused by want of water: it is, that as the tubes of the boiler became successively denuded of water by its evaporation, the heat would cause them to leak, and permit the escape of steam, eventually producing so large a leakage of steam, and a corresponding diminution of pressure of steam in the boiler, that the engineer could not have failed to notice it. It is said to be proved that there was no such leakage or decrease of pressure of steam noticed, and that therefore the tubes could not have been denuded of water. As it was steam leakage that would result, the steam would escape by the smoke-jack, and it would appear that its escape might not have been noticed by the engineer.

But I do not think that it is proved that no diminution of pressure was noticed before the fires were drawn. The evidence on the point is certainly not satisfactory, because apparently the parties had not realised the importance of it when the witnesses were being examined. Rogers, the assistant-engineer, no doubt says that they were able to keep up the normal pressure till the fires were drawn. But the engineer, who was the proper person to speak as to this, is not specially examined on the subject. It may be gathered, however, from his evidence that he had noticed a diminution of pressure of steam. Thus he says, "I formed the idea that the boiler was getting short of steam, and that there was too much water in it." And a little lower down he says—"At four o'clock in the afternoon" (that is, about half-an-hour before the crowns collapsed) "I gave orders to have the fires cleaned so as to try to get more steam."

We have also the evidence of Captain Cargill, who says that when the engineer informed him it would be necessary to draw the fires he told him that the water had got so low in the boiler "that he could not keep up the steam"; and again, that he said "the water had got so low in the boiler that he would be obliged to draw the fires; he could not get steam." I think, therefore, that it is sufficiently proved that there was a deficiency of steam in the boiler before the fires were drawn. The proof is not so satisfactory as it might have been, but the fault lies with the pursuer, who ought to have cleared up the matter if he meant to make a point of it.

I do not think it necessary to say much as to the rival theory of the pursuer, that the falling of the crowns was caused by the deposit of mud thereon. It appears to me to be based on assumptions of fact which are not proved, and do not exist in this case. As to the deposit of mud from muddy water in the boiler, I think the evidence shows that mud per se will not form a dangerous deposit on the furnace crowns of a boiler. Mr Neish, the pursuer's leading witness, says that "mud by its nature will not form a deposit or crust on the furnace crowns so as to injure them when the boiler is under steam."

It appears, however, that mud may possibly do so when it is mixed with oil or grease, and accordingly the pursuer assumes, for the purposes of his theory, an admixture of oil and mud in this case. But there is no proof, and nothing to lead to the inference, that there was any such admixture in the boiler. I think, therefore, that there is no foundation for the pursuer's theory. But even assuming that there might have been such a dangerous admixture of oil and mud in the boiler as the pursuer assumes, I think the facts shew that it had formed no dangerous deposit on the crowns of the furnaces. If such a deposit had been formed, one would have expected it to have been first formed on the crown of the centre or lowest furnace, and that it would have come down first. In the next place, the boiler would have been in its usual condition as to water, and would not have required to have been filled with water from the sea, as the engineers say they filled it. Neither would there be anything to account for the great leakage which took place after the fires were relit, as there would have been no cold water to come in contact with the heated metal, and nothing to cause increased leakage; and finally, if a deposit on the crowns of the furnaces had been the cause of their collapse, it is difficult to see why, after the fires were relit, the crown of the centre furnace should not have collapsed, and the crowns of the wing furnaces come still further down, seeing that the origo mali, the deposit, was presumably still upon them.

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colville,
Lowden, & Co.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the collapse of the crowns of the furnaces, and consequent deficiency of steam pressure and loss of the vessel, is clearly traceable to want of water in the boiler, and that this deficiency of water was caused by the negligence of the engineer in failing to turn on the main feed after he had turned it off; that consequently the loss of the vessel was caused by error or negligence of navigation during the voyage; that therefore the failure to deliver the cargo is covered by the exception to that effect in the charter-party, and that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

We were referred to the case of the Seville Sulphur and Copper Company against the present defenders (15 R. 616), which was an action brought against them for the delivery of 350 tons of sulphur ore, which formed part of the cargo of the "Ethelwolf," and was lost with the vessel, and in which the Second Division arrived at a different conclusion from that at which I have arrived, but it is enough to say that the evidence we have had to consider is materially different from the evidence in that case.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Adam on all the important points raised in this case, and I concur in the views that he has expressed as to the import of the evidence. I find it therefore unnecessary to go into any detail on any of these points. The way the case has presented itself to my mind is shortly this—The cause of the wreck was plainly the failure of the boiler to answer the purposes of the boiler of a steam-vessel, and the boiler, I think, failed, according to the evidence, from one or other of two causes—either from the effects of the mud in the water, which was said to have been improperly taken in and which, mixed with certain substances, settled down on the crowns of the furnace, and thereby produced a state of matters which led to the collapse of the furnace crowns; or secondly, if that was not the cause of the accident, from the fact that the boiler failed through the engineer shutting off the feed, so causing so great a decrease of water in the boiler as to produce a state of matters which would lead in the ordinary course to the collapse of the furnace crowns. From one or other of these causes the ship was wrecked, there

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

being a want of power to enable the engine to do what was required of it in the weather which prevailed at the time. Now, it appears to me upon the evidence that to whichever of these causes we attribute the accident, it was negligence in the navigation of the vessel which led to this collapse. It was the duty of the commander of the vessel, knowing that there had been muddy water taken in at Seville, to get quit of that muddy water when they went down the river, and it is clear on the evidence that in a well-managed vessel leaving Seville in these circumstances that course would have been taken.

The other cause of the accident—the shutting off of the feed—as has been explained by Lord Adam, was due to a mistake of the engineer in regard to the working of the boiler at the time when he examined it. He took the wrong course, and therefore there was negligence in that respect. Now, to whichever of these causes we are to attribute the accident, there was negligence on the part of the crew leading to the loss of the vessel, and that negligence is covered by the words of the charter-party. On the question of the seaworthiness of the vessel on leaving Seville, I am quite unable to see that the fact of her taking in muddy water at Seville was of itself sufficient to render the vessel unseaworthy, because even assuming it to be proved that the water taken in from the river was extra muddy (I am not quite sure that that is proved, but even assuming it to be proved) I think it is plain on the evidence that any engineer who chooses to attend to his ship can take means to get that muddy water cleared out of the boiler before he gets to sea on the way down the river. No doubt there is contradictory evidence on that point, but the evidence led by the defender on that part of the case is to my mind conclusive that that muddy water would not have operated injuriously if there had been a proper exercise of discretion on the part of the engineer on his way down the river. Therefore I think the vessel was not unseaworthy when she left Seville.

LORD SHAND.—I had an opportunity of considering the opinion which my brother Lord Adam has delivered, and I entirely concur in that opinion, both in the substance of it and in the careful and detailed examination of the evidence which his Lordship has made, subject to one observation, and only one, namely, that I attach more importance than he has done to the stranding of the steamer on the bank in the river shortly after she left Seville. I do not mean to go into the evidence, but taking it as a whole I think it is proved that there was on that occasion a considerable amount of mud drawn in from the river during the struggle that was made to get off the bank. The evidence shews, I think, that the steamer was on the bank for a material time, and there was a good deal of stirring up of the mud in the attempt to get off the bank, and accordingly I think that there was then a considerable addition made to any mud that was previously in the boiler. If so, and if the loss of the vessel can be attributed to the presence of mud in the boiler, of course the defence of perils of the sea would cover the loss, if caused by the presence of mud taken in after the vessel had left Seville, and in this view it is important to observe that there is a mass of evidence that vessels did frequently take in the ordinary muddy water of the Guadalquivir at Seville without supervening mischief of any kind.

Then, generally, in regard to the case, the pursuer's claim is made upon the footing that the cargo and the ship were lost because the taking in of the muddy water, producing unseaworthiness, really caused the accident, by having been the direct cause of the falling down of the crowns of the boiler, and consequent failure of the motive power. Now, the Court must be satisfied upon this point, not only that the vessel was unseaworthy, but that the unseaworthiness caused the loss of the cargo. The case is not one like that of insurance where it is quite sufficient, in order to void a policy, to prove that there was unseaworthiness, even though the unseaworthiness was not proved to be the cause of the loss. In the case of insurance, it is a condition precedent that the vessel shall be seaworthy, and if that condition be not fulfilled the contract of insurance cannot be enforced. In this case, however, there must not only be unseaworthiness, but it must appear on the evidence that the unseaworthiness caused the loss.

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvill,
Lowden, & Co.

We had a good deal of discussion upon the question of onus in the case, and I desire to say a few words upon that point. It appears to me in the first place, that the shipowners having been entrusted with the carriage of the goods, and being unable to deliver them, have an onus upon them to shew that they are to be relieved of the obligation to deliver, and I think that onus is discharged primarily by shewing that the vessel was driven on to a lee shore and wrecked. In proving that, however, it came out in the evidence that the cause of the vessel being so wrecked and driven on shore was the failure of motive power. The pursuer maintains that it is clear that the onus is thereby thrown upon the defenders in the action to account for this, and that it is to be presumed that the failure of the motive power arose from the unseaworthiness in respect of the boiler being defective, or in a condition dangerous to the ship when she left Sevilla. The defenders say no; that there is a clause in the charter-party saving them from the effects of the negligence of those who were working the ship, and that this was just as likely to happen from the negligence of those working the machinery as from the alleged defective state of the machinery itself three or four days before, when she left Sevilla, and before she encountered the severe weather that she did. Upon that matter it appears to me that there is no presumption of law arising in the circumstances one way or the other which can be referred to as determining the question of onus. It is purely a question of presumption of fact one way or the other, and that is for the Judge or jury dealing with the circumstances of each case. The case of Cohn v. Davidson (L. R., 2 Q. B. D. 455), referred to in the course of the discussion, was one in which, I think, the presumption of fact was absolutely clear. A vessel or lighter drawn into the harbour, in all respects apparently seaworthy, took in her cargo, and everything appeared right when she left the pier, but within two hours of her getting to sea a very heavy leakage occurred, and that leakage went on and became so bad that the vessel ultimately sank. The only inference, that could be drawn from the circumstances there, was that the vessel had received damage while the cargo was being put on board, and that a hole had been driven in her bottom, and consequently it was there held that she was unseaworthy at the time of sailing. That was simply, however, because of the special circumstances that occurred. In this case it is perhaps difficult to determine exactly how the presumption stands after the vessel had been three or four days out, and her machinery had gone wrong. If one could conceive a case in which there was no evidence to be got on the subject, and no light to be had on the matter at all, I rather think the pursuer would be right that one would rather infer unseaworthiness at starting than negligence causing the accident. But we have no

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colville,
Lowden, & Co.

case presenting these features, for here we have a body of evidence with two conflicting theories, and I am quite clear that the Court must on that evidence simply come to a conclusion on these theories, and say which of them is right. We have a great deal of evidence on both sides, and I do not consider the question of onus to be of the slightest consequence. We have simply the two theories, and the evidence in support of these is not so nicely balanced that you cannot say which of the two alleged causes of the failure of the vessel's motive power is the more probable. On the contrary, there is evidence which, I think, enables the Court to come to a conclusion as to the true cause.

Now, so taking the case on this question of onus, which I think is simply a question as to the presumption arising from fact, I entirely agree in the view which Lord Adam has expressed as to the true cause of this accident. Even supposing it had been proved that the vessel had taken in so much mud with the muddy water that was taken in at Seville, as might possibly cause danger to the boiler (which, however, is not proved in my opinion), yet I am of opinion with his Lordship that the pursuer has failed to make out that that was really the cause of the accident. It appears to me that the theory on which the pursuer proceeds is ingenious, but much too speculative, and having fully considered the proof on the subject, that theory, which seems to me to proceed on too many assumptions of fact, does not recommend itself to my mind. I do not think that there are facts proved in the evidence on which that theory can be satisfactorily established, and I think there are facts proved which conflict with it. When the vessel left Seville, according to Neish and other witnesses, who took the view that mud had ultimately settled down on the crowns of the boiler and caused them to collapse, everyone seems to be agreed that the muddy water having been thirty-six hours in the boiler, the mud must have fallen as a deposit—I shall not call it a cake, because it was a loose deposit—on the bottom of the boiler. There is no suggestion that there was anything on the furnace crowns then. Now, what is necessary in order to make out Mr Neish's theory? In the first place, the mud which was at the bottom has to be stirred up, and I agree with the witnesses in thinking that it necessarily must have been stirred up. The putting on of fires and the heating of the boiler would immediately cause a certain amount of boiling, and therefore stirring up of the mud, and as she went to sea the motion of the vessel would increase that, and after the third day, when the wind and the sea began to rise, it would be increased more and more. In that state of matters it appears to me that the mud which was at the bottom must have gone all through the boiler. But to make out the pursuer's theory it is required to bring that mud down and deposit it on the two upper furnace crowns which first gave way, and to deposit it there so that it became a cake adhering to the metal, with the result that the fire was no longer able to act on the water around the two upper furnace crowns. That is the theory I think. It appears to me that if there was a settling of mud there—I doubt whether there was opportunity from the motion of the vessel for the settling of the mud at all—it would go to the bottom of the boiler again, and that at least the lowest furnace-crown would be the one most readily covered, and would be the first to shew symptoms of weakness and to come down, whereas it was the two upper ones that came down. And besides, to carry out the theory you require to prove (1) a certain admixture of oil so as to make the mud adhesive, while all the time the presence of the oil requisite is not proved, and (2) the existence of a current or currents in the boiler of this peculiar nature that they would carry the mud over the low under crown and land it on the top of the two higher side crowns. Looking at all the evidence on the subject, I can only say that this theory does not commend itself to my mind. I think the accident was much more likely to have occurred, and I believe it did occur, according to the evidence, because Thomson, the engineer, to some extent lost his head in the difficulty in which he was placed. When he went to the glass which indicated the presence of mud in the boiler, and the water very high up, and at a time when he says he thought there was priming also, the first thing he would naturally do was to shut off the feeds. The result of this would of course be to let the water get gradually low, and I think the real evidence in the case tends to shew that this was what happened. The first account accordingly which Thomson gave to the captain, when the occurrence was looking serious, was that the boiler was short of water. If the true view of the evidence be that the engineer cut off the water and omitted in proper time to turn it on again, as I think he is brought to confess, that accounts entirely for what happened. The water fell in the boiler, the two upper furnace crowns became exposed to great heat, there was no water to cover them, the action of the fire at once told, and the necessary result was that the two furnace crowns came down. Then there are the other points into which Lord Adam went fully on the evidence. I could not give a better résumé of the evidence on that point than he has done. And so I am of opinion that at the outset of the case there is a failure on the pursuer's part to prove that the cause of the accident was unseaworthiness of the vessel.

But, even if that were the cause, I am still of opinion that the pursuer cannot succeed, because I do not think it has been proved that the vessel was unseaworthy. The case of Steel & Craig v. The State Line Shipping Company shews that if a vessel goes to sea with some defect which, though it would be a cause of danger if left unremedied, may yet be easily cured, as by shutting a port-hole, or by any operation that will obviate the danger before it arises, even when the vessel is at sea, that cannot be regarded as unseaworthiness. The owners of the vessel stipulated that any error of navigation during the voyage should relieve them from responsibility. Now, I think the evidence in this case brings out a point which was not before the other Division of the Court in the former case, namely, that if there is such a quantity of mud in the water in the boiler as to lead to any apprehension of danger, the engineer has it in his power at once to cure that by blowing off the muddy water and taking in a supply of sea water. I am not prepared to say that when the vessel left Seville there was sufficient mud to cause danger, but if there was a dangerous quantity of mud so taken in everyone is agreed that the engineer had nothing to do but blow it off. The mud must be shaken up before it could produce the accident,—that is part of the pursuer's case,—and as soon as it was shaken up in the water, then was the time to blow it off. It is said by the pursuer's witnesses that the mud was all lying at the bottom, and that by blowing it off only the part of the mud at and around the orifice by which the water was driven out would be removed, but the theory of the pursuer's case is that it would be all shaken up before being deposited again on the crowns. There were two days of fine weather, and on the third day there was a heavy sea, so there was ample opportunity to have the muddy water blown off, and to take in sea water, and Thomson says if it had occurred to him he would have taken that course. Therefore I am of opinion that in his view it was not from unseaworthiness, but from an omission on the part of the engineer that the loss occurred. Taking it in either way, my opinion is that

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colvils,
Lowden, & Co.

the loss was caused either by Thomson having cut off the water and omitted to turn on the feed again, or that it was caused by his failure to blow off the muddy water. In either case the loss was caused by the negligence of one of the servants of the defenders, and on these grounds I concur in the opinion of Lord Adam.

The defenders maintained another point in argument, viz., that they were not bound under the special terms of the charter-party to have a seaworthy ship starting from Seville, but the best consideration I have been able to give to that question leads me to the opinion that this argument is unsound. It is quite true that the vessel began her voyage at Swansea, and the provision of the charter-party undoubtedly is, that the vessel being then staunch and strong and seaworthy, and fitted for the voyage, should sail for Seville, and there take on board her cargo, and then the exceptions of perils of the sea and errors in navigation occur, relating to the voyage as a whole. I do not doubt in the least that if the vessel, being seaworthy when she left Swansea, had been lost or delayed on her way to Seville by a cause within the clause of exceptions no claim of damage could have been made against the owners of the vessel for non-arrival or non-arrival in time. The exceptions would apply to any part of the voyage contemplated. But, on the other hand, I am of opinion that though we have here a voyage in one sense out and home, we have also a cargo voyage. The charterers required to have a vessel out into which they could load their cargo, and it appears to me—and there is pretty clear authority for saying—that in every case where there is a provision for taking cargo on board, even on such a charter-party as we have here, it is an implied term of that contract that the ship at the time she leaves with her cargo shall be seaworthy. There are two leading cases on that point which were referred to, one of them in 1876 and the other in 1877, in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of England. The first of these was the case of Kopitoff (L. R., 1 Q. B. D. 377), where a bill of lading having been granted for goods, the Court held, although there was no stipulation on the subject, that if a person undertakes carriage of goods on board his ship there is implied in the contract that he shall present a seaworthy ship to carry the cargo. The other was the case of Cohn (2 Q. B. D. Rep. 455), and there the case of Kopitoff came up again for consideration, but with this difference, that in the case of Cohn, which I have already referred to on another point, there was a charter-party which provided that the vessel should leave a certain place where she was, go into harbour, take on board her cargo, and then sail with it. It seemed to be proved that the vessel was perfectly sound when she left the place at which she had been lying when the charter-party was entered into, that she was perfectly seaworthy when she presented herself to take on board the cargo, but an accident occurred through her grazing on the harbour bottom before she left the harbour, and it was maintained that if the vessel was seaworthy when the charter was signed, and when she started to sail from the harbour, the owner was not bound to have her seaworthy when she started with her cargo on board; but the Court in that case laid down the same principle as in the case of the bill of lading, viz., that when the charterer came to put the cargo on board the vessel, then is the time when it is important for him that the ship shall be seaworthy, and unless that undertaking is positively excluded it must be held to be implied in the contract. I do not propose to read the opinions, but the judgment came very clearly to this, that as in a bill of lading, so in every charter-party, there is an implied undertaking that the vessel at the time of sailing with her cargo shall be seaworthy. That is very well explained in the unanimous opinion of the Court, that to hold otherwise might defeat the power that a shipper of goods has to make his insurance effectual. He cannot insure his goods except on the footing of having an implied warranty of seaworthiness, and so the law holds in the contract of carriage that seaworthiness is plainly implied as an obligation on the shipowner. I am therefore of opinion that that plea maintained on the part of the defenders would not have availed them. But on the facts of the case otherwise, as I have stated, I am of opinion that the defenders ought to succeed, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur entirely in the opinion of Lord Adam, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, sustained the defences, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 58.

Dec. 21, 1888.
Cunningham
v. Colville,
Lowden, & Co.

JAMES BRAND, Petitioner.—D.-F. Mackintosh—R. V. Campbell—W. Campbell.

MRS F. W. SHAW AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Sir Charles Pearson—Maconochie.

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Tutor—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 27).—A mother cannot appoint a tutor to her bastard child.

Held that the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, does not apply to bastards, and that therefore a mother cannot nominate a guardian to her bastard child under the provisions of that Act.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Custody—Wish of deceased parent—Nobile officium.—The mother of a bastard gave up the custody of the child, aged one year, to Mrs S., a member of the Scottish Episcopal Church, who maintained the child until the death of the mother, about 4½ years thereafter. A few weeks before her death, the mother, who had meanwhile become a Roman Catholic, and was living in a Roman Catholic Convent, executed a settlement, in which she nominated J. B., a Roman Catholic, to be tutor and guardian to her child, and said, "being a Roman Catholic myself, it is my desire that my said son be brought up in that faith." On the day on which she executed the settlement she raised an action against Mrs S. for delivery of the child, but died during the dependence of the action, which was accordingly dismissed. In a petition at the instance of J. B. against Mrs S. for delivery of the child, held that as it was not disputed that the child would be equally well cared for and educated, whether it was in the custody of the petitioner or of Mrs S., the expressed wishes of the mother should be given effect to. The Court therefore granted the prayer of the petition.

(VIDE Brand v. Shaws, Feb. 24, 1888, 15 R. 449.)

Ann Hammel, on 3d April 1882, gave birth to an illegitimate child, John Ingram Hammel. Ann Hammel died of consumption in October 1886, while an inmate of the Convent of the Good Shepherd, Dalbeth, near Glasgow, leaving the following settlement, dated 31st August 1886,—"I, Ann Hammel, residing at the Convent of the Good Shepherd, Dalbeth, near Glasgow, do hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to James Brand, contractor, Glasgow, in trust for behoof of my son, John Ingram Hammel, and I hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint the said James Brand to be my sole executor, and to be tutor, curator, and guardian to my said son; and, being a Roman Catholic myself, it is my desire that my said son be brought up in that faith."

1ST DIVISION.
B.

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

She was possessed of no means whatever at the date of her death.

In March 1883 Ann Hammel had been admitted with her child to the Ochiltree Home, Ayr. In May of that year she handed over the child to the care of Mrs and Miss Shaw, Ayr. The child was thereupon baptised into the Scottish Episcopal Church, and from that time down to the date of the case the child was taken charge of and all expenses in connection with its maintenance and education were paid by Miss Shaw. Ann Hammel left the Ochiltree Home about the middle of 1883, and was in service for some time. Towards the end of the year 1885 Mrs Shaw having discovered that Hammel was in jail for a breach of the peace, paid a fine, in default of payment of which Hammel had been sent to prison, and so obtained her release. Her health was then very delicate, and Mrs Shaw procured her admission into the Roman Catholic Convent at Dalbeth, where she remained until her death.

On 31st August 1886, the same day on which the settlement above quoted was executed, Ann Hammel raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Ayr against Mrs Shaw (which was subsequently conjoined with a similar action against Miss Shaw), for delivery of her child. Hammel having died during the dependence of the action, Mr Brand, founding on her settlement, craved the Court to sist him as pursuer in her room. The Sheriff (Brand), recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (Orr Paterson) dismissed the action. Mr Brand appealed to the Court of Session. On 24th February 1888 the Court found that Mr Brand had no title to pursue the action, and therefore dismissed the appeal.

On 7th November 1888 Mr Brand presented a petition to the Court of Session praying for an order on Mrs and Miss Shaw to deliver up the child, John Ingram Hammel, into his custody. The facts above narrated were admitted.

The petitioner averred ;—" Ann Hammel's health having failed, she obtained admission, by the aid of the respondent Mrs Shaw, in 1885, to an institution at Dalbeth, near Glasgow, called the Convent of the Good Shepherd. She hoped for recovery, and desired to take her child under her own charge on leaving the institution. But her illness (consumption) becoming more clearly developed, the said Ann Hammel desired still more urgently to have her said child beside her before she died, and she had proper arrangements ready for its reception and custody, and for its education and upbringing. The said Ann Hammel's desires were made known to the respondents by herself personally on more than one occasion before and after the actions after mentioned, at visits which they made to her in the said institution, and letters were written by her, or on her behalf, early in 1886, to the respondents, or to Mrs Shaw for herself and her daughter, requesting that the said child should be returned to its mother.

" The petitioner, in execution of the trust and guardianship committed to him by the mother, holds the respondent Mrs Shaw primarily and directly responsible to him for the said child. If she has, as stated by herself and by the other respondents in the said actions, left the said child to the other respondent Miss Shaw, then Miss Shaw is also liable to him.

" The petitioner has arrangements ready for the due education and upbringing of the child in accordance with its mother's last wishes ; and he will submit, if necessary, to the Court a scheme for its due care and custody.

" The petitioner contends that he is entitled to have the child restored and delivered to him. He founds on the right of the mother at common law to the custody of the child, and on her consequent power to entrust him with the care of her child after her death. He also founds on the recent statute relating to the guardianship and custody of all infants or pupils in Scotland (49 and 50 Vict. c. 27), and the power thereby conferred on the mother of any pupil to appoint by deed or will a guardian, or in Scotland a tutor, to such pupil after her death. In any event, and if there should be no technical title either by statute or at common law, the petitioner submits that the Court, in regulating the custody of this child, will have regard to the wishes of the deceased mother, as expressed in her said settlement.”

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1886.
Brand v.
Shaw.

The respondents averred ;—“ It is denied that she ever (before the date of the raising of the first action mentioned in the petition) expressed a wish to any of the respondents, either verbally or in writing, to have her child removed from Miss Shaw's custody and handed over to the Roman Catholic sisters of the convent.* Mrs Shaw occasionally visited Ann Hammel in the convent, and corresponded with her, so that she had ample opportunity to express such a wish. It is admitted that the respondent Mrs Shaw received two letters from one of the sisters, dated 5th May and 20th July 1886. Denied that it was at the request or with the consent of Ann Hammel that the demand for the custody of the child therein contained was made. In the last letter received by Mrs Shaw from Ann Hammel, which is dated 9th May 1886, the writer merely

* The following are excerpts from the only letters received by the respondents from Ann Hammel or any person at the convent.

From Sister Mary Frances to Mrs Shaw.—“ Convent Gd Shepherd, Dalbeth, May 5th.—Dear Mrs Shaw,—I have told Ann of your wish that she should write to you herself occasionally, and have given her full permission to do so, she seems a little better, and the doctor thinks she is now on the road to convalescence, but I must say I do not agree with him in his opinion of her . . . Her little one seems now the only anxiety she has. She very naturally yearns to see him a child of that faith which has brought her such peace and happiness. I have told her to write to you fully all that is in her heart upon this subject, feeling quite sure that with your kind heart you will fully enter into her feelings as a mother, and do by her child when she is gone what you would wish done by your own child under similar circumstances, and I think you know enough of Catholics to understand how very strong our feelings are upon this point.”

From Ann Hammel to Mrs Shaw, June 1886.—“ I should like very much to hear about the little boy it would make me feel very happy to know for certain how he is if it is not too much to ask you may I hope to see him some day and if it not to be because Dear Mrs Shaw I feel my end is not far off in this world and I may truly say it is my only wish ungratified I feel sure you with your own mother's heart will grant me this as my last wish from you.” The letter contained no further reference to the child.

From Sister Mary to Mrs Shaw.—“ Convent of the Good Shepherd, Dalbeth, Glasgow, July 20, 1886.—Dear Madam,—I write to you on behalf of one of the poor girls under our care, Anne Hammel, she will not live over the autumn, and of course she is in an unhappy state of mind about her boy, knowing that the Catholic faith is the only one in which she can in conscience permit him to be brought up. I have a Catholic home ready for him, and he will be educated and cared for well, and Anne knows this, and is anxious that the child should be brought to us without delay, though she is in nowise forgetful of the equal advantages that you offer to him, at least as far as this world goes, and as I said above she is deeply grateful for all you have done for them both. Anne has a right according to law over her child, unfortunately illegitimate, and wishes to exercise that right, which she is bound as a Catholic to do, regarding the religion of her child.”

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shawa.

asked for news of the child, and expressed a hope that she might be allowed to see him before her death, which she felt was very near. The said letters are printed in the appendix hereto.

"Admitted that Ann Hammel raised the two actions referred to in the petition. The proceedings therein are referred to. These actions were raised very shortly before her death, when she was mentally and bodily in an extremely weak state, and easily influenced by those around her.

"Ann Hammel, when she entered the convent at Dalbeth, was a Protestant by religion, and the child has been brought up as an Episcopalian.

"The respondent, Miss Shaw, is willing and anxious to continue to take charge of the education and upbringing of John Ingram Hammel, in conformity with the promise she made to his mother. The child is now between six and seven years of age; and the respondents humbly submit that the welfare of the child, as well bodily as moral, will be best assured by his being left under the charge of those who have known and taken care of him from his earliest infancy, and have therefore a strong interest in him, and by allowing him to continue his education on the same lines as up to this time.

"The respondents maintain that the petition is incompetent, and the petitioner's statements irrelevant. Ann Hammel, as the mother of an illegitimate child, had no power to appoint the petitioner, or any other person, tutor to her child, and the petitioner has no legal right, either at common law or under the Act 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27, to insist in this petition. They submit that the Court is the proper guardian of John Ingram Hammel; and that, having regard to his welfare, the prayer of the petition ought to be refused."

At the date of the petition the child was at the Aberlour Orphanage.

Argued for the petitioner;—(1) It was conceded that under the common law the mother of an illegitimate child had no power to nominate a tutor to the child, but that power was conferred on her, if not expressly, at least impliedly, by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. That Act was intended to give to mothers generally a new power, that of acting as or of nominating tutors to their children. The Act must be read in its broadest sense, as it was intended to be a new step in the law of parent and child. The act applied to the guardianship of infants, i.e., any infants. The words "only minor" had been read as including illegitimate children under the Scots Acts, 1555, c. 35, regarding the choosing of curators, and the subsequent Act of 1672, c. 2, which dealt with the inventories to be given up by tutors.<sup>1</sup> In the case of Johnston v. Clark,<sup>2</sup> the claim of the tutor, appointed by the putative father of a bastard, to the custody of the child, had been preferred to that of another person to whom the putative father had confided the child some years before his death. (2) On the facts as stated in the petition and answers, the child should be handed over to the petitioner. It was not disputed that the child would be as well taken care of and his welfare be as assured whether he was in the custody of the petitioner or of the respondents. In such circumstances the Court would look for some fact which would entitle them to decide in one way or the other. That fact was here furnished in the express wish of the mother as stated in the settlement, and as further shewn by the fact that she had raised the actions above referred to, to which there could have been no answer had she lived. Every other consideration being equal, the Court should give effect to the mother's dying wish. The respondents hinted that Hammel had been subjected to undue influence from those around her, but her wish that her child should be brought up as a Roman Catholic in a Roman Catholic home was only natural when she had voluntarily become a Roman Catholic herself. No. 59.

<sup>1</sup> Wilson v. Campbell, March 10, 1819, Fac. Coll.

<sup>2</sup> Johnston v. Clark, 1785, M. 16,374.

Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shawa.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) Under the common law, no one but the father could appoint tutors to his child. Any stranger who left money to a child might appoint trustees, but only for the purposes of the fund.<sup>1</sup> The Guardianship of Infants Act was not intended to alter that law as regarded mothers, except the mothers of legitimate children. The intention of the Act was to put them in a better position in questions with the administrator-at-law, or with tutors appointed by the father. The language of the Act throughout contemplated that the infant should have two parents, whereas, in the eye of the law, bastards had only one. (2) If the mother could not appoint a tutor, the question came to be whether in the exercise of their discretion the Court would take away the child from those to whom the mother had voluntarily entrusted it, and who had supported it for some years, and give it to an utter stranger to her. From the mother's letter it was clear that in June 1886 all that she wished was to see the child before her death. She did not express any wish to have its custody then, though the letters of the sisters with whom she lived gave a different account of her wishes. The actions were raised, and the settlement executed, within a very short time of the mother's death, when she would be easily influenced by those around her, who would naturally press upon her the duty of giving up her child to the care of some Roman Catholic. The question simply came to be, whether the Court would change the custody of the child on a purely religious ground, viz., to have it brought up as a Roman Catholic. There was no case where such a course had been taken. If the petition were to be granted it would come to this, that the mother of a bastard might in all cases get the better of the common law, and practically nominate a tutor to her child, simply by expressing such a wish in any mortis causa deed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In dealing with this case it is impossible not to recognise the charitable manner in which the respondents interfered for the protection of this poor woman, who is now dead—to protect her from the consequences of her own misconduct. But while that is undoubtedly so, the question before us is not very much concerned with considerations of that kind. It is quite conceded on both sides that whatever is to be done in providing for the education of this child could be quite well done by either of the parties before your Lordships. Both are unexceptionable and equally trustworthy. But there is one part of the case which involves a question of law, and it is quite necessary that we should dispose of it before we proceed to the other considerations. Ann Hammel when she was in Dalbeth Convent raised an action against the respondents for the purpose of obtaining possession of her child, which had been taken charge of by the respondents, and at the same time that she raised that action she executed a will, in which she appointed Mr Brand, the petitioner, to be her executor, and also to be the curator of her illegitimate child. That action had proceeded a certain length in the Sheriff Court when Ann Hammel died, and then Mr Brand proposed to sist himself as pursuer in place <sup>1</sup> Stair, i. 6, 6; Ersk. Inst. i. 7, 2; Bell's Prin. sec. 2071; Fraser on Parent and Child, p. 174.

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

of the deceased under the title which he said he obtained by virtue of the will to which I have referred, and the judgment which was pronounced when he proposed to sist himself as a party was that he had no title to sue. That was on the ground, as the petitioner himself sets forth, "that the mother's title to sue was personal to her, and intransmissible in the sense that no one could conduct and continue that action after her death, and that the petitioner, in order to carry out the mother's last wishes, must proceed by petition at his own instance" --I do not think that the last part of the sentence formed any part of the judgment, but it may be perhaps matter of inference—and accordingly he presents this petition now, and instead of basing it entirely on the expressed wishes of the deceased Ann Hammel, he asserts his right under the will to the office of guardian, and that he supports by a reference to the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. Now, it appears to me that the Act referred to gives no title whatever either to the mother of an illegitimate child, or to anyone on her behalf, in her child which she had not possessed at common law. In short, I am of opinion that the Act does not apply to the mother of an illegitimate child. The 2d section provides that on the death of the father of an infant "the mother, if surviving, shall be the guardian of such infant, either alone when no guardian has been appointed by the father, or jointly with any guardian appointed by the father. When no guardian has been appointed by the father, or if the guardian or guardians appointed by the father is or are dead, or refuses or refuse to act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, from time to time appoint a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the mother." And the 3d section provides that the mother may "appoint any person or persons to be guardian or guardians of such infant after the death of herself and the father of such infant (if such infant be then unmarried), and where guardians are appointed by both parents they shall act jointly." The 2d subsection of that section provides that the mother may by her "will provisionally nominate some fit person or persons to act as guardian or guardians of such infant after her death jointly with the father of such infant, and the Court after her death, if it be shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the father is for any reason unfitted to be the sole guardian of his children, may confirm the appointment of such guardian or guardians" appointed by the mother. Now, it seems to me that throughout these enactments it is presumed that there is a father of the child—a father whom the law recognises, and who has independently of this statute certain legal rights of guardianship, and that it applies to any case in which there is a father having such legal rights—in short, it applies to the case of a mother, and gives certain rights to the mother in competition with the rights of the father of a child and those of a tutor-at-law. But in the case where there is no father that the law can recognise, and no tutor-at-law, the statute can have no application. Independently of the statute no mother has any right to nominate a tutor—neither the mother of a legitimate child nor of an illegitimate child—and therefore the only rights given by statute to the mother are in the case of the mother of a legitimate child.

Having cleared away that legal difficulty, we come now to consider the case on its merits. The history of this mother is told, I think, very clearly and candidly by the respondents in their defences to the action in the Sheriff Court, and I shall refer to two or three of the statements there for the purpose of endeavouring to explain what are the considerations to be kept in view in this matter. After Mrs and Miss Shaw had taken charge of this unfortunate woman and her child, and had provided a situation in service for the mother, it appears that she again lapsed into criminal courses, and she was found to be in prison in Ayr. No. 59.

 But the respondents go on to say in the sixth article of their statement of facts Dec. 22, 1888.
 in the Sheriff Court—"As the petitioner was very penitent, and was wishful to Brand v.
 be sent on her release from prison to some place where, as she could not take Shaw's.
 care of herself, she would be looked after by others, Mrs Shaw obtained her admission to a Roman Catholic institution at Dalbeth called the Convent of the Good Shepherd." It seems therefore that the residence of Ann Hammel in this convent was brought about by the interposition of the respondents themselves.
 They recommended her to go there, and provided for her admission. It was arranged, they say, "that the pursuer was to remain there till Mrs Shaw removed her. The pursuer has since remained in this institution. Under the influence of the religious sisterhood who manage this institution the pursuer some time ago, it is believed, embraced the Roman Catholic faith." Then, in the seventh article of their statement they say that "during the time that the pursuer has resided at Dalbeth Mrs Shaw has occasionally visited her and received letters from her, and neither verbally nor in writing did the pursuer prior to the said action being raised against Mrs Shaw ever express a wish for the custody of the child, or that the boy should be taken from the defender. On the last occasion Mrs Shaw saw the pursuer prior to said action (which would be in or about June 1886) the pursuer stated that she was desirous of leaving the institution. On the recommendation of the Sisters Mrs Shaw urged the pursuer to remain for some time longer, and Mrs Shaw promised to remove her when she was fitter to be taken away." And then in article 8 they say that some letters received by Mrs Shaw were "not believed to be in accordance with the real desire of the pursuer, or sent with her authority, or at least as a weak-minded woman she is entirely under the influence and direction of the nuns. The pursuer has never, since its delivery to the defender, taken any interest in her child, and the defender believes and avers that the present proceedings have been raised without her authority and consent, and that if left to herself, and freed from the influence of her present surroundings, she will totally disclaim them." Then they add,—“The pursuer has been visited by Mrs Shaw since the raising of the action against the latter, but as the interview permitted was in the presence of nuns it is believed that the real wishes of the pursuer could not be ascertained.
 The pursuer stated that the child, if returned to her, was to be placed under the guardianship of a Roman Catholic gentleman.”

Now, I think the effect of these averments is this, that when Mrs Shaw and her daughter recommended that Ann Hammel should be taken into this convent at Dalbeth they must have been very well aware that in such a position she would be subject to a good deal of religious influence, and they admit that under the urgency of that influence she had professed the Roman Catholic faith, and had before she died, and in pursuance of that profession, executed the will by which Mr Brand was attempted to be made the legal guardian of her child.
 Now, in these circumstances it does not appear to be of much relevancy for the respondents to say that she was under the pressure of very strong influence in changing her religious profession. I do not doubt that is so in point of fact.
 I do not think anybody can doubt that is so. In all such changes it is a matter to be assumed that a good deal of it is due to influence. One is supposed to understand that every minister of religion, and probably every Christian layman, is bound to use his influence to persuade those who come in contact with him to embrace what he believes to be the true faith, and if the profession of a

No. 59.

Dec. 22, 1888.

Brand v.
Shaws.

particular creed is to be construed as a mere sham and pretence, and not the real impression of the person's wish or belief, because influence was used, I am afraid we should require, in every case of the kind, to make inquiries of the most troublesome and difficult kind. But the Court have no such duty laid upon them. They must accept the facts as they find them, and what we find in this case is that this woman Ann Hammel, before her death and during her residence in the convent, professed the Roman Catholic faith, and expressed her desire and wish in her will that her child should be brought up in accordance with Roman Catholic principles. The Dean of Faculty, on behalf of the petitioner, put the case very well, I think, thus—He said all other considerations may be equal, the child may be in perfectly safe hands if left either to the petitioner or in the Orphanage, where it now is,—the well-being of the child, its material prosperity, its health and morals, will be equally well attended to in the hands of whichever party it may fall under, but there is one consideration which ought to weigh, and that is the expressed wish of the parent. Now, the mother of the child is undoubtedly the proper custodian of that child, especially when it is of tender years, and probably if Ann Hammel had not died she would have succeeded in the action she raised in the Sheriff Court. I do not see very well how she could have failed to obtain an order in that action for delivery of the child. It may have been very ungrateful in her to take that course, but we have nothing to do with that. She had a legal right to do so, and although she had no legal right to appoint a guardian to the child, and cannot do so with effect, still the connection between her and the child, both natural and legal, is such that I cannot help thinking that her expressed wish on this subject ought to receive effect unless there is some strong reason to the contrary. Therefore I am, generally speaking, for granting the prayer of this petition; but I understood the petitioner's counsel to say—and to say very properly—that the child in reality is a ward of this Court, and that they will be prepared to present a scheme for the maintenance and education of the child to be approved of by the Court, and if that course is followed, I think we can settle this matter without further discussion.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion as expressed by your Lordship on all these points.

LORD SHAND.—When one is made aware, as the Court has been, of the circumstances of this case, one must be satisfied that it was very important for Ann Hammel, the mother, and for the child itself, that they found such friends as Mrs and Miss Shaw, for undoubtedly both the mother and child have received great kindness at the hands of these parties, and it is clear that the child has been fully maintained and cared for by them during the last five years. It is natural, and only natural, that in such circumstances a certain lively interest, and indeed attachment, must to some extent have arisen between these ladies and the child, but while that is so, it is the case that where the custody of a child is taken from the parents, or from some natural guardian, it can only be subject to this, that a time may arise when that parent or guardian may assert his right, to which there may be no answer. In this case we have it clearly shewn that there is no material question arising as to the interest of the child with regard to moral or physical advantages. It cannot be said, on the one hand, that if the child were left in the custody of Mr and Mrs Shaw it would lose great advantages, nor can it be said, on the other hand, that if the child be delivered up, as the petitioner asks it shall be, it will suffer disadvantage. In the one case its education will go on in Aberlour Orphanage; in the other case it will go on in some similar home under the charge of the petitioner, but it will be educated in a different religious belief. I assume of course in saying so that the petitioner now offers to have a scheme prepared and approved of by the Court, and is ready to assure the Court that that scheme will be so satisfactory in point of character, and with reference to the duration of the education that will be given, as to make it clear that the child will not suffer from being taken out of the care of those who have been so kind to it. That being so, I have come to the conclusion that there is no doubt or difficulty in the case.

No. 59.
Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaw.

I think the only other element in the case is the mother's recorded expression of what she desired. We find that in the settlement that was executed on 31st August 1886 it is stated by the deceased that, being a Roman Catholic "myself, it is my desire that my said son be brought up in that faith," and she nominates and appoints Mr Brand, who is known to be of that religious belief, to be the curator of the child. Reference has been made to the proceedings and statements in the action in the Sheriff Court. Of course they go to confirm what has been stated, and so far I regard them as satisfactory, but for myself I am bound to say that if there had been nothing of the kind in the case, my view would have been precisely in the terms of that settlement. I agree that of course we must see that the settlement in that matter really records the wish of the person who makes it. I also agree with what your Lordship in the chair has said with reference to the influence that may have induced a change of the mother's religious belief. It is true that where a question of property is concerned this Court is entitled to inquire whether a person has been in a weak and facile state of mind when disposing of it, and when he executes a settlement whether undue influence has been used to induce him to execute it. There is some intelligible issue, but it appears to me it would be out of the question for this Court to direct inquiry with reference to what is or is not probable in reference to a question of change of religious belief. I venture for myself to say that where there was a change of faith, although it might be considered sudden, that would make no difference on my opinion.

I agree, further, in thinking that the Guardianship of Infants Act in its provisions relates entirely to the guardianship of legitimate children, but nevertheless the statute is not, in my opinion, to be altogether laid aside in considering this case. Its provisions are an advance in determining the propriety and expediency of giving the mother a larger power of guardianship of infant children than the law formerly allowed even in a question with the father or his representatives. The reasons of the provisions apply with even greater force in the case of the mother of an illegitimate child, because the law recognises no competing right in the case of a putative father as in the case of the parent of a legitimate child, and while the Court ought not and cannot by judgment alter the existing law as the Legislature has made it, it nevertheless in questions such as the present will administer it within temperate limits so as to adapt it to modern views. These considerations, combined with the fact that it has been held in the case of Macpherson (14 R. 780) that the mother of an illegitimate child during her life has an absolute right to the custody of that child, are, in my opinion, sufficient to shew that the Court in this case ought to give effect to the application made by the petitioner. The mother has a legal right to the custody of her child apart from the right of the mother of a legitimate child to appoint

No. 59. a guardian. The result is, that effect is to be given to the direction she has left, and I am content to put my judgment on that ground alone, and accordingly
Dec. 22, 1888. I concur in thinking that the application should be granted.
Brand v. Shaws.

LORD ADAM.—I think this case comes to a very narrow point. I agree with your Lordship that the petitioner has a right to demand custody of this child, that nobody else has a right to demand custody of it, and that the plan which the Court proposes to adopt is the best in the circumstances. There is no question here about the moral or material welfare of the child. It is admitted on both sides that these interests will be as well attended to by the one side as by the other. That being so, it appears to me that the two conflicting elements of the case are these. On the one side there is the fact that the respondents have now, and have had for a considerable time, the care and custody of this child, and I cannot say that that is not a circumstance which would weigh a good deal on my mind unless a stronger case were made out on the other side for the custody of the child. But the countervailing circumstance on the other side is the desire of the mother. Now, I myself have no doubt that we have the deliberate desire of the mother expressed in her settlement as it is called. I have as little doubt that that was written under influence, but I do not think it was written under what in any sense can be called undue influence. I think that being in the circumstances in which this woman was, becoming an inmate of a Roman Catholic convent and associating with and being under the care of Roman Catholics, she was subjected to an influence which resulted in a change of religion. I am very far from thinking it did not. Having become a Roman Catholic apparently shortly before the raising of the action in the Sheriff Court, it was a very natural desire for her to express that her child should be brought up in her own faith, and in the custody of those who agreed with her in that faith. Therefore I have come to the conclusion that the desire which this mother expressed was her desire, and not brought about by undue influence in any sense. That being so, the question in my mind is, is that expressed desire to weigh against the fact that this child has been in the hands of the respondents for a considerable time, and has been well taken care of? I think the expressed desire of the mother is a matter of such weight that it ought to be given effect to in this case. I have therefore come to the same result as your Lordships.

The petitioner thereafter lodged in process the following scheme :—
“The petitioner having in view the present age of the boy John Ingram Hammel, and the manner in which he has hitherto been brought up, proposes the following scheme for his further education and upbringing [which he undertakes *]—The petitioner’s proposal is that the boy should be sent for a year or two to a junior school where he will be under the charge of ladies, and be properly prepared for his ultimate admission to a school for older boys. After being at the latter school until the age of thirteen, the petitioner proposes to assist the boy into and through an apprenticeship of four to five years’ duration in some trade or business whereby he may be able to support himself. The petitioner has inquired and considered as to the junior and senior school respectively most suitable for carrying out this scheme for the boy’s education, with the following results :—The junior school which the petitioner has in view in the first place is the boarding school for little boys attached to St Elizabeth’s House, Bullingham, Hereford, under care of Sisters of Charity. The terms for this school are from £16 to £18 per annum. The school for older boys to which it is proposed that the child should be sent after his preparation at the said junior school is St Francis' Home, Shefford, Bedfordshire. This school is under the direction of the Very Reverend Canon Collis, and the ordinary terms are £25 per annum for each boy." No. 59.

* The scheme was amended at the bar by the addition of these words.

Dec. 22, 1888.
Brand v.
Shaws.

THE COURT thereafter pronounced this interlocutor:—"Approve of the scheme, together with the undertaking contained in the amendment, and ordain the petitioner, James Brand, to find caution in common form for the carrying out of said scheme and performance of the undertaking contained therein as amended; and on caution being found grant the prayer of the petition, and decern."

W. B. GLEN, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM BLAIR, Petitioner (Reclaimer).—Watt. No. 60.
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY, Respondents.—
Balfour—Low—Macnochie.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Recall—Affidavit—Administration of oath to petitioning creditor—Latent objection—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 22.—The affidavit produced with a petition for sequestration bore that the petitioning creditor appeared before a Justice of the Peace named, and, "being solemnly sworn and interrogated, deposed" to the amount of the debt, &c., and concluded with the words "all which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God," and bore the signature of the deponent and of the Justice. In a petition by the bankrupt for recall of the sequestration (which was opposed only by the petitioning creditor) on the ground that the affidavit was invalid by reason of the granter not having been put on oath, it was proved that though the creditor had signed the affidavit in presence of the Justice he had not been put on oath, but had merely, in answer to a question by the Justice, stated that what was set forth in the affidavit was true. The Court recalled the sequestration, holding (1) that the affidavit was invalid, and (2) that the objection to the affidavit, though latent, should in the circumstances be sustained, as it had not been shewn that the recall would be prejudicial to other creditors.

On 16th August 1888, the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for sequestration of the estates of William Blair, Dundee. Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Ld. Wellwood.
M.

The affidavit produced with the petition bore that Philip R. D. MacLagan, secretary of the company, appeared before Frederick Walter Carter, Justice of Peace for the county of the city of Edinburgh, and, "being solemnly sworn and interrogated, deposed" to the amount of the debt, &c. It concluded with the words, "all which is truth as the deponent shall answer to God." It was signed by Mr MacLagan and Mr Carter.

Sequestration was awarded on 18th August, and Mr Daniel M'Intyre was appointed trustee therein.

Blair thereafter presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, praying for recall of the sequestration.

In the petition, as originally presented, he averred,—"The affidavit and claim produced with the said petition by the said company bears it was deposed to by Mr Philip Robert Dalrymple MacLagan, secretary of the said company, and that the oath was administered by Mr Frederick Walter Carter, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of the city of Edinburgh. Notwithstanding that the said affidavit and claim bears that Mr MacLagan was solemnly sworn and interrogated by Mr Carter, it is believed and averred that Mr Carter did not put Mr

No. 60. MacLagan upon oath or interrogate him in any manner of way in relation to the contents of the said affidavit."

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

The respondents answered,—“It is admitted that the affidavit and claim produced with the petition for sequestration bears to have been deposed to by the secretary for the respondents, and that the oath was administered to the said secretary as averred. Denied that the oath was not in point of fact administered to the said secretary.”

They further averred that the petitioner's statements were irrelevant.

On 16th November, the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the petitioner has set forth no relevant or sufficient grounds for recall of sequestration: Therefore refuses the petition.”*

The petitioner reclaimed. At the bar he added the following averment:—“Mr MacLagan did not attend before Mr Carter to get the oath administered, but, after signing the affidavit, sent it along to Mr Carter to be signed by him. Mr MacLagan and Mr Carter never met with reference to this matter.”

The respondents denied that averment.

It appeared from the trustee's report in the sequestration that the total assets of the bankrupt amounted to about £25, and the total liabilities to about £18,000, of which £17,000 was secured over a heritable property.

The Court allowed the reclamer a proof of his averments as amended, which was subsequently led before Lord Adam.†

---

* “OPINION.—The first ground upon which the petitioner maintains that the sequestration should be recalled is, that the affidavit on which sequestration was awarded was not made upon oath. He states that he believes and avers that the Justice of Peace before whom it bears to have been made did not put Mr MacLagan, the respondents' secretary, upon oath, or interrogate him in any manner of way in relation to the contents of the said affidavit. This is denied by the respondents, and the affidavit is ex facie regular, and sets forth that the compeer was ‘solemnly sworn and interrogated.’

“Now, the proceedings being ex facie regular, it is in the discretion of the Court to allow or refuse inquiry—the petitioner asks for a proof at large—to contradict the formal document on which sequestration was awarded. Such averments are easily made, and it would manifestly lead to great inconvenience and expense to creditors if an inquiry were granted in every case in which the bankrupt chose to assert that, contrary to the statement on the face of the affidavit, the petitioning creditor had not, in point of fact, sworn to the verity of the oath. But I am clearly of opinion that if inquiry is ever to be allowed in such cases, it must be upon averments much more specific than those made in the present case. To use the words of the Lord President in Gillon v. Caesar, November 1, 1882, 10 R. 61, ‘the petitioner would require to state what are his means of knowledge of the alleged fact that there is something wrong, and in what manner he proposes to prove his averments.’ In the course of the discussion in the present case, I invited the counsel for the petitioner to give some further information upon these points, but he was unwilling to do so, and preferred to take a judgment upon the petition as it stood.”

† Mr MacLagan deposed,—“I perfectly remember signing this affidavit. It was signed in Mr Carter's office. It was signed on the date that it bears. Mr Carter was present. There was no other person present. I had gone to Mr Carter's office with it, for the purpose of getting it signed. I cannot quite recollect what took place. I had read the affidavit before I went. It was not read over in Mr Carter's office by me. My impression is, that I told Mr Carter the purpose for which I had come,—that I said this was the document which I wished to sign before him as a Justice of the Peace. Thereupon I signed it. Mr Carter adhibited his signature with J.P. after it. I cannot remember whether anything else took place, but I think the usual course was followed. But I don't remember that. I was not put on oath. I went through the form, Argued for the reclaimer;—By the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 21 and 22, it was provided that the creditor must take an oath to the verity of his debt before a Justice of the Peace or other magistrate. On the proof it was admitted that this had not been done, and the affidavit being thus inept, the sequestration fell to be recalled.<sup>1</sup> It was true that this was not an objection which arose ex facie of the affidavit,—but even on the assumption that it did not arise ex facie, but was a matter for proof, the Court in the exercise of its discretion ought to recall the sequestration,—especially as no other interests were involved besides those of the bankrupt.<sup>2</sup>

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

Argued for the respondents;—It was admitted that there had been an irregularity here, and that the oath had not been taken in regular form. It had, however, been proved that the practice of not administering an

—at least I believe I went through the form—which is usually adopted, which is simply to say, ‘Is this all true?’ I think that is the common practice among Justices of the Peace. I could not swear that that was said. I did not use the words, ‘I swear that is true.’ . . . By the Court.—I know what an affidavit is. I understand it is a declaration. (Q.) Just a common declaration? (A.) Well, no. I should not say that—a declaration on oath. (Q.) This affidavit bears—‘Compeared Philip R. D. MacLagan, who, being solemnly sworn and interrogated, depones.’ Now, were you solemnly sworn? (A.) No, I cannot say I was. (Q.) And how did you understand this to be an affidavit? (A.) When I went there, the course was just what I have been accustomed to. No Justice of the Peace that I have appeared before has ever sworn me. I thought the usual practice was just that they said—‘Is this all true?’ That is the common phrase. (Q.) Do you think it is a proper practice to sign a document which bears that you were solemnly sworn when you were not, or that the Justice should do also? (No answer.)”

Mr Carter, after evidence to the like effect, deponed,—“(Q.) Are you aware the affidavit bears at the beginning, after the compearance of Mr MacLagan, ‘who being solemnly sworn and interrogated, depones’? (A.) I am not aware. I did not read it, but knowing it was an affidavit, I presume it would be so. I was not aware these words were in that special document. (Q.) And so you did not consider it necessary to put him on oath? (A.) It is never done. In practice of my own I have had to make affidavit very often, and never had the document read to me at any time within the last twenty-five years. I never was put on oath myself, and never put any other body on oath. I did not interrogate Mr MacLagan in any way regarding the contents of the document.

. . . Cross.—I always do put the question, ‘Is this true?’ or words to that effect. I then get it signed, and myself sign the document. (Q.) Have you any doubt as to putting that question in this case? (A.) None whatever. . . . By the Court.—I am a Justice of the Peace. (Q.) And I suppose you understand the duties that you undertook as a Justice of the Peace; are you aware this document bears these words—‘Compeared Philip R. D. MacLagan, who, being solemnly sworn and interrogated, depones’ so and so, and you append your signature to that as being true, and you now tell us it was not true—that he was not sworn? (A.) But, my Lord, going back over all these years, I have made affidavits very many times, and never was sworn by men older than I am. (Q.) Don’t you see you have been putting your name to what was not true? (A.) I am referring to the other way when I have made affidavit. I have followed my predecessors; I may be wrong. (Q.) Is there any question that it is wrong to sign what is not true? (A.) On inquiry, I find other Justices follow the same practice.”

<sup>1</sup> Hall v. Colquhoun, June 22, 1870, 8 Macph. 891, 42 Scot. Jur. 596; Campbell v. Miles, May 27, 1853, 15 D. 685; M’Cubbin v. Turnbull, June 28, 1850, 12 D. 1123, 22 Scot. Jur. 523; Gibson v. Greig, Dec. 17, 1853, 16 D. 233.

<sup>2</sup> Mitchell and Lawrie v. Motherwell, Nov. 22, 1888, ante, p. 122.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

oath orally was very common, and was probably accounted for by the fact that the signatures of the deponent and the Justice of the Peace were adhibited to the jurat "as the deponent shall answer to God." In an analogous case, where it was proved that the practice existed of notaries-public certifying that they had personally served the protest of a bill, when in point of fact they had not done so, the Court had disregarded an objection to the protest.<sup>1</sup> At all events, the objection in the present case did not appear ex facie of the affidavit, and it was settled law that in such cases sequestration would not be recalled unless it were shewn that injustice would be done to the bankrupt by allowing the sequestration to go on.<sup>2</sup> The affidavit being ex facie regular, the other creditors of the bankrupt were entitled to rely on the sequestration, and grave injustice might be done to them if it were recalled.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The ground on which we are asked to recall this sequestration is that the petition for sequestration, which was presented by a creditor whose debt was of the requisite amount, was not accompanied, as the statute requires, by an oath. The oath which is produced, or what is called the oath, appears ex facie regular, but it now turns out that it is not an oath at all. That, however, has been ascertained by evidence, and did not appear ex facie of the proceedings. It is, therefore, not imperative on us to recall the sequestration because of that defect; it is in the discretion of the Court to say whether they will recall the sequestration on that ground or not.

The distinction which has been established in a number of cases that have been referred to at the bar between objections arising ex facie of the proceedings and objections which require to be established on proof is now perfectly well settled in practice. In the one case the failure to observe the statute on the face of the proceedings is fatal; in the other case, where the defect in the proceedings, or the objection to the proceedings, requires to be verified by evidence, it is in the discretion of the Court to say whether they will sustain the objection or no. Now, in the present case it has been established that there was no oath taken at all, but the petitioning creditor, the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, represented by its secretary, subscribed the paper, which is also subscribed by one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of the city of Edinburgh, in which it is set out that the claiming creditor was solemnly sworn and interrogated, and that he deponed to the verity of the debt, and the paper winds up with these words—"All which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God." It is no longer disputed—it cannot be disputed—that, in so far as the paper sets forth that the secretary of this company was put upon oath, and that he deponed to its truth and verity as he should answer to God, this paper is entirely false, because no oath was administered.

Now, the lodging of an oath in a petition for sequestration is by no means a light or unimportant matter in the view of the Bankruptcy Act. There are several sections which bear upon it, and shew very clearly what the purpose and object of requiring the oath is. The 21st section provides that such a petition shall be accompanied by "an oath to the effect hereinafter specified," and

<sup>1</sup> M'Cartney v. Hannah, Feb. 11, 1817, Hume's Dec. 76.

<sup>2</sup> Ballantyne v. Barr, Jan. 29, 1867, 5 Macph. 330, 39 Scot. Jur. 149; Gillon v. Caesar, Nov. 1, 1882, 10 R. 59; Mitchell and Laurie v. Motherwell, Nov. 22, 1888, ante, p. 122.

"the effect hereinafter specified" is this, that the deponent shall swear "to the verity of the debt claimed by him"—that is in the 22d section—and shall set out the security which he holds for the debt, if any. Now, it must be kept distinctly in view that this is an oath of verity, and not an oath of credulity, and therefore it is quite clear from the sections to which I have already referred that if a creditor makes a false statement, and swears to the verity of a debt which is not a debt, or makes any other wilfully false statement, he will be liable to be prosecuted for perjury. That is a result which would flow from the ordinary common law. But the matter does not even stand upon the common law only, because the statute attaches a very great importance to the form and effect of this oath which is lodged with a petition for sequestration. There is a special section applicable to this matter—section 178—which provides this,—
 "If any person shall be guilty of wilful falsehood in any oath made in pursuance of this Act, he shall be liable to a prosecution either at the instance of Her Majesty's Advocate or at the instance of the trustee, with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Advocate, provided that in the latter case the prosecution shall be authorised by a majority of the creditors present at a meeting to be called for the purpose, and such person shall, on conviction, besides the awarded punishment, forfeit to the trustee for behoof of the creditors his whole right, claim, and interest in or upon the sequestered estate, and the same shall be distributed, either under the sequestration or, if it be closed, under a process of multiplepoinding as is hereinbefore provided."

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1889.
 Blair v. North
 British and Mercantile
 Insurance Co.

Now, looking at these provisions in the statute, one cannot fail to see that the Legislature has attached very great importance to the making of this oath, and it cannot in the least derogate from its importance that by another Act of Parliament it is provided that in certain cases an affirmation may be substituted for an oath in cases of this description, because that statute makes very special provisions as to the conditions on which affirmation shall be allowed to take the place of an oath. The 2d section of the Act 28 Vict. cap. 9, provides that if a person called as a witness, or required or desiring to make an affidavit or deposition in the course of civil or criminal proceedings, "shall refuse or be unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives, to be sworn, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge, or other presiding officer or person qualified to take affidavits or depositions, upon being satisfied of the sincerity of such objection, to permit such person, instead of being sworn, to make his or her solemn affirmation or declaration in the words following,—'I do solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare that the taking of any oath is, according to my religious belief, unlawful, and I do also solemnly, sincerely, and truly affirm and declare,'" and so on, which is the substance of his affidavit. Now, the first observation I make here is that it is not merely the expression of a desire on the part of the person who seeks to affirm in place of to swear that is to entitle him to do so. The Court, or Judge, or Magistrate must be satisfied of the sincerity of his objection to take the oath, and the party himself who proposes to make an affirmation instead of an oath must use the very words of the statute. There is no alternative form—nothing in the shape of an affirmation—but "the words following" must be used, and among "the words following" are these, "that the taking of any oath is, according to my religious belief, unlawful." But still further, the next section provides that any false statement made in such an affirmation will subject the party making it to the pains of perjury. Now, if an affirmation of this kind, made under this statute, and with all these conditions and safeguards,

No. 60. had been laid before us, of course we should have sustained it. But what have we got? We have got a paper which is neither an oath nor an affirmation, and which therefore does not bind the conscience of the party, and does not subject him, if it be false, to the pains of perjury. It is therefore quite impossible to say that this paper can be taken as coming in place of or serving the purpose of an oath as required by the terms of the Bankruptcy Act.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

Now, except for one consideration, that would be conclusive of the whole matter, but no doubt we have here power to exercise a discretion for the reasons I have already stated, and in the exercise of that discretion we are bound to look at the circumstances of the case. If this had been a sequestration, the awarding of which had had the effect of reducing undue preferences, or of equalising diligences, or of creating a right or cutting down a right, or of preferring one or more creditors, that might have been a reason for considering whether it was necessary in the circumstances of the case with the view of doing justice between the parties absolutely to recall it. But in the present case it is not said—and it obviously cannot be said—that the awarding of this sequestration, or the first deliverance on the petition, has had any of these effects. There has been no diligence cut down, no preference created, no equalising of diligence—nothing in short that yields to any particular creditor a right, or has deprived any particular creditor of a preference which he would otherwise have had, and therefore I think this case is a very simple one under the Act of Parliament. It is said that in exercising our discretion we should not interfere with the sequestration unless its existence is to work some injustice to some person—in short, unless it is necessary, in order to do justice between the parties, that the sequestration be recalled. I do not think that is the proper view. I think there are many considerations which ought to operate with us in exercising this discretion, and one of those which operates chiefly on my mind in the present case is this, that the recalling of this sequestration will be a most excellent example, and that if we were in the circumstances of this case to refuse to recall it that refusal would be peccati exempli, and would tend to perpetuate a practice which is utterly illegal, and I think is also immoral. Therefore I am for recalling the sequestration.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion. The practice which your Lordship has alluded to seems to have crept in to a considerable extent; but it is not in accordance with the statute, and does not comply with one of its main provisions. For, as I read the Bankruptcy Act, a petitioning creditor, when he presents an application to enable him to obtain sequestration, must produce an oath to the verity of his debt, and that has plainly not been done, as the oath was not properly administered. I concur, however, with your Lordship in thinking that when the proceedings are ex facie regular, and the objection is only established after investigation, the Court have a discretion in dealing with the matter, and may dispose of the sequestration as circumstances may appear to warrant. Now, in the present case, it appears to me that it is not desirable that this sequestration should be allowed to go on, because on the admitted facts of the case the sum covered by the sequestration is about £25, and the balance of the heritable debt which is claimable against the bankrupt is £17,000. In these circumstances there seems to be little left to dispute about, except the question of expenses; and I therefore think it will be of advantage that the sequestration should come to an end. I concur with your Lordship in your remarks on the irregularity of making an affidavit in the way in which I understand it was done here. The oath was not actually administered, and yet the debtor is put into the position of being sequestrated by the production of an oath which had not in fact been taken. I think we are obliged in this case, in the exercise of our discretion, to recall the sequestration.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

LORD SHAND.—I think the principles on which the Court should proceed in questions of this nature as to the recall of a sequestration have been very distinctly stated and settled in the case of Ballantyne v. Barr, and in the recent case of Motherwell v. Laurie. If the proceedings disclose a case in which ex facie of the oath of the petitioning creditor there is something clearly wrong, then the sequestration ought to be recalled. Anyone looking at the oath is bound to see that it is not an oath which would warrant sequestration, and a third party cannot say he suffers any hardship if he does not examine the proceedings, including the oath. If, on the other hand, the oath is in all respects ex facie regular, and a third party—a creditor—relies on that, the considerations are quite different when an application for recall of the sequestration comes to be made. The Court has held that in this class of cases there is a discretion to recall the sequestration or not, according to their view of what is just in the circumstances.

Accordingly, I think the question here is, whether in the discretion of the Court this sequestration ought or ought not to be recalled? It is a sequestration in which everything would appear to a third party to be ex facie regular. Now, in that aspect of the case, if it had appeared, now that we have the sederunt-book and the whole proceedings, that the recall of the sequestration would be a serious injury to the creditors generally, because it would leave or make preferences granted by the bankrupt unchallengeable which might otherwise have been set aside, I should have had the utmost difficulty in saying that the sequestration should be recalled. As was pointed out in the case of Motherwell v. Laurie, section 42 of the Bankruptcy Act contains this important provision,—“In all questions under this Act or preceding Acts regarding sequestration of the estates of debtors, the sequestration shall be held to commence and take effect on and from the date of the first deliverance on any petition for sequestration, which shall be held to be the date of the sequestration, although the sequestration be not actually awarded until a later date”; and, again, under the title of “effect of sequestration on ranking of creditors,” there are very important provisions in sections 107 to 111, both inclusive, of the statute, which all take effect from the time when the first deliverance in the sequestration is granted. One of these is to the effect that the order shall operate as “a decree of adjudication of the heritable estates of the bankrupt for payment of the whole debts of the bankrupt, principal and interest.” The second is, that sequestration “shall be equivalent to an arrestment in execution and decree of forthcoming, and to an executed or completed poinding.” There is an interruption of prescription by section 109 and a cutting down of preferences by sections 110 and 111 of the statute.

Now, if the case had presented this aspect—that there were creditors here ranking who had relied on the sequestration in ignorance of the fact that the alleged deponent, the petitioning creditor, had not taken an oath, as he ought to have done, and their interests had therefore been prejudiced, because they had been induced to rest satisfied with this sequestration, and so had not taken

No. 60. proceedings themselves—then I should have said that, in its discretion, the Court ought not to recall the sequestration.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

But, in the circumstances, I entirely concur with your Lordship. I am of this opinion because the question is now one entirely between the bankrupt and the petitioning creditor. The bankrupt maintains that this creditor who seeks to maintain the sequestration is not in a position to do so, and neither the trustee nor any other creditor has resisted the recall. Your Lordship has gone fully into the provisions of the statute in regard to the necessity for an affidavit. Nothing could be more express than the enactment of section 22 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856—which refers back to section 21, requiring that there shall be an oath taken,—and that such oath shall be taken before the Judge Ordinary, Magistrate, or Justice of the Peace. That is because these are the only parties who are in use or are entitled to administer oaths. The purpose for which the party goes before the Judge Ordinary, Magistrate, or Justice of the Peace is, that he shall take an oath as the statute requires. Then, as your Lordship has pointed out, both under a declaration in terms of the provisions of the Act 28 Vict. cap. 9, and under an oath duly made, a person who has made any false statement is, in the first place, liable to prosecution for perjury, and in the next place, is liable to forfeiture of his claim on the estate. These are circumstances shewing the importance of the oath to be administered, but we do not require these circumstances, for section 21 makes it clear that an oath must be administered.

We have had previous cases of this kind. There was one in which, in a competition for a trusteeship, one of the parties stated that all the oaths on the other side were open to objection on this ground (Wylie v. Kyd, 11 R. 968). I confess I was impressed with the conviction that the averment could only be stated to delay the case, or at least as a mere haphazard statement. I could not have believed that such an intolerable practice existed as appears from this proof. There is this to be said for the person appearing before the Justice on this occasion, that apparently business men had got lulled into the view that they may call a thing an oath which is not an oath, and I concur in thinking that the sooner business men are taught that this is an unsound view the better, and that we should recall this sequestration, if for no other reason, with the view of marking decisively the impropriety of proceedings of this kind.

I should like to add that I put my judgment on the general question, and not on the specialties of this sequestration. There may be little, if any, estate for division amongst unsecured creditors, but I can understand that the heritable creditors may find the sequestration valuable in enabling them to give a title. In cases of sale it is notorious that a title by the trustee in a sequestration is a valuable title, for it is generally free from exception, and I can understand why creditors should resort to sequestration in order to be able to give such a title. But if they do so they must comply with the provisions of the statute, which in this case I am satisfied has not been done.

LORD ADAM.—In my opinion the difference between ex facie objections and latent objections is perfectly sound, and well established in law. I think it is also quite clear that the latter class, namely, latent objections which must be a subject of proof and inquiry as to whether they are established, will be taken in nine out of ten cases in applications for recall of sequestration, for, if they are not ex facie, the sequestration will be granted, and therefore inquiries into latent objections will take place in the sequestrations. And that being so, there is no doubt that it has been held in such cases that when the latent objection is established it is entirely in the discretion of the Court whether the sequestration be recalled. It occurs to me that where the truth of the latent objection has been established the sequestration should be recalled, unless it can be shewn that there are interests involved which should lead to a different result, and accordingly I think the question is—Is it or is it not established as against the recall of the sequestration that other creditors have acquired rights which would be prejudicially affected by a recall? I think that would be the proper inquiry. If that be not shewn, then it would occur to me that it should be recalled. Now, in the present case it appears to me that it has not been established, certainly it has not been so to my satisfaction, that any other creditor would be prejudiced. No preference has been acquired, no preference has been cut down, and so far as we can ascertain, nothing has been done whereby the interests of other creditors would be affected by the recall of this sequestration. If the affidavit is a bad one, I do not know that the fact that it is a particularly bad one, as it is in this case, would affect the question whether the sequestration should be withdrawn, looking to the interests of the other creditors. In this case, though there is really no oath at all, if I had been satisfied that the other creditors would be prejudicially affected I would hesitate to recall, but being satisfied that they are not prejudicially affected, I concur with your Lordships that the sequestration should be recalled.

No. 60.

Jan. 8, 1889.
Blair v. North
British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition, and recalled the sequestration.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

DONALD THOMSON Senior, Appellant.—Goudy.

GEORGE M'BAIN Junior (Donald Thomson's Trustee), Respondent.—G. W. Burnet.

No. 61.

Jan. 12, 1889.
Thomson v.
Thomson's
Trustee.

Master and Servant—Wages—Proof—Presumption.—A father claimed wages from his son, who was a country grocer, for his services as vanman for a period of eight years. The trustee on the son's sequestrated estate rejected the claim on the ground that the father, as appeared from the bankrupt's deposition, had been maintained and clothed by the son, and that there was no agreement to give wages. In an appeal against that deliverance the Court held (following Anderson v. Halley, 9 D. 1222) that there was a presumption in favour of wages being due, and allowed a proof.

On 16th January 1888 Donald Thomson, merchant, Hill of Fearn, 1st Division, Ross-shire, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, and on 13th April following his estates were sequestrated, and George M'Bain junior, C.A., was appointed trustee.

Donald Thomson senior, the bankrupt's father, lodged a claim in the sequestration for £160 and interest, vouched by (1) An account bearing to be dated 16th January 1888, which was in the bankrupt's handwriting, stating in somewhat ambiguous language, that the amount represented "eight years' wages due by you to me for the period from 16th January 1880 to this date for travelling through the country with my (sic) horse and van and selling my (sic) goods, and purchasing eggs for me, at £20 per annum"; and (2) a promissory-note by the bankrupt in favour of the claimant, likewise bearing date 16th January 1888.

Sheriff of the Lothians.
M.

No. 61. The trustee rejected the claim.*

Jan. 12, 1889.
Thomson v.
Thomson's
Trustee.

The claimant appealed to the Sheriff of the Lothians, and stated in his minute, inter alia,—"1. The appellant is the father of the bankrupt, and was in his employment as vanman for the period charged in the claim lodged. Had he not given his services the bankrupt would have required to have employed another assistant and paid him wages. The services of the claimant were rendered, and wages were not paid."

The trustee stated in answer,—“4. The appellant lived in family with his son, and in his leisure time was accustomed to drive his (the bankrupt's) van through the country collecting goods. For this occasional work he received his board, clothing, and any sums of money he required for his own purposes. . . . As a matter of fact, the appellant was just in the natural position of being maintained by his son, and partly in return for such maintenance, and partly to occupy his leisure time, he drove the van.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton), on 3d December 1888, dismissed the appeal.

The claimant appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There was admittedly no specific agreement about wages, but in these circumstances there was a legal presumption in favour of remuneration.<sup>1</sup> Cases like that of Jones' Trustee v. Jones were not in point, because there the wages had been paid, and the trustee maintained that he was entitled to repetition on the ground that they had been paid within sixty days of bankruptcy.<sup>2</sup> Here the trustee ought to have allowed evidence to be led under the 126th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, before rejecting the claim.<sup>3</sup> The Court should now order proof either before the trustee or the Sheriff.

Argued for the trustee;—This was not a case for proof, and the trustee and Sheriff had done right in rejecting the claim. There was no contract of service alleged, the mere incidental use of the word “employment” being the only attempt on the claimant's part to aver such a contract. Accordingly, the claim for wages could not be sustained.<sup>4</sup> The case of M'Naughton<sup>5</sup> was decided on the ground, as explained by the Lord Justice-Clerk, that “a right to wages formed part of the original conditions or

* The trustee stated in his deliverance,—“The bill and holograph acknowledgment produced were granted on the same day as that on which the bankrupt granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. The claimant is father of the bankrupt. By the holograph acknowledgment the bankrupt acknowledges that he is indebted and resting owing to the claimant the sum of £160, as per an account prefixed, which he says is correct. That account is also holograph of the bankrupt, and although the personal pronouns in it are a little mixed, it is evident that it is an account for eight years' wages, said to be due by the bankrupt to the claimant. In his examination before the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles the bankrupt said,—‘I assisted in maintaining my father since I started business; my sister also contributed. My father lived with me till about three or four months ago. He acted as my vanman, but I gave him no wages, merely his meat and clothing. I never agreed to give my father wages.’ These statements, one of which is the foundation of this claim, are contradictory of each other. The claim appears to be a collusive one, and the trustee therefore rejects it.”

<sup>1</sup> M'Naughton v. M'Naughton, 1813, Hume's Decns. 396; Anderson v. Halley, June 11, 1847, 9 D. 1222, 19 Scot. Jur. 532; Fraser on Master and Servant, 44.

<sup>2</sup> Jones' Trustee v. Jones, Jan. 25, 1888, 15 R. 328.

<sup>3</sup> A and B v. Tunnoek's Trustee, Nov. 25, 1865, 4 Macph. 83, 38 Scot. Jur. 59; Ritchie v. Balgarnie, Jan. 14, 1875, 2 R. 297.

<sup>4</sup> Ritchie v. Ferguson, Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 119, 21 Scot. Jur. 610; Russell's Trustees v. Russell, Dec. 11, 1885, 13 R. 331.

<sup>5</sup> M'Naughton v. M'Naughton, Hume's Decns. 396.

engagements of the parties.”<sup>1</sup> Here nothing was said at the commencement or during the relation as to wages, and the presumption was therefore excluded.

No. 61.

Jan. 12, 1889.
Thomson v.
Thomson's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think we are all agreed that we can take no notice of the documents which have been presented with this claim. If they are to have any effect at all, in my view that effect is against the appellant. But the question is, whether there is enough averred to entitle him to a proof, and I am of opinion that there is. His averment is, that he “is the father of the bankrupt, and was in his employment as vanman for the period charged in the claim lodged,” and he then goes on to say that he gave his services as vanman for eight years, and that no wages were paid in return for these services. I assume that the law applicable to a case of this kind is correctly stated by the Lord President in the case of Anderson v. Halley, 9 D. 1222, and giving effect to that law, I think that if the averments of the claimant are proved in point of fact he will be entitled to wages. I am further of opinion that if there is to be inquiry it ought to be before the Sheriff.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion.

I observe that Lord Fraser in commenting upon the case of Ritchie, 12 D. 119, to which reference has been made, makes this observation (Fraser on Master and Servant, p. 44),—“The question of remuneration seems rather to depend not upon any general presumption, but upon a consideration of the whole circumstances under which the services were performed.” That expresses exactly my opinion on the merits of such a case as the present, after we have, as the result of inquiry, the facts fully before us. His Lordship then goes on, “if any general presumption in favour of the servant exist, it is at best a weak one, and easily rebutted by circumstances indicating that the services were intended to be gratuitous.” So far as that passage is concerned, I do not think the existence of the presumption is a matter which is at all doubtful. I think it does exist. The case of Anderson v. Halley, 9 D. 1222, looked at in the light of the previous case of M'Naughton, Hume's Decns. 396, is an authority to that effect. I agree in thinking that in many circumstances it may be a weak presumption which admits of being readily rebutted. For instance, if no claim for wages has ever been made, and not a farthing has been given,—if any actings of the parties tend to shew that it was not intended that any payment should be made,—if maintenance and clothing have been gratuitously supplied, and the services rendered seem to have been thereby substantially remunerated,—all these are circumstances which must, of course after inquiry, be taken into account, and they may in a particular case entirely meet the presumption. Still, I am of opinion that the proper course is to have an inquiry. I am further of opinion that, in a small matter of this kind, it would have been quite legitimate for the trustee to have called the parties before him, and to have taken the evidence himself. But he has not done this, and as the case has already been before the Sheriff, I think the cause should be remitted back to him to hold the inquiry.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustain the appeal;

<sup>1</sup> Alcock v. Easson, Dec. 20, 1842, 5 D. 356, at p. 368.

No. 61.

Jan. 12, 1889.
Thomson v.
Thomson's
Trustees.

recall the interlocutor appealed from; and remit to the Sheriff to allow the appellant and respondent a proof of the averments contained in their respective minutes, and to proceed farther as shall be just and in terms of law: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

THOMAS McNAUGHT, S.S.C.—WAUGH & McLACHLAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 62.

Jan. 15, 1889.
Schaw v.
Black.

ROBERT SCHAW, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—Gloag—Martin.
MRS MARGARET KILGOUR OR BLACK AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Sir Charles Pearson—Shaw.
JOHN INGLIS AND OTHERS, Defenders.

Title to sue and defend—Property—Pro indiviso proprietor.—One of several pro indiviso proprietors of subjects let as grass parks borrowed a sum of money, and in security thereof granted a bond and disposition over his share of the estate. The bond contained an assignation to the rents. The bondholder raised an action of mails and duties against the tenants for payment of his debtor's share of the rents, calling also as defenders his debtor and the other pro indiviso proprietors. The debtor alone defended the action, and, while admitting the debt, maintained that the pursuer had no title to sue.

The Court repelled the defences, holding that the debtor had neither interest nor title to object to effect being given to his own assignation.

Question, whether a pro indiviso proprietor of an estate let under lease has a title to sue for his share of the rents of the estate without the concurrence of the other pro indiviso proprietors.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

MRS MARGARET KILGOUR OR BLACK, wife of Roger Black, solicitor, Kirkcaldy, was proprietrix of two-fifths pro indiviso of the lands of Bruntshiels, in the county of Fife.

In 1881, Mrs Black borrowed from Robert Schaw, Edinburgh, a sum of £1600, and in security of that loan she, with consent of her husband, granted a bond and disposition in security over her share of the pro indiviso estate. The bond contained an assignation to rents.

The lands of Bruntshiels were divided into fourteen enclosures, which were let as grass parks. In the articles of roup of these parks for 1888, it was provided that the rents should be paid to Mr John Inglis of Colluthie, one of the pro indiviso proprietors, for behoof of himself and the other pro indiviso proprietors.

On 16th July 1888, Schaw raised this action against (1) Mr and Mrs Black, (2) the other pro indiviso proprietors of Bruntshiels, (3) the tenants of the grass parks. The conclusions of the action were, inter alia, for payment of the rents, mails, and duties of the several grass parks, "but that only to the extent of two-fifths of said rents, mails, and duties, being the proportion thereof due and leviable in respect of the said share or portion extending to two-fifths pro indiviso of said lands and others belonging to the said Margaret Kilgour or Black."

The only comparing defenders were Mr and Mrs Black, who admitted the debt, but averred that the tenants of the parks were in no way bound to pay any portion of the rents of the grazings to them, but only to Mr Inglis of Colluthie, for behoof of all the pro indiviso proprietors.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer, as heritable creditor infest in the subjects and others foresaid, is entitled, in the default in payment before set forth, to enter into possession of the lands disposed in security, and uplift the rents thereof, and he is entitled to decree of mails and duties in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action is incompetent. (3) No relevant case. No. 62.

On 16th November 1888, the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the second plea in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof, dismisses the action, and decerns."* Jan. 15, 1889.
Schaw v. Black.

* "OPINION.—This is an action of mails and duties at the instance of a heritable creditor. The defender, the granter of the bond, is the proprietor of two-fifths pro indiviso of the subjects described in the summons, and the question is, Whether such an action is competent at the instance of the creditor under a bond affecting a pro indiviso right? By the terms of the leases the tenants are taken bound to pay the stipulated rents, not to the leading defender, or to all the proprietors in definite proportions, but to one of their number, Mr Inglis of Colluthie, for the benefit of all.

"The pursuer maintains, first, that when subjects are set in lease by two or more pro indiviso proprietors as joint lessors, each of them has a separate right to sue the tenants for his own proportion of the rent; and, secondly, that Mr Inglis is a mere factor for himself and his co-proprietors, and that no arrangement for the ingathering of rents by a factor can defeat the right of any one proprietor or of his creditor.

"No authority was cited in support of the first proposition, and it appears to me to be inconsistent with the nature of the right. The assumption upon which the argument proceeds, and upon which also the summons is framed, is that the defender is a part owner, having right to two definite fifth parts or shares of the subjects, or at least of the rents. But a pro indiviso proprietor is not a part owner but a joint owner. The distinction is very clearly brought out in Lord Moncreiff's judgment in the case of Cargill v. Muir, 15 S. 408, where he explains the position of heirs-portioners. 'Heirs-portioners are not joint proprietors, but, as their name imports, part owners or portioners. They hold pro indiviso while the subject is undivided. But each has a title in herself to her own part or share, which she may alienate or burden by her own separate act. The condition of two joint proprietors in this case is very different; they have no separate estates, but only one estate vested in both, not merely pro indiviso in respect of possession, but altogether pro indiviso in respect of the right. The distinction is the same which is expressed by English lawyers by the terms joint tenants and tenants in common.' It is on this principle, viz., that every part of the whole subject is vested in each and all of the proprietors, that it has been held that one of them has no title without the concurrence of the others to sue a declarator of marches, or to grant leases, or to sequester or remove tenants. On the same reasoning no single proprietor can have a title to sue separately either for the whole or for a part of a rent which is payable to all jointly, and the debtor has no separate right in any part of the estate, and no separate action against the tenants for any part of the fruits.

"I do not doubt that it would be possible, in the administration of such a property, to grant leases so conceived as to give each proprietor a several right to recover a definite proportion of rent, but that is not what the proprietors in the present case have done. By the terms of their contract, the tenants are taken bound to pay the entire rent to one proprietor, who is not the present defender. The defender has no right or title to sue upon these contracts for separate payment to herself of her own proportion of the rent; and the pursuer, who is her assignee, can have no title to recover rent which she could not recover by action in her own name. The purpose and effect of an action of mails and duties is simply to put the creditor in the position of the lessor in so far as regards the right to recover rents, and it follows that no such action can be competent which would give the creditor a higher or more definite right than that which the debtor possessed.

"The position of Mr Inglis is altogether different from that of a factor, who is a mere agent appointed to collect rents which are payable by the contract of lease to his principal. The entire rents are payable under the contract of lease

No. 62.

Jan. 15, 1889.
Schaw v.
Black.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The first question to be determined was, what was the nature of Mrs Black's right to the subjects which she had burdened? Was it a right of joint ownership, as the Lord Ordinary had held, or a right of part ownership, or of tenancy in common, as it was called in England? The distinction between these two classes of rights was not very clearly defined in the cases on the subject.<sup>1</sup> Of the former class a good illustration was a conveyance to trustees in ordinary terms, while the latter class was illustrated by the case of heirs-portioners. Mrs Black's right as a pro indiviso proprietor was of the same character as that of an heir-portioner. Her right was not one of joint ownership with the other pro indiviso proprietors, but each of them had a distinct and separate title to his or her share of the estate. That being the nature of her right, the second question was as to whether she would have had a title to sue this action if she had chosen to do so? The right of a pro indiviso proprietor to sue an action was different in questions with third parties and in questions inter socios. In the former case, the consent and concurrence of the other proprietors was necessary,<sup>2</sup> while in the latter no such consent was necessary.<sup>3</sup> In the case of Morrison,<sup>4</sup> the Court had sustained the title to sue in the face of an objection by one of the proprietors. Had this action been one inter socios, Mrs Black could have sued it. Much more could she have done so when none of the parties cited as interested in the matter objected. It followed, then, that her creditor, to whom she had assigned all her rights and interest in her share of the estate, had a good title to sue. By defending the action she was just attempting to prevent effect being given to her own assignation without any legal ground or interest stated.

Argued for the defenders;—On the first question, Mrs Black's right was merely a joint right of ownership as defined by Lord Moncreiff in Cargills v. Muir.<sup>5</sup> Her right was a right in one estate vested in all the pro indiviso proprietors, none of whom had any separate share in the estate.<sup>6</sup> It was a right of limited ownership. In Johnston v. Crai- to him alone, and they cannot be recovered from the tenants otherwise than in terms of the contracts by which the tenants are bound.

"It is not disputed that the defender has effectually burdened her pro indiviso interest. And her creditor may enforce his right by diligence of a different kind, or by sale. But the diligence he proposes to use by this action appears to me to be incompetent.

"The cases of Kay v. Clough, and of Ferguson v. Murray, cited by the pursuer, have, in my opinion, no bearing. The question in these cases was, Whether the appointment of a judicial factor for the management of an estate could bar the diligence of creditors, assuming such diligence to be otherwise competent. The objection in the present case is that the action of mails and duties is not competent, because a creditor can attach by any form of diligence nothing but the rights and interests of the debtor exactly as they stand in him."

<sup>1</sup> 2 Bell's Com. 544, 7th edit.; Bell's Prin. 1072; Rankine on Land-Ownership, 485; Williams on Real Property, 157; Cargills v. Muir, Jan. 21, 1837, 15 S. 408, per Lord Moncreiff, 489.

<sup>2</sup> Millar v. Cathcart, March 16, 1851, 23 D. 743, 33 Scot. Jur. 380; Stewart v. Wand, Feb. 5, 1842, 4 D. 622, 14 Scot. Jur. 245.

<sup>3</sup> Johnston v. Craufurd, July 3, 1855, 17 D. 1023, 27 Scot. Jur. 520; Morrison, Dec. 11, 1857, 20 D. 276; Lawson v. Leith and Newcastle Steam Packet Co., Nov. 26, 1850, 13 D. 175, 23 Scot. Jur. 51; Lade v. Largo Banking Co., Nov. 6, 1863, 2 Macph. 17, 36 Scot. Jur. 16.

<sup>4</sup> Morrison, 20 D. 276.

<sup>5</sup> 15 S. 408.

<sup>6</sup> M'Neight v. Lockhart, Nov. 30, 1843, 6 D. 128, per Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) 136, 16 Scot. Jur. 108.

furd,<sup>1</sup> although the pursuer sued in the character of a pro indiviso proprietor, there was no other person to vindicate the subject from improper use. In the case of Morrison,<sup>2</sup> the petitioner was judicial factor, not on the estate of one of the pro indiviso proprietors, but on the whole estate, and it was held a mere corollary of the power to gather the whole rents that he should grant a lease for the whole period. The case of Lade<sup>3</sup> was very special. It dealt with a question of pleading, and further, it only dealt with the title of a pro indiviso proprietor to sue where another of the pro indiviso proprietors was aiding a third party in dilapidating the subject. In Millar v. Cathcart,<sup>4</sup> it was held that a pro indiviso proprietor had no title to sue a declarator of marches. Mrs Black then would have had no title to sue this action, and it followed that her creditor could have no higher right.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this a very special case indeed, and that its decision will not establish any general rule, or interfere with any of the decisions already pronounced in this class of cases.

The defender, with consent of her husband, granted a bond and disposition in security over her share of the lands of Bruntshiels, which share extended to two-fifths pro indiviso. The bond contained the usual clauses, and amongst these there was an assignation to the rents, which by statute gives the creditor power to enter into possession of the subjects contained in the bond by an action of mails and duties. Mrs Black now practically refuses to allow her creditor to use this assignation to the effect of drawing the rents.

Now, if this defence had been stated by parties other than the granter of the bond, a very different question from that now before us would have to be determined. But the sole compearing defenders are Mrs Black and her husband. All the other parties called as defenders are perfectly content that the creditor in the bond should get possession of the rents by this action of mails and duties to the extent of the proportion of the subjects effeiring to his debtor in the bond. The arrangement by which the rents of the parks were to be paid to Mr Inglis of Colluthie, one of the pro indiviso proprietors, was a convenient arrangement for the administration of the estate, but it can in no way interfere with or control the rights of the heritable creditor. Mr Inglis makes no objection to the course taken by the creditor. The other pro indiviso owners and the tenants also make no objection. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defenders have no interest or title to object.

LORD MURR.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the circumstances of this case are very special, and enable us to determine the main question at issue, without going into the more difficult questions raised in the course of the discussion. The action is one of mails and duties by the holder of a bond and disposition in security against the debtor in the bond for payment pro tanto of a debt admittedly due out of the rents of the land covered by the bond, of which the defender is one of the pro indiviso proprietors, to the extent of the rents due for her pro indiviso share of the property. All the parties interested have been called, including the other pro indiviso proprietors and the tenants of the parks which form the subject-matter of the security.

Now, none of these parties have appeared to defend the action except the

No. 62.

Jan. 15, 1889.
Schaw v.
Black.

<sup>1</sup> 17 D. 1023.

<sup>2</sup> 2 Macph. 17.

<sup>3</sup> 20 D. 276.

<sup>4</sup> 23 D. 743.

No. 62. debtor in the bond, who pleads as preliminary defences (1) that the pursuer has no title to sue; (2) that the action is incompetent; (3) that there is no relevant case. But she does not seem to me to set out any specific defence on the merits, probably because, having regard to the facts of the case, as it appears to me, she has really no defence upon the merits, for the debt is admittedly due. In these circumstances, it may, I think, be fairly held, in the absence of the other pro indiviso proprietors who have been duly called, that they concur in the pursuer's action; and as the tenants offer no opposition, I am of opinion that the defender is not entitled to have this case thrown out of Court on the technical grounds stated in defence.

Jan. 15, 1889.
Schaw v.
Black.

LORD SHAND.—The principal defender in this case is proprietor pro indiviso of two-fifths of the estate of Bruntshiels, which is let in grass parks to tenants whose rents form the subject of the present litigation. Her right being one pro indiviso is a right over the whole estate, but it only extends to so much of the rents as corresponds to her two-fifths share of the property. She has conveyed away her rights in the property to the pursuer. She granted a bond and disposition in security for money lent to her by the pursuer, conveying to him, as the condition of the loan, her two-fifths share of the estate, and assigning the rents effeiring to that share.

Now, if the objection which she has stated here had been taken by the tenants on the estate I do not see reason to doubt that it would have been well founded. They contracted for payment of their rents as a whole, and they would, I think, be able to maintain successfully that they were not bound to apportion the rents and pay them among the different pro indiviso proprietors and their assignees according to their several rights. In like manner, the other pro indiviso proprietors might succeed in maintaining that one of their number was not entitled to have the rents split up—directly drawing his or her share from the tenants—but that the rents should be paid over in one cumulo sum to the person having the authority of all the proprietors to grant a discharge. The Lord Ordinary has so held, and I see no reason to doubt that he is right.

A good deal has been said in the course of the argument as to the views expressed by the Judges in the cases of Cargills v. Muir, 15 S. 408, and Lauson v. Leith and Newcastle Steam Packet Company, 13 D. 175, with reference to what are called joint rights as contrasted with the rights of tenants in common, as they are called in the law of England.

I do not think that it is necessary to give any opinion on those matters. I rather take it to be clear that neither a joint owner nor a tenant in common could in his own name sue either for the whole rent or for his own share of the rent. An instance in our law of joint proprietorship, in the sense of the joint ownership in the law of England, is that of trustees holding a conveyance in ordinary terms for trust purposes. In joint ownership the property is vested in A and B and the survivor. On the death of one of them his right goes necessarily to the survivor. A tenancy in common (as it is called in England), on the other hand, seems to arise where each of the pro indiviso proprietors has a certain share or right in the property, which he may himself dispose of as he thinks fit by a deed granted by himself. It appears to me that the right here held by the creditor in the bond and also by each of the pro indiviso proprietors is a right of this latter kind, because each of the proprietors may dispose of his own share of the estate, and upon his death there is no vesting of his share in the surviving pro indiviso proprietors. The law seems to be the same in England as in this country, that in actions on the contract of lease—as distinguished from actions to protect the property from injury or to vindicate claims of damage because of its wrongful destruction—one pro indiviso proprietor has not a title to sue—Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant, p. 12; Descharmes v. Horsgood, 10 Bing. 526. I assume the Lord Ordinary is right in his general view of the case, but I think he has lost sight of the fact that the defender Mrs Black, in the position in which she stands, has no case on the merits. She conveyed away to the pursuer all her rights. The specialties of this case are that neither the tenants nor the other pro indiviso proprietors object to the action, and I think Mrs Black has averred no right or legitimate interest to do so. Had she raised an action for the rents, or rather her share of them, she would have been successful unless the tenants stated a defence, which they have not done here, and her creditor is not to be put in a worse position than she herself was in.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that Mrs Black has no legitimate interest or right to maintain her defence, which is simply an attempt to prevent effect being given to her own assignation without any legal ground for so doing, and that we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and grant decree to the pursuer in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

LORD ADAM.—I also concur, but I reserve my opinion on the main questions argued until they arise with a joint proprietor or a tenant.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and repelled the defences for Mr and Mrs Black, and granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—JOHN RHIND, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM HENDERSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Sir Charles Pearson—Law. No. 63.
DAVID ROBB AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—
Sol.-Gen. Darling—Salvesen.

Jan. 18, 1889.
Henderson v. Robb.

Title to Sue—Process—Bankruptcy—Cessio—Creditor suing his debtor's—A creditor of a person divested of his estate by decree of cessio raised action to recover his debt against a person alleged to be a debtor to the estate. The action concluded alternatively for payment to the pursuer, or otherwise to the trustee in the cessio, and was founded on averments to the effect that the pursuer was the only unpaid creditor, and that the trustee had declined to move in the matter.

Held that the pursuer had no title to sue.

Observed that the pursuer might have compelled the trustee to give the use of his name on security being found for expenses, or to grant an assignation of his claim against the defenders.

In March 1886 a petition for cessio was presented to the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire against Joseph Robb, tenant of the home farm of Glen-Sheriff of Forfarshire, at the instance of a creditor, and on the 25th of that month decree was pronounced against him, and William Carnegie, farmer, Mains of Coull, was appointed trustee on the estate. William Henderson, crofter, Kirriemuir, lodged in the process an affidavit and claim for £100.

On 29th March 1888, Henderson raised this action against David Robb and David Howe, farmers, and Archibald Smith, solicitor, Kirriemuir, as alleged debtors to the bankrupt estate, for payment of the £100. The conclusions of the summons were alternatively for payment to the pursuer, or to the trustee in the cessio.

No. 63.

Jan. 18, 1889.
Henderson v.
Robb.

The pursuer made the following averments :—The sum concluded for was the amount of an advance made by him to Joseph Robb in 1883. On 1st April 1886 the defenders had, without consulting the trustee in the cessio, sold and disposed of the whole stock and cropping on the farm of Glenquiech. A trust-disposition and assignation executed in April 1884, under which they professed to have done this, was to the prejudice of the whole creditors of Joseph Robb. The pursuer was the only unpaid creditor whose claim existed at the date of the decree of cessio, and was still undischarged. He had repeatedly in vain asked the trustee to take steps against the defenders.

The defenders David Robb and David Howie, who had succeeded Joseph Robb as tenants in the farm in 1884, averred that in April 1884 Joseph Robb had executed a trust-disposition, by which he had, with the consent of his landlord, assigned in their favour the crop, stocking, &c., on the farm in security of a debt due to them by him. They further averred that during the interval between the granting of the deed and the cessio no steps had been taken by Joseph Robb's general creditors, or by the pursuer, to make him bankrupt.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The defenders having, without title, warrant, or authority, intromitted with and sold the crop and stocking which belonged to the said Joseph Robb, and had become vested in the said William Carnegie, as trustee for Robb's creditors, are liable to such creditors for the amount of their claims. (4) The trustee on the estate of the said Joseph Robb having refused to call the defenders to account, his creditors are entitled to do so in their own interest. (5) In the circumstances condescended on, decree ought to be pronounced against the defenders, in terms of one or other of the alternative prayers of the petition, with expenses. (6) In the circumstances condescended on, and the pursuer being the only creditor of the said Joseph Robb, whose claim existed at the date of the decree of cessio, and is still undischarged, he is entitled to a direct decree against the defenders.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer has no title to sue. (2) The prayer of the petition is incompetent, inasmuch as it is indefinite in its terms, and craves alternatively that payment be made to a trustee who is not a party to the action, and who does not even consent to it. (3) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support an action against the defenders. (4) The defenders not being obligants to the pursuer, and having no connection with the pursuer's claim, the action should be dismissed, with expenses. (5) The trustee on Joseph Robb's cessioned estate is the only person entitled to an accounting from the defenders under the deed in their favour, and he is not a party to this action.

On 14th June 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) found that the pursuer had not stated a relevant case on which a decree could be granted; therefore to that extent sustained the preliminary pleas, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed.

Argued for the pursuer ;—There were alternative conclusions here,—1st, for payment to the pursuer directly ; and, 2d, for payment to the trustee in the cessio. The first conclusion was supported by averments—which were the specialties of this case—to the effect that the pursuer was the only unpaid creditor, and therefore alone interested, and that he had failed to induce the trustee to move in the matter. These averments made the case one in which payment should be made directly to the pursuer. The defenders suggested that the pursuer had no title to sue unless he succeeded in obtaining from the trustee the use of his name or an assignation of his right and title to maintain the claim. Such a form of process, however, would lead to unnecessary circuitry, and only create expenses. It might have been different if there had been outside creditors. That might have made it right for the Court to take the case on the second alternative conclusion, and to order payment to the trustee with a view to distribution among the whole creditors. In the absence of other competing claims, however, the objection to the pursuer's suing directly was purely technical. No doubt it had been laid down that neither a general residuary legatee<sup>1</sup> nor a beneficiary under a trust-deed<sup>2</sup> could sue a debtor of the testator or of the trust-estate directly, but that did not apply in a case of bankruptcy. As regarded the second alternative conclusion, the trustee had an undoubted title to sue for payment of the value of the property carried off by the defenders. Even if it were held that the pursuer must keep the trustee indemnitas in return for the use of his name, there was no averment here that the pursuer was vergens ad inopiam, or was unable to pay the expenses of the process.

No. 63.
Jan. 18, 1889.
Henderson v.
Robb.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer had no title to sue under either of the alternative conclusions. Under the first, he was just suing directly an alleged debtor of his debtor, which was incompetent. Under the second, he had failed to take advantage of the two well-recognised forms of process<sup>3</sup> for suing where there was a decree of cessio on the estate which he sought to attach. He had neither obtained from the trustee the use of his name nor an assignation to his right and title to maintain the action. He said the trustee declined to move; but he could have compelled him to do so, provided he found security to keep him indemnitas in the expenses of the process.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer in this case is the alleged creditor of Joseph Robb, tenant of the home farm of Glenquiech, for the sum of £100, being money advanced to Robb in the year 1883. If Robb had remained solvent, this action would have been raised against him, but unfortunately he became insolvent. A process of cessio was raised against him in March 1886, and on the 25th of that month decree was pronounced against him, and William Carnegie was appointed trustee on the estate.

This action is directed neither against the pursuer's original debtor nor against the trustee in the cessio, but against certain persons who are said to have intromitted with the crop and stocking on the farm, and to be liable to account therefor.

Now, of course the only person who can call them to account for the debt must be the trustee in the cessio. The original debtor is divested, and the decree of cessio has the effect of vesting the estate in Carnegie, not indeed to the full extent of a statutory sequestration, but still it gives to the trustee an active title to recover the debts of the insolvent estate. The pursuer, however, says that the trustee will not move in the matter, and he maintains that he is therefore entitled to raise the action directly himself, and he says he is the only unpaid creditor.

I am of opinion that the pursuer has no title to sue. He is doing that which has been found over and over again to be incompetent, trying to sue his debtor's

<sup>1</sup> Hinton v. Connell's Trustees, July 6, 1883, 10 R. 1110.

<sup>2</sup> Rae v. Meek, July 19, 1888, 15 R. 1033, per Lord Shand, 1050-1051.

<sup>3</sup> Sprot v. Paul, July 5, 1828, 6 S. 1083; Spence v. Gibson, Dec. 13, 1832, 11 S. 212; Gray v. Fraser, Feb. 6, 1850, 12 D. 684, per Lord Moncreiff, p. 686, 22 Scot. Jur. 238; Teulon v. Seaton, &c., May 27, 1885, 11 R. 971.

No. 63.

Ján. 18, 1889.
Henderson v.
Robb.

debtor. The defenders, if the original debtor had been solvent, would have been debtors to him, and now that he is insolvent they are debtors to the trustee in the cessio, and the pursuer can have no direct action against anyone except the trustee. The remedy of the pursuer is to claim against the estate, which, I suppose, he has done, and then if the trustee declines to sue the alleged debtor, to ask him to put him in a position to do so by lending him his name or by granting him an assignation. That of course the trustee will not be bound to do except upon condition of being kept free of the costs of the litigation, and upon that being done, the trustee, if not willing, may be compelled to put the pursuer in a position to insist on the claim.

Nothing of that kind, however, has been done here. The pursuer sues in his own name, and without any assignation. He is therefore simply suing his debtor's debtor.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion, and from the nature of the case I regret that I am obliged to come to that conclusion. The pursuer's debt is not seriously disputed in the record, and he has an interest to endeavour to recover that debt. Unfortunately, however, he has no title to sue, for the trustee is the party whose right and duty it is to recover whatever is due to the bankrupt estate. Your Lordship has very clearly explained the circumstances in which the pursuer might have been allowed to prosecute his claim. His course was to have called on the trustee to take proceedings, and if he refused, to ask him for the use of his name, or for an assignation to the right to maintain the action, on condition of keeping the trustee free of the costs of the litigation. That course, however, was not taken, and I am of opinion that the pursuer has at present no title to sue.

LORD SHAND.—I do not think it was suggested in the argument that we have any decision bearing directly on the question here raised, which as a question of title to sue is I think an important one. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that there are clear general principles which exclude the pursuer's action on the ground of no title. As Lord Mure has pointed out, one would desire, if possible, to sustain the pursuer's title, because, in the first place, I do not think the argument against the relevancy of the action has any foundation. The action would be relevant if it had been brought by the trustee. And, in the second place, considerable expense has been incurred in reaching this point of the litigation. It is further said that the pursuer is the only unpaid creditor and if so, he has the material interest to have the question tried, if it be assumed that his averments are true. But though the case in this view looks like one of hardship, I am afraid that if the Court were to yield to that consideration this might hereafter be cited as one of those hard cases which make bad law. We should be sanctioning a principle which might lead to confusion in the administration of insolvent and bankrupt estates, and to the pursuit of claims by creditors who have no real title seeking to have their actions maintained on specialties. It is, I think, clearly safer and better to lay down a rule or to adhere to a rule which rests on general principles.

Now, the material fact of the case is this, that Robb's estate was transferred under a decree of cessio to Carnegie, the trustee in the cessio, and that he is consequently now the person in right of the administration of the estate. If Robb has any debts due to him Carnegie is vested with the right and duty of recovering these debts. The creditors of Robb have no right to do so.

because Carnegie is vested with the sole title to the estate. The petitioner has raised his summons, with alternative conclusions that the money shall be paid to himself, or otherwise to Robb's trustee. But even as regards the second alternative the trustee is the only person with a title to maintain the demand. It would be very embarrassing if separate creditors were entitled to raise the question. An alleged debtor of a bankrupt would be liable to an action at the instance of any creditor of his creditor, which cannot be allowed. The alleged debtor, moreover, is not the proper person to discuss the question whether the pursuer is really a creditor of the bankrupt. That is a question with the trustee. Farther, a debtor is entitled to say that he must have the trustee to deal with as being a person with means, and that he shall not have to litigate with a third party.

No. 63.

Jan. 18, 1889.
Henderson v.
Robb.

There is a well-settled rule as to how parties should proceed in such circumstances, which is very well illustrated in the two cases of Sprot v. Paul (6 S. 1083), and Spence v. Gibson (11 S. 212). In both cases the Court held that the trustee was bound to give his name, if required to do so, on security being found for his expenses, or to give an assignation to the claim, which, of course, where the claim is not purchased, may be made subject to the condition that any sums found due should ultimately come into the trust-estate.

That being so, I think there is nothing more to be said, and I agree that this creditor cannot be allowed to move on his own account.

The case is analogous to that of a beneficiary on a trust-estate. The trustees are the parties to sue for debts due to the trust-estate. The beneficiary has no direct title. If the trustee refuses to sue, his title in certain circumstances may be acquired by the beneficiary, either by the use of his name or by an assignation to his right and title to maintain the action. The beneficiary is not entitled to sue directly for payment of a debt due not to himself but to the trust-estate. This view is borne out by the opinion of your Lordship in the case of Hinton, 10 R. 1110, and I have only repeated what I said on this latter point in the case of Rae v. Meek (15 R. pp. 1050 and 1051). I accordingly agree in thinking that we must dismiss the action.

LORD ADAM.—I concur in thinking that it is very clear on principle, and is perfectly settled, that a creditor cannot directly sue his debtor's debtor. Lord Shand has mentioned some of the reasons why that is the law. It is equally clear that if such a person wishes to recover sums of money due to his debtor he must proceed by arrestment and furthcoming. Then much less can a direct action be allowed where the pursuer only alleges himself to be a creditor, and his claim, as in this case, has never been sustained or adjudicated upon. It is simply a case of an alleged creditor of A suing B, an alleged debtor of A. I must say I think that such an action is contrary to all principle. If that is so, how does the fact of the debtor's estate being under cessio give that creditor a right to sue a debtor which he had not before? I think it would require something very clear to bring about that result, whether it is in a sequestration or in a cessio. The bankrupt estate is vested in the trustee, and he is the only person who has a title to sue a debtor to the estate.

If the trustee refuses to take action there are quite well-known means by which the creditor should proceed. He can demand the use of the trustee's name, and if the trustee refuses to give it he can be compelled to do so on condition of being kept indemnitas as regards the expenses by the creditor who

No. 63. desires to sue the action. How far that entered into the consideration of the course pursued by the creditor here I do not know. The creditor's other course is to get an assignation.

Jan. 18, 1889.
Henderson v.
Robb.

Now, where you have two such well-recognised courses, which the pursuer might have known, although I regret the expense which has been incurred, I entirely concur that to sustain his title to sue would be pessimi exempli.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor appealed against, sustained the first plea in law stated by the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.

FODD, SIMPSON, & MARWICK, W.S.—IRONS, ROBERTS, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 64.

MRS HANNAH GOW STEWART, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—C. S. Dickson.

MRS ANNE CAMPBELL AND OTHERS, Defenders.

DUNCAN BUCHANAN, Defender (Respondent).—Watt.

Jan. 19, 1889.
Stewart v.
Campbell.

Lease—Obligation to repair buildings—Retention of rent—Liquid and illiquid—Acquiescence.—A farm was let from year to year under a lease, which was terminable on either side by written notice six months before the term of Whitsunday, and in which the landlord undertook to put the existing buildings into complete repair. The landlord spent a considerable sum on repairs on the entry of the tenants, who continued in occupation for five years, when the lease terminated. In the third year they asked for certain new buildings, but the request was refused. They paid the rent for four and a-half years without reservation of any claim against the landlord, and left the farm at the end of five years. In an action by the landlord to recover the last half year's rent, the tenants maintained that they were entitled to an abatement of that rent or compensation for loss sustained by them during the whole of the currency of the lease from the pursuer's failure to put the buildings into complete repair. The Court repelled the defences, and granted decree.

Munro v. M'Geoch, Nov. 15, 1888, ante, p. 93, distinguished.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

BY minutes of lease, dated 4th June 1883, Mrs Hannah Gow Stewart, proprietrix of the island of Little Colonsay, Argyllshire, let to Mrs Anne Buchanan or Campbell and her son, Duncan Campbell, All and Whole the island of Little Colonsay, at a rent of £55, beginning the first term's payment at Martinmas 1883, under, inter alia, the following conditions:—
"1st, The lease is to be for the period of one year from Whitsunday 1883, and from year to year thereafter, unless terminated by written notice on either side six months before the term of Whitsunday." "3d, The proprietrix agrees to put the whole buildings on the island let into a thorough state of repair, and subject to this obligation on her part,—the tenants accept the whole buildings as in good and sufficient repair." "5th, The tenants bind themselves to remove from the said subjects hereby let at any term of Whitsunday on receiving at least six months' previous notice either from the proprietrix or from her factor or agent." "6th, Duncan Buchanan binds himself and his heirs, executors, and successors as cautioners for the rent."

The tenants entered into possession under the lease at Whitsunday 1883, and continued to possess till Whitsunday 1888, when they voluntarily removed from the farm. They paid the rents for the period to Martinmas 1887, but at Whitsunday 1888 they refused to pay the last half year's rent on the ground that Mrs Stewart had failed to implement her obligation under the 3d condition of the lease—to put the buildings into a thorough state of repair.

Mrs Stewart raised this action against the tenants and the cautioner under the lease for payment of £27, 10s., as the last half year's rent, and averred that she had, at the entry of the tenants, spent between £100 and £105 in the complete repair of the only dwelling-house on the island. She further denied that the tenants had at any time complained to her regarding the condition of the buildings.

No. 64.

Jan. 19, 1889.
Stewart v.
Campbell.

The defenders having assigned their claims to Duncan Buchanan, their cautioner, he defended the action, and averred;—"The dwelling-house was not habitable at the beginning of the lease, and the steadings and other buildings on the island were, from the commencement of the lease, and throughout its continuance, in a very bad state, the barn, stable, byre, and cart-shed being roofless. Mrs Campbell and Lachlan Campbell (her husband) therefore repeatedly called upon the pursuer to implement her obligation under the lease, by having the steadings and other buildings put into a thorough state of repair. The pursuer, however, notwithstanding these requests, failed to have these repaired in any way. The said repairs were necessary and indispensable for the beneficial occupation of the farm, and were to have been executed before the tenants took possession, but pursuer did not give the tenants full possession, and did not deliver the subjects in the state agreed on. In consequence of the pursuer's failure to have the whole buildings put in a thorough state of repair, the tenants suffered loss and damage during their occupancy to an extent of not less than £80, no part of which has ever been made good by pursuer. . . . They have assigned their claims against pursuer to the defender. The defender is entitled to plead all defences competent to the tenants."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The objection regarding the state of the buildings not being open to the cautioner, the defences should be repelled as irrelevant.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The obligation by the pursuer in the lease "to put the whole buildings on the island let into a thorough state of repair" being an inherent condition of the lease under which the defender Buchanan signed as cautioner, and the same not having been implemented, the said defender is not liable. (3) The defender Buchanan, as cautioner, being entitled to plead all defences pleadable by the principal debtors, is entitled to set off against the claim for rent the loss and damage sustained by the tenants through the pursuer's failure to implement her obligations in the lease; et separatim, in virtue of the assignation in his favour by the tenants, he is entitled to set off the said loss and damage against the rent claimed. (4) The pursuer having failed to implement her agreement with the tenants to put the steading and other buildings in repair, whereby the tenants were deprived of the beneficial use and enjoyment of the subjects let to an extent exceeding the sum sued for, the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

On 13th December 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) allowed to the pursuer and the defender Duncan Buchanan a proof of their averments.

The pursuer reclaimed.

The pursuer lodged a copy of correspondence with Lachlan Campbell, from which it appeared that on 25th August 1885 the latter had written demanding that new houses should be erected for him. There was also lodged a certificate of repairs executed on the dwelling-house of the farm by the pursuer in 1883 amounting to £112.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defences fell to be repelled. The defender was here pleading an illiquid claim of damages as against a liquid claim of rent. The lease being from year to year, the tenants might have quitted the farm at the end of any year, or they might have done what was done by the tenant in Munro v. M'Geochs,<sup>1</sup> who protested from <sup>1</sup> Nov. 15, 1888, 16 R. 93.

No. 64.

Jan. 19, 1889.
Stewart v.
Campbell.

the outset against the condition of the buildings, and only paid the first half year's rent on protest until the question should be settled. Here, however, the tenant had, without such protest, and without reserving the present claim, paid the rent for four and a-half years. The only request which appeared from the correspondence to have been made to the pursuer was one for new buildings, which was quite outside the landlord's obligation in the lease.

Argued for the defender;—In respect the pursuer had not fulfilled her obligation to put the whole buildings into proper repair, the tenants had suffered damage in excess of her claim for rent. At all events, they are entitled to set off the proportion of loss suffered during the last year against the claim for the last half year's rent.<sup>1</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case of a lease for one year, but the parties contemplated that it should be prolonged from year to year. That is to say, the tenant may continue as a yearly tenant according as both he and the landlord agree. Either of them may give notice to the other of the termination of the lease, and the right of the other is at an end, and the tenant binds himself “to remove from the said subjects hereby let at any term of Whitsunday, on receiving at least six months' previous notice from the proprietrix, or from her factor or agent,” and so forth.

Now, the tenant voluntarily removed from the farm, having been in possession for five years from Whitsunday 1883. Of course, there had become due during that period the rent for five years, or ten half years' rent, and nine of these were paid by the tenant quite regularly, and apparently without any objection that he had not been given possession of the entire subjects, or that they were not in the condition in which it was promised by the landlord they should be. Now, however, after the tenant has left the farm, and after his occupation is at an end, the defender for the first time sets up the plea that the farm buildings were not properly repaired, in terms of the landlord's obligation. I think, in these circumstances, the plea cannot be sustained.

In the case of Munro (ante, p. 93), which is the last of the cases on this subject, the facts were all the other way. In the first place, it was a nineteen years' lease, and the tenants were not entitled to put an end to it. But then the tenant protested from the outset against the condition of the buildings, and did not pay the first half year's rent, but only a sum to account, and that went on till the question came to be tried here. There was nothing there like acquiescence or abandonment of the claim. On the contrary, there was a continuous demand by the tenant on the landlord from the time he paid the rent that the buildings should be put into repair.

I can hardly conceive two cases more in contrast than that case and the present.

But further, if we glance at the correspondence, it is plain that the demand was not justified by the terms of the lease. It is not made until 25th August 1885, and then the demand is for new houses. But the lease contains no obligation except one to repair existing buildings. The demand, then, such as it was, was during the currency of the lease, and was not in terms of the landlord's obligation. I am of opinion then, on the whole matter, that we cannot sustain the defences.

<sup>1</sup> Graham v. Gordon, June 16, 1843, 5 D. 1207, per Lord Fullerton; Munro v. McGeochs, supra.

LORD MURE.—This is a very special case. The lease is practically one from year to year, with a power to either party to put an end to it on six months' notice. The tenant entered into possession of the subjects in 1883, and continued in possession till 1885, paying rent during that time apparently without objection, and without giving any notice of his intention to leave the farm. In 1885, however, he writes to his landlord demanding, not that the buildings should be repaired, but that new buildings should be put up. This is refused, but notwithstanding he continues to occupy the farm, and goes on paying rent for two and a-half years more, when he leaves the farm, and hands over to his cautioner any right he may have to demand damages for the loss he may have sustained through the buildings not being repaired and renewed, in order that this claim may be founded on in defence to any action which may be brought for payment of the rent due at the termination of the lease. I am of opinion that this demand, in the admitted facts of this case, cannot now be maintained. The certificate produced shews that repairs were made on the offices at a considerable cost at the time this tenant entered upon the lease. The rent is paid apparently without objection, and without the tenant making any reservation in the receipts of his alleged right to recover damages, which he ought unquestionably to have done, under such a lease as the present, if he intended to endeavour to raise up a claim of that description.

No. 64.

Jan. 19, 1889.
Stewart v.
Campbell.

LORD SHAND.—The third head of the lease is in these terms :—"The proprietrix agrees to put the whole buildings on the island let into a thorough state of repair." That is an obligation which fell to be implemented by the landlord at the beginning of the lease, and I cannot doubt that the tenant would have been entitled to retain the rent, or at least a part of the rent, until his landlord did so. Now, if either a portion of the subjects of a lease is withheld, or the buildings are not put into the condition stipulated, so that the tenant in effect really does not get the full use of the subjects let, the tenant may retain a portion of the rent, and claim for abatement. In the latter case, and it may be in both cases, the mode of making the claim may be by stating the amount of damages. The claim is substantially a claim for abatement, although the damage caused to the tenant may be the measure of the claim. I cannot doubt therefore that, if in the first year of the lease the tenant in this case had intimated, as was done in the case of Munro, that the repairs were insufficient, and this was the fact, he would have been entitled to retain part of the rent, and so for the second, third, and fourth years.

The peculiarity of the case, however, appears to be that a large sum was expended by the landlord during the first year, and the tenant paid the rent down to the end of the ninth half year without making any claim for an abatement. The only writing which we have indicates that the claim made in regard to buildings was a request for new buildings, with a view to the tenant's going on with his lease for a period of some endurance. There is no retention by the tenant of part of the rents, and no indication that he considered that the terms of the lease had not been fulfilled. I am quite clear that the notion of sustaining a claim of damages for the whole period is out of the question.

The only point of any nicety is, whether in lieu of £80 the tenant can now claim an abatement of £16, and make it applicable to his occupation of the subjects for the last year. With reference to that the obligation is peculiar. The lease is one from year to year, and by tacit relocation the obligations of the

No. 64.

Jan. 19, 1889.
Stewart v.
Campbell.

parties to each other may be the same in the last as in the first year of the tenant's occupation. But this particular obligation is of a peculiar kind. It is plain that five years before there was an obligation to put the subjects in order. It seems to be also clear that in the first year there was outlay by the landlord on the buildings. In these circumstances, and no objection having been made to the payment of the rent for four years, it would have required very clear notice on the part of the tenant that he held the obligation to have been unfulfilled by the landlord in order to raise a claim now. The tenant now says the obligation should apply to the fifth year of the lease, but I think he is barred by his actings and the absence of any earlier demand from demanding any abatement even on the last year.

The result is that I think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and the defences repelled.

LORD ADAM.—It does not appear to me that this claim on the part of the defender is one of abatement of rent at all. It is a claim that the tenant shall not be called upon to pay any portion of the last half year's rent in respect of loss and damage sustained during the whole of the currency of the lease. If the claim was one of abatement of rent, the loss for each previous year would have been set off against the rent for that year. That would have been the proper way of stating the claim. But that is not so here, for each portion was paid without reservation, and no claim for abatement was made, and so matters went on until the last half year, and, as I have said before, no claim is set up to retain the portion of rent corresponding to that extent of the farm of which the tenant was not in possession in that half year. The claim is that the whole loss incurred during the whole currency of the lease shall be set off against that which is, I think, a proper claim for rent for the last half year. It is an attempt to set off an illiquid claim of damages against a liquid claim for rent. That being in my opinion the meaning of the record, I am of opinion that we must recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, repel the defences, and grant decree against the defender.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, repelled the defences, and decerned against the defender Duncan Buchanan in terms of the libel.

D. MACLACHLAN, S.S.C.—CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 65.

Jan. 24, 1889.
Mollison v.
Noltie.

HUGH MOLLISON, Pursuer (Respondent).—J. C. Thomson—Orr.
JAMES NOLTIE, Defender (Appellant).—C. J. Guthrie.

Contract—Gaming—Stocks—Contract to sell stocks to be purchased.—Two persons entered into a joint adventure to sell stocks in name of one of them. They did not possess the stock in which they intended to deal, but they sold it, intending to buy it in before delivery should be required by the purchaser. The market rose, and the account was continued for some time, and then closed at a loss. Held that the contract was not as between the joint adventurers a gaming transaction, and that one of the joint adventurers, who had paid the whole loss, was entitled to recover payment of half of it from the other.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen-
shire.

ON 16th January 1886, Hugh Mollison and James Noltie, both residing in Aberdeen, agreed to enter into a joint adventure in the sale and purchase of Grand Trunk Railway of Canada First Preference Stock, and they instructed Alexander S. Sutherland, stockbroker, to sell five hundred shares of that stock for them on the Aberdeen Stock Exchange. Neither Mollison nor Noltie was then possessed of such stock. Sutherland sold it for them at 54 $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, the transaction being done in the name of Mollison. Thereafter the market for that stock rose, so that it could not be bought in and transferred to the purchaser at the settling day with profit to the joint adventure, and the account was "continued" till June 1886, when Mollison told the broker to close the account, and stock was bought in to be transferred to the purchaser. The price at which it was bought in was 63 $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. The loss on the transaction amounted, including both commissions and differences, to £49, 15s. 11d., which sum Mollison paid to the broker.

Mollison sued Noltie in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen for £24, 17s. 11d., as his share of this loss.

The defender stated that he and the pursuer had been in the habit of making joint adventures, and speculating on the rise and fall of the market; further, that he had told Sutherland to close the account at a time when no loss would have been caused—namely, March 1886—but that the account had been continued without his knowledge.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having agreed to enter into said joint adventure with the pursuer, and having done so, defender is bound to bear his share of the loss arising therefrom. (2) The pursuer having paid the whole of said loss is entitled to recover the half thereof from the defender.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The transaction being of the nature of a gambling transaction the action should be dismissed.

After proof, the Sheriff-substitute (W. A. Brown) sustained the defender's fifth plea in law, and dismissed the action.*

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, found "it proved that on the joint employment of the pursuer and defender, A. S. Sutherland, stockbroker, sold on their account certain railway stocks, with the result that they became indebted to him in the sum of £49, 15s. 11d. for commission and differences," and found in law "that the pursuer having paid this sum to the said A. S. Sutherland, is entitled to recover from the defender his share thereof, being the sum sued for; therefore repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

* "NOTE.—It appears to me that there is no room for doubt as to the nature of the transaction or joint adventure on which the parties embarked, and indeed no attempt was made to conceal that. They were simply speculating on the rise or fall of the market, and the broker whom they employed put things in shape to admit of that purpose being carried out as he had done before. It is not suggested that as between the seller and purchaser of the stock in question the transaction was not perfectly genuine, for that was not made fictitious by the person to whom the stock originally fell to be transferred again selling for delivery at next settling-day. One side, indeed, only of the transactions is produced, but there is no room for doubt that the other would have been forthcoming had it been called for. The broker had established complete privity of contract, rendering himself liable to his constituent on the one hand and entitling him to recover differences and commission so long as he did not mix himself up as principal. But inter se the pursuer and defender were engaged in a purely gambling transaction, and it is a well-settled rule of law that Courts will not interfere in such circumstances to give either of them redress when they fall out. Nor do I think that this doctrine is in the least affected by the fact that under the joint adventure the right to profit and the liability to loss were precisely ascertained, and that in these respects the parties were on an equal footing, for nothing but chance lay at the root of the bargain which is sought to be enforced. . . ."

No. 65.

Jan. 24, 1889.
Mollison v.
Noltie.

The defender appealed, and argued;—(1) The transaction was clearly of a gambling nature, and the pursuer's case was that one of the losers in a wagering speculation was entitled to recover half his loss from another. Money advanced or deposited for gaming purposes could not be recovered by an action,<sup>1</sup> for there was no right of relief among wrong-doers.<sup>2</sup> In the case of Higginson,<sup>3</sup> a "tipster" was held to have no action to recover part of the defendant's winnings on a horse-race in which he had advised him as to the winning horse. That case was decided on the Act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 109, sec. 18, but that statute merely expressed what was the common law of Scotland. (2) On the proof, the defender had directed the account to be closed, and it was continued against his will. He could not therefore be made liable for the loss. The case was distinguishable from Newton v. Cribbes,<sup>4</sup> because in that case the customer got accounts shewing that the account was being continued and that loss would fall upon him.

Argued for the respondent;—The transaction was not a bet, but a bona fide joint adventure. There was a true purchaser, to whom the broker was bound, and to whom the stock had been delivered. There was no good reason why the parties who had, through the broker, become bound to him, should not divide the loss. But it was sufficient that there was nothing illegal in a joint adventure to sell stock, purchasing it, if need be, before the day of sale. The case of Foulds<sup>5</sup> settled that the employment of a broker to sell stock merely in the hope that the market would fall was not gaming and wagering. The law was the same in England.<sup>6</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two points in this case; one as to the evidence, the other as to the law. With regard to the former of these points, the Sheriff says in his note that the defender has failed to make out the allegation that he gave the broker instructions to close the account in March, and that he was not aware that the account had been continued, as it afterwards turned out to have been. On this point I agree with the Sheriff.

The other question is the important one as to the law. It is the question whether the defender is justified in resisting payment of his share of the sum paid to the broker by the pursuer, on the ground that the transaction was a gambling transaction, and that the Court will not listen to a party who comes forward asking powers to enforce an alleged right arising out of such a gaming transaction. Now, having given the subject the best consideration I can, I think that the Sheriff is right on this point also. The broker, Sutherland, was instructed to sell a certain number of shares for both Mollison and Noltie. It is not disputed that at that time neither Mollison nor Noltie possessed the scrip, and that the transaction was a speculation. They both hoped that the market would fall, and that they would therefore make money by purchasing the stock at a lower price before it required to be delivered. In this they were

<sup>1</sup> Wordsworth v. Pettigrew, 1799, M. 9524; O'Connell v. Russell, Nov. 25, 1864, 3 Macph. 89; Calder v. Stevens, July 20, 1871, 9 Macph. 1074; Risk v. Auld and Guild, May 27, 1881, 8 R. 729 (Lord Young); M'Kinnell v. Robinson, 1838, 3 M. & W. 434.

<sup>2</sup> Bell's Prin. (8th ed.) sec. 550, cf. secs. 36, 37; Merryweather v. Nixon, 8 T. R. 186.

<sup>3</sup> Higginson v. Simpson, 1877, L. R., 2 C. P. D. 76.

<sup>4</sup> Newton v. Cribbes, Feb. 9, 1884, 11 R. 554.

<sup>5</sup> Foulds v. Thomson and Burn, June 10, 1857, 19 D. 803.

<sup>6</sup> Addison on Contracts, p. 1157 (8th ed.); Thacker v. Hardy, 1878, 4 Q. B. 685.

unfortunate, for the market rose. Now, I think this transaction was an ordinary and bona fide one on the Stock Exchange, whereby a broker was instructed to sell, and did sell, the shares to a third party. Mollison and Noltie were bound to deliver the stock, and did, after the transaction had been continued over, procure and deliver it. I cannot hold that that is a transaction struck at as a gaming contract. There were not two parties wagering, and a wager requires two parties. It cannot be said that the two speculators, Mollison and Noltie, were wagering with the purchaser, for he was an ordinary purchaser offering to buy stock and intending to obtain it, and not in any sense engaged in a wager. Was the broker then engaged in wagering about the stock? He was not, for his whole interest in the matter was to obtain his commission, and to be kept by his employers free from personal liability to the purchaser.

No. 65.

Jan. 24, 1889.
Mollison v.
Noltie.

We have, then, only Mollison and Noltie left, and they could not be wagering with each other, because under no circumstances could the one be better or worse off by the event than the other. I think the transaction comes within the rule of the case of Foulds, and a passage in the opinion of Lord Wood in that case is entirely applicable to this one. Lord Wood says (19 D. 816)—“To wagering or gaming there must be two parties” (and of course he means two opposing parties.) “The provisions of the statute are all framed on that footing. The parties must come together directly or through their brokers. In contracts within the statute there must be opposite parties, and there can be no innocent ignorant third parties. If a party or his broker go to another party or his broker and arrange or make a contract for the sale and purchase of shares, but where they are merely to pay the differences according to the rise and fall of the market, that would be gaming within the statute. But in the present case there is no evidence that any one of the contracts forming the transaction in the account libelled was a contract for payment of differences, and to be implemented by such payment. On the contrary, it appears that the transactions were with a great variety of brokers, acting for an equal variety of constituents, and, as far as seen, every transaction was a real bona fide onerous purchase or sale from or to a party to whom a personal obligation was undertaken to fulfil the contract, which he was entitled to enforce, and in which the responsibility of the pursuer as broker for the defenders did not terminate until the stocks bought or sold were either delivered or paid for.” I think that with the single difference that in that case there was a variety of different transactions, which is not the case here, that paragraph of Lord Wood’s opinion exactly applies. I have no hesitation in agreeing with the Sheriff.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the Sheriff-substitute has somewhat misapprehended the case, not the facts so much as the law, for I see that he says—“It is not suggested that as between the seller and purchaser of the stock in question the transaction was not perfectly genuine, for that was not made fictitious by the person to whom the stock originally fell to be transferred again selling for delivery at next settling-day.” No doubt the parties to this action were both speculating on a fall of the stock. That was because they were both selling it. But, unfortunately for them, the stock rose and they could not buy in the stock save at a loss, which, as to them both, is only £49, for to that extent, taking into account the commission of the broker, the stock rose before they bought it. I think it was a genuine transaction. The purchaser of the stock demanded it and was entitled to get it. Well, he

No. 65.

Jan. 24, 1889.
Mollison v.
Noltie.

obtained the stock, and one of the adventurers had to pay the whole £49 which they lost. Why should not the other pay his share? It was a genuine transaction. The buyer would, if the broker had not bought in the stock, have been entitled to sue for the difference of the price between the price at which it had been sold to him and the price he would have had to pay for it, and the broker had involved himself in liability. Now, the pursuer has paid to the broker both his own share and the defender's. The speculation might have been one about any other property—a house, for example—as much as about stock. The buyer, if it was not delivered to him, would have been entitled to acquire it at the expense of those who undertook to sell it to him. I think that if one of the sellers paid that loss, it is clear that the other must pay him his share. I think the matter is well expressed in the opinion of Mr Justice Lindley, in the case of Thacker v. Hardie, 4 Q. B. D. 685, which was a case of pure speculation. His Lordship held,—“Firstly, that the defendant was a speculator, and the plaintiff knew him to be so. Secondly, that the defendant employed the plaintiff to speculate for him on the Stock Exchange. Thirdly, that the defendant knew or must be taken to have known that in order to carry out the transactions the plaintiff would have to enter into contracts to buy or sell as the case might be.” Now, I think there was here no wagering. It was reprehensible speculation no doubt, but it was carried on (and there was no other way of carrying it on) by real contracts, which the buyer could and did enforce against the joint speculators to their loss. I think the pursuer is entitled, having paid the whole of that loss, to recover the half of it from the defender.

On the question of fact as to the broker's instructions to carry over, I agree that the Sheriff's judgment should not be altered.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

LORD LEE.—The question is whether the ground of the pursuer's action is sponsio ludicra? I do not think it clear that that question is answered by the mere consideration that the purchaser from the pursuer and defender was a real purchaser. I go upon this consideration, that according to the statements of both parties upon record, the transaction in which they were engaged was a real and lawful joint adventure in stocks, and not a joint adventure in gaming or in staking money upon a chance.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—“Find in fact (1) that on the joint employment of the pursuer and defender, Mr A. S. Sutherland, stockbroker, on 16th January 1886, sold on their account five hundred shares of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada First Preference Stock, and that the said stock was subsequently purchased in order to implement said contract of sale, and was delivered to and paid for by the purchaser: (2) That in respect of said transaction the pursuer and defender became indebted to the said A. S. Sutherland in the sum of £49, 5s. 11d. for commission and differences on said contract of sale: Find in law that the pursuer, having paid the said sum to the said A. S. Sutherland, is entitled to recover from the defender his share thereof, being the sum sued for: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against, . . . and decern.”

STUART & STUART, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

MISSSES JANET AND HELEN CURROR, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—

D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

MRS MARGARET WALKER AND OTHERS (Walker's Trustees).—Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Muirhead—Blair.

No. 66.

Jan. 25, 1889.
Currors v.
Walker's
Trustees.

Trust—Agent and Olient—Liability of law-agent.—Held that it was no part of the duty of a law-agent appointed to be factor and law-agent to the trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement to volunteer his advice to the trustees that a loan made by the testator on personal security was not such an investment of the trust funds as they were entitled to retain, and that therefore he was not liable for loss resulting from their retaining the investment.

On 30th January 1888 Miss Janet and Miss Helen Curror, the representatives of Mr John Curror of Nivingston, raised an action against Mrs Margaret Walker and others, as trustees of Mr John Walker, W.S., concluding for payment of £5479, 18s. 10d.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

The pursuers stated that they were sole representatives of Mr John Curror. They then averred;—(Cond. 2) "The late William Kennedy, W.S., Edinburgh, died on 23d April 1877, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 10th June 1876, and codicil thereto dated 20th April 1877, by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to the late Adam Curror, Esq. of the Lee, and his brother, the said John Curror, in trust for the purposes therein mentioned. He also nominated and appointed his said trustees to be his executors." (Cond. 3) "By his said trust-disposition and settlement, which is holograph, Mr Kennedy conveyed his whole estate and effects to the said Adam Curror and John Curror," in trust for certain purposes, which necessitated the trust being kept up for a considerable time. "The testator further recommended his trustees to employ John Macara, solicitor, who was then his clerk, to act as agent in the management and winding up of his affairs. By the said codicil, the testator, after expressing his wishes in regard to the place of his interment, and the retention of his house in Edinburgh for five years, gave the following directions in regard to the agency of the trust:—'I wish John Walker, W.S., to be factor and agent for my trustees and executors, and I recommend him to employ my present assistant, Mr John Macara, solicitor, . . .'" (Cond. 4) "After Mr Kennedy's funeral, Mr Walker took possession of all his papers, and he also had possession of his house in Edinburgh, in which his business had been conducted, retaining the services of Mr Macara and Mr Kennedy's staff of clerks for the purpose of winding up his business. Mr Adam Curror and Mr John Curror accepted the trust, and a meeting of trustees (the first meeting) was held on 1st May 1877, when Mr Walker was formally authorised to act as factor and law-agent to the trust, to make up the trustees' title to the trust-estate, and to do whatever might be necessary for the confirmation of the executors and in regard to the general management of the estate, and to make all necessary payments and disbursements therefor. An inventory of the estate (amounting to £91,918, 15s. 1d.) was then given up, and confirmation of the executors was obtained on 12th June 1877. Thereafter, the affairs of the trust were entirely conducted by Mr Walker, who only called a meeting of trustees when it was necessary for him to obtain their signatures. The Messrs Curror having full confidence in Mr Walker, and especially looking to the fact that he had been specially nominated law-agent of the trust by Mr Kennedy, trusted to him, as they were entitled to do, to advise them and keep them right in all questions of law connected with the administration of the trust." (Cond. 5) "The Messrs Curror were upon terms of the greatest intimacy with Mr Kennedy, and he was their

No. 66.

Jan. 25, 1889.
Curros v.
Walker's
Trustees.

law-agent. Mr Kennedy had frequently, during the fifteen or twenty years prior to his death, advanced considerable sums of money to Mr Adam Curror, and in December 1876 the latter was indebted to him in the sum of £4000. Accordingly Mr Adam Curror granted to Mr Kennedy, on 13th December 1876, a bond and assignation in security for the sum of £4000, whereby he bound himself to repay the said sum to Mr Kennedy, and in security thereof assigned to him £2400 City of Glasgow Bank stock, then of the value of £5472, and £1000 Union Bank of Scotland stock, then of the value of £2800. It was, however, arranged that Mr Kennedy should not intimate the assignation of the said bank stock, and he wrote a letter to Mr Adam Curror, dated 11th December 1876, undertaking not to do so." (Cond. 6) "At the date of Mr Kennedy's death the said loan of £4000 to Mr Adam Curror was secured only by his personal obligation, contained in the said bond, and by the unintimated assignation of the said bank stock. Mr Adam Curror was then possessed of very considerable means, and if Mr Walker had advised the trustees that it was their duty as trustees to obtain payment of the debt of £4000, Mr Adam Curror would have made payment thereof, and he was then in a position to do so without difficulty. Mr Walker, however, through gross and culpable recklessness, or in gross neglect and breach of his duty, failed to advise Mr Adam Curror or Mr John Curror that it was their duty as trustees to obtain payment of the said loan, or that the security upon which the money stood was not such as trustees were entitled to hold as a trust investment. The Messrs Curror believed that the security for the said loan was ample (and in fact it was ample until the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank in October 1878, when Mr Adam Curror was ruined, as after mentioned), and as Mr Adam Curror was paying 5 per cent upon the money, it is believed and averred that it did not occur either to him or to Mr John Curror, that there was any necessity for calling up the loan, especially as Mr Kennedy had himself been satisfied with the security. The Messrs Curror were not lawyers, and they trusted, as they were entitled to trust, to Mr Walker to keep them right in matters of law. Mr Adam Curror paid the interest upon the said loan up to and including Whitsunday 1878 to Mr Walker, as factor for the trust. Mr Walker gave receipts to Mr Adam Curror for the said interest, but never advised that the loan should be paid up. Mr Walker also in 1877 paid Mr Adam Curror a legacy of £500, left to him by Mr Kennedy in his said trust-disposition and settlement." (Cond. 7) "The City of Glasgow Bank stopped payment in October 1878, and in consequence of the assignation to Mr Kennedy of the stock of the bank held by Mr Adam Curror not having been intimated to the bank, Mr Adam Curror's name remained on the register as a shareholder. Shortly after the stoppage of the said bank, Mr Walker, on behalf of Mr Kennedy's trustees, intimated to Mr Adam Curror's agent, that it would be necessary to have the £1000 of Union Bank stock, assigned to Mr Kennedy as already mentioned, transferred to the trustees, to enable them to realise the stock. Mr Adam Curror, however, advised by Mr Kirk Mackie, his agent, declined to grant any transfer in the then situation of his affairs, and shortly afterwards his estates were sequestrated. He died on 11th February 1879." (Cond. 8) "In March 1879 Mr Walker, on behalf of Mr John Curror, as sole trustee of Mr Kennedy, took the opinion of counsel as to the advisability of lodging a claim in Mr Adam Curror's sequestration for the said sum of £4000, and counsel advised that no claim should be lodged, in case it should give rise to a claim by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank against the trust-estate in respect of the said assignation of stock of the bank by Mr Adam Curror to Mr Kennedy. Accordingly, no claim was lodged in the sequestration, and the said sum of £4000 was totally lost to the trust-estate. No. 66.

 Mr Adam Curror's estate ultimately yielded a dividend of 3s. 3d. per £." Jan. 25, 1889.
 They further stated that Mr John Curror, after having assumed Mr C. Curror's v. Walker's Trustees.
 J. T. Dunlop as a trustee under Mr Kennedy's trust-settlement, died on 8th July 1885.

Mr Walker died on 27th November 1879, leaving a trust-disposition, under which he appointed the defenders in this action his trustees. Shortly after John Curror's death Mr Dunlop, as sole trustee under Mr Kennedy's trust-deed, recovered from the pursuers, as John Curror's representatives, payment of the above-mentioned sum of £4000, with interest, amounting in all to £5479, 18s. 10d.

In the present action they sought to recover that sum from Mr Walker's trustees.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said John Walker having, in gross violation and neglect of his duty as law-agent and factor for said trust, failed to advise the said Adam Curror and John Curror that it was their duty as trustees to obtain payment of said loan, the defenders, as representing the said John Walker, are bound to make good to the pursuers and relieve them of the loss sustained by them as representatives of the said John Curror, through payment of the said loan not having been obtained.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' statements are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 9th June 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the averments of the pursuers irrelevant; dismisses the action, and decerns." * * "OPINION.—This is an action of a kind which the Lord Ordinary has had occasion to deal with several times during the last two years. The law-agent is here once again sought to be made liable in damages for failure in duty. The ordinary case is where the law-agent bungles a title, omits to intimate an assignation, neglects to make proper inquiries in reference to investments which he recommends. But the present case is one which goes far beyond any precedent in this branch of the law. The liability for damage in the present case is sought to be enforced, not on account of any blunder which the law-agent committed, but on account of his not having ultroneously given advice as to the risky character of an investment which had been made by the testator himself. The facts are simple enough. William Kennedy, W.S., Edinburgh, who died in 1877, had lent to his friend, Adam Curror, Esq. of the Lee, £4000 upon Mr Curror's personal bond. Mr Curror was a shareholder in the City of Glasgow Bank, and by the failure of that bank he was ruined, while the £4000 remained unpaid. Mr Kennedy, by a codicil to his will, said, 'I wish John Walker, W.S., to be factor and agent for my trustees and executors.' And the trustees and executors, at the first meeting after Kennedy's death, nominated Mr Walker as factor and law-agent to the trust, 'to make up the trustees' title to the trust-estate, and to do whatever might be necessary for the confirmation of the executors, and in regard to the general management of the estate, and to make all necessary payments and disbursements therefor.' Mr Walker accepted this employment, and performed the various pieces of business thus confided to him. He died on the 27th of October 1879, and now, nine years after his death, an action is raised against his executors, claiming damages against them by reason of the fact that he did not advise the two trustees, Adam and John Curror, to compel payment from Adam Curror, one of the trustees, of the debt he owed to Kennedy's trust. The pursuers say that they have been 'advised that Mr Walker, in respect of his said failure of duty, became liable to relieve Mr John Curror, or his representatives, of any loss sustained by them in consequence of non-realisation of Mr Kennedy's estate, and that the same liability rests upon the defenders as Mr Walker's representatives.' The representatives

---

No. 66.

Jan. 25, 1889.
Curros v.
Walker's
Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—Trust funds which were invested at the truster's death fell into two classes, those invested in securities which trustees could legally hold, and those invested in securities which they could not legally hold.<sup>1</sup> The distinction was clearly marked, and the question of sufficiency did not enter into the matter. It would be no answer to an action against trustees for having lent on personal security, that the person to whom they lent was a very rich man at the time of the loan.<sup>2</sup> That being so, it was the duty of the trustees in this case to have realised within a reasonable time. They were not, however, lawyers, and were entitled to rely, and did in point of fact rely, on Mr Walker to keep them right in points of law. He was bound when it came to his knowledge that the trust funds were invested in such securities to advise the trustees that they were bound to sell. It was admitted that the law-agent was not bound to advise on the point of the sufficiency of the security,<sup>3</sup> but he was bound to advise the trustees to obtain payment of the loan, and that it was illegal for them to hold the stock. Mr Walker was employed to do what was right in ordinary course, and he ought to have seen that the security was realised. The matter must have been brought before his notice in making up the inventory of the estate, and when he paid the legacy to Mr Curros. It was the duty of Mr Walker to go over all the securities, and to advise the trustees whether they could legally hold them. The question was not one of prudence or imprudence in the trustees in keeping on the security, but of legality. It was not here averred that Mr Walker was asked for his advice, but the question must have come up at every meeting of the trust, and it was his duty when it did to volunteer his advice, and not to sit silent and see the trustees doing an illegal act. The trustees would, in such a case, be entitled to assume that everything was right unless the of John Curros, the co-trustee of Adam Curros, were called upon to pay up the debt owing by Adam Curros, and did pay it with principal and interest, amounting altogether to £5479, 18s. 10d. John Curros's representatives were thus made liable, because he, John Curros, had not compelled his brother Adam Curros to make payment of the debt he owed to the trust ; and now these representatives seek to make Mr Walker's executors liable for the sum of money that they have so paid, because he did not advise the trustees to proceed against one of their number for recovery of the money. There are no means of ascertaining now whether he gave such advice or not ; nor are there any means of ascertaining whether, if he had given it, it would have been followed. But these points are of no importance, because there is no such duty laid upon an agent for trustees, to watch over their investments, and to give them good counsel when the investments become dangerous. That is the duty of the trustees themselves, which they are not entitled to delegate to their agent, and for the due performance of which he is not responsible, unless, indeed, he agrees to perform work which is properly that of the trustees. If an agent for trustees is bound to be for ever looking around, in order to ascertain whether any of the debts owing to the trust, or the investments upon which the trust moneys are laid out, are in an insecure condition, then in like manner an agent for any client would lie under the same responsibility. There is nothing special in the position of trustees in regard to this matter.

"It was admitted that there was no precedent for such an action as this, nor any dictum from the bench or by a writer of authority, and consequently the only course with this action is to dismiss it."

<sup>1</sup> Maclaren on Wills, ii. 230 ; Lewin on Trusts, pp. 290 et seq.

<sup>2</sup> Raes v. Meek, July 20, 1888, 15 R. 1033—see Lord Mure, p. 1049, Lord Shand, p. 1051 ; Wyllie Guild v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, 'y 16, 1887, 14 R. 944.

Knox v. Mackinnon, August 7, 1888, 15 R. (H. L.) 83.

agent warned them to the contrary. He had failed in that duty, and was therefore liable for any loss incurred by his neglect. There was no distinction between taking and retaining a security in such circumstances, and none between giving wrong advice, and by keeping silence allowing the trustees to retain an illegal security.<sup>1</sup>

No. 66.
Jan. 25, 1889.
*Currors v.
Walker's
Trustees.*

Argued for the respondents;—The duty here condescended on did not arise from the relation between agent and client, which was the only relation averred on this record. There was no special employment averred on record which made Mr Walker liable for not telling the trustees that they could not hold these stocks legally. It was not averred that he was even asked for his advice on this point of law, and it would take very specific averments of special employment to enable the Court to hold that he was bound to volunteer advice (which might not be acceptable). There was no authority for the demand here made, and if law-agents to trustees were to be held liable for every mistake made in the carrying on of a trust, whether their advice had been asked on the point or not, it would make the position of such agents an intolerably dangerous one.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I agree with the Lord Ordinary. The trustees of the late Mr Kennedy were Mr Adam Curror of the Lee and his brother, the late Mr John Curror. The brothers were very intimate friends of the testator, and in compliance with a wish expressed in Mr Kennedy's settlement, they appointed the late Mr John Walker, W.S., to be their factor and law-agent. The duties of a factor and law-agent on a trust-estate are perfectly well defined and known in law, and they are accurately expressed in the 4th article of the condescendence. Mr Walker was authorised to make up the trustees' title to the estate, and to do whatever might be necessary for the confirmation of the executors; and in regard to the general management of the estate to make all necessary payments and disbursements therefor. The estate consisted of a large sum of money invested in a number of different securities, and it was to be upheld by the trustees for a considerable period—until the beneficiary, the truster's grand-nephew, who was in infancy, attained the age of twenty-one years. One of the assets of the trust-estate was a sum of £4000 owing to Mr Kennedy by Mr Adam Curror, one of the trustees. It is explained by the pursuers that Mr Kennedy had frequently, during the fifteen or twenty years prior to his death, advanced considerable sums of money to Mr Adam Curror; and in December 1876 Curror was indebted to Mr Kennedy in £4000. He granted Mr Kennedy a bond for that amount, dated 13th December 1876, and he gave him also an assignation in security of certain shares in the City of Glasgow Bank, and of certain shares in the Union Bank of Scotland. It is further stated in cond. 5 that it was arranged that Mr Kennedy should not intimate the assignation of the bank stock, and he wrote a letter to Mr Adam Curror, dated the 11th December 1876, undertaking not to do so. That, therefore, was an unsecured debt, standing upon the personal credit of the debtor, Mr Adam Curror, and there can be no doubt that it was not a proper investment for the trust-estate. In the first place, it was dependent entirely upon the personal security of the debtor, and in the second place it was a debt due by one of the trustees to the trust-estate. In both of these particulars it was not an investment which should have been kept up. Notwithstanding, the two trustees, Mr Adam Curror being <sup>1</sup> Brownlie v. Brownlie's Trustees, July 11, 1879, 6 R. 1233.

No. 66.

Jan. 25, 1889.
Currors v.
Walker's
Trustees.

himself a debtor and the other trustee being his brother, thought fit to keep up that debt as a proper investment for the estate; or, at all events, they did not call it up or interfere with it. The money was lost in consequence of Mr Adam Curror being a partner in the City of Glasgow Bank, and being ruined by the failure of that bank. At the time the trustees entered upon the management of the estate it was not disputed that Mr Adam Curror was a perfectly solvent man, and quite able to meet all his liabilities. In consequence of the loss of the money, Mr John Curror's representatives have been obliged to replace the sum lost, which, with interest, amounted to £5479, 18s. 10d., the sum sued for; and they have brought this action for the purpose of making the representatives of Mr John Walker liable to the trustees for his failure of duty towards them.

The pursuers, of course, represent the last solvent trustee who made that investment, or, rather, who kept up that investment. Therefore, if there is any ground of liability on the part of Mr Walker to his clients, the trustees, it is not disputed that the pursuers are quite entitled to avail themselves of that, and to enforce liability against Mr Walker's representatives. But the question comes to be, what is the nature of the liability, or does such liability exist at all in the circumstances. The trustees, according to the statement of the pursuers in the 6th article of the condescendence, applied their minds to the question whether that money should be called up or not, because they say that "the Messrs Curror believed that the security for the said loan was ample (and, in fact, it was ample until the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank in October 1878, when Mr Adam Curror was ruined as after mentioned), and as Mr Adam Curror was paying 5 per cent upon the money, it is believed and averred that it did not occur either to him or Mr John Curror that there was any necessity for calling up the loan, especially as Mr Kennedy had himself been satisfied with the security." That was not a matter in which the two trustees did absolutely nothing, or failed to take the matter into consideration. On the contrary, that averment shews that the trustees had considered the matter, and believed the security to be ample, which, indeed, it was at the time, and therefore they came to the conclusion that there was no necessity for calling up the loan. There cannot be any doubt, I suppose, that the trustees in so acting acted quite wrongfully and in breach of their trust. But, then, how did Mr Walker come in as a party liable for that proceeding? The averment is this:—"The Messrs Curror were not lawyers, and they trusted, as they were entitled to trust, to Mr Walker to keep them right in matters of law. Mr Adam Curror paid the interest upon the said loan up to and including Whitsunday 1878 to Mr Walker, as factor for the trust; Mr Walker gave receipts to Mr Adam Curror for the said interest, but never advised that the loan should be paid up. Mr Walker also, in 1877, paid Mr Adam Curror a legacy of £500 left to him by Mr Kennedy in his said trust-disposition and settlement." Of course, it fell to Mr Walker as factor to ingather the annual payment of interest, and therefore it was necessary to receive from Mr Adam Curror the interest upon that £4000. The fact that Mr Walker paid £500 to Mr Adam Curror came to no more than this, that that was a legacy which the trustees had to pay to Mr Adam Curror. The payment, therefore, was a payment by the trustees, although, as a matter of fact, the cheque may have come through the hands of Mr Walker. There is another passage which I ought perhaps to read—"Mr Walker, however, through gross and culpable recklessness, or in gross neglect and breach of his duty, failed to advise Mr Adam Curror or Mr John Currer that it was their duty, as trustees, to obtain payment of the said loan." No. 66.

 Now, was Mr Walker in such a position that he was bound, without his advice being asked, to volunteer the statement that these two trustees were bound to call Jan. 25, 1889.
 up the loan? I think Mr Walker was not under any such obligation to volun- Currors v.
 teer his advice. The law-agent of a trust is the law-agent of the trustees, no Walker's doubt. They employ him to advise them, but if upon any point they do not Trustees.
 want advice they are not bound to take it; and if they do not ask advice the law-agent is not bound to volunteer it. These gentlemen may have been quite conscious that they ran considerable risk in allowing that loan to lie, but still they probably thought the risk a small one, and resolved to run it. They were men of understanding and men of business, and quite capable of judging on a matter of that kind. They did not ask Mr Walker's advice. If they had, that would have been stated as a matter of course, but Mr Walker was not bound to volunteer it.

We cannot help looking forward to see what sort of case could be made out if proof were allowed here. It so happens that both the Currors are now dead, Mr Walker is dead, and the clerk who acted under Mr Walker in the management of the estate is also dead. If there were to be a proof, it would be in the absence of every human being who could have spoken to the facts. There could only be a proof by writings, and as the pursuers have had, as is stated in the con-descendence, access to the accounts, papers, and minutes of the trust in a former case, and do not now aver anything relevant in support of this claim, I cannot help feeling some confidence in the safety of the judgment we are about to pronounce. Upon these grounds, I am for affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—I concur. There is not on this record, as I read it, any relevant ground of liability set forth as against Mr Walker's trustees. It is not in my opinion any part of the duty of a law-agent for trustees, unless under instructions to that effect, to put the trust-estate to the expense of his examining the various securities in which the trust funds have been invested, with a view to his advising the trustees whether those investments should be continued.
 And there is nothing in the special circumstances of this case, as alleged, to lead to the conclusion that the late Mr Walker was neglectful of his duties in that respect. I therefore agree in thinking that this action should be dismissed.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.
 Even if inquiry were to be allowed, I greatly doubt whether the pursuers would take any benefit. The evidence which they could adduce would labour under two great difficulties, namely, that ten or eleven years have elapsed since the events condescended on took place, and that all the parties immediately concerned with those events are now dead. Thus, even if the case got to the stage of inquiry, there would necessarily be a great deal of groping in the dark before any knowledge of the facts could be arrived at. The question in the case comes to be whether there was any conversation about the matter between the trustees and their law-agent, and even if there were, and Walker explained the law applicable to the security in question, there might be circumstances clearly tending to shew that the trustees would have preferred to run any risk there was in holding on the security.

No. 66.

Jan. 25, 1889.
Cursons v.
Walker's
Trustees.

I take the case now, however, on the footing that the pursuers would succeed in proving their averments that Mr Walker failed to advise the trustees that their duty was to get rid of this investment.

That being so, the question comes to be whether the pursuers have stated a relevant ground to support their claim. I am of opinion that they have not. I have no difficulty in saying that, in my opinion, the investment in question was one of a class which is not allowable in the management of trust funds, being a loan (1) on personal security only, and (2) on the security of one of the trustees themselves, and there being no power given in the trust-deed to make or hold such a security. I assume, therefore, that the trustees were bound to realise within a reasonable time, and that if they did not do so, they acted in breach of their duty or obligations as trustees, and so became personally responsible for any loss which might result. In assuming this I go farther than the Lord Ordinary has done, as he has dealt with the investment as being merely imprudent and risky. I assume, further, that if Mr Walker's advice had been asked, it was his duty as their law-agent to tell the trustees of the illegal character of the investment.

But there is no suggestion on this record that Mr Walker ever was asked for his advice on the matter, and the question comes to be whether there arises, from the mere relation of agency which is averred, a duty and obligation on the part of the agent to volunteer advice on such a matter on which advice was never asked. All that is said is that he was appointed agent to the trust (or, I would prefer to say, to the trustees) to make up the trustees' title, "to do whatever was necessary for the confirmation of the executors and in regard to the general management of the estate, and to make all necessary payments and disbursements therefor." I do not read those words as meaning anything more than that he was appointed agent for the trustees. That being so, was Mr Walker, because he was law-agent, bound to go over the trust securities and volunteer his advice as to which must be realised? I do not doubt that many a careful law-agent might do so, though in the case of this particular investment, about which the trustees had the fullest knowledge, even a careful law-agent might think it unnecessary to say anything. But the question is whether there was a legal obligation on the agent to do so, and I think there was not. I do not think his responsibility went that length. To make a relevant case circumstances must be averred which clearly shew that from some particular conversation or occurrence that duty was imposed on him—some meeting at which the question was duly raised, or some conversation during which the agent's advice was directly or impliedly asked on the point.

Some illustrations have been suggested as being analogous to the present case, e.g. where trustees wish to invest trust funds, and propose to do so in an illegal security. I do not think that such an analogy is useful, for where such a question is raised, and the duty of a law-agent as to whether some investment should have been made is before the Court, everything must depend on the particular circumstances, as I endeavoured to explain in the recent case of Rad's Trustees (15 R. 1051). The parties must be brought together, and it must be proved that the subject was duly tabled at their meeting, and that in some way by what occurred the duty of giving advice arose. Here nothing of the kind is averred. All we have is an averment that though the matter was never the subject of conversation between the trustees and their agent, the latter was bound to volunteer his advice upon it. I cannot carry his responsibility so far.

Such a responsibility does not necessarily arise out of the relation of agent and client, and nothing beyond this is here averred. No. 66.

LORD ADAM.—I concur, and have nothing to add to what your Lordship has said.

Jan. 25, 1889.
Curriers v.
Walker's
Trustees.

THE COURT adhered.

A. P. PURVES & AITKEN, W.S.—BLAIR & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT M'MEEKIN, Pursuer (Respondent).—Balfour—Salvesen.
DAVID EASTON (Easton's Executor) AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).
—H. Johnston.

No. 67.

Jan. 25, 1889.
M'Meevin v.
Easton.

Bill of Exchange—Personal liability—Signature in representative capacity.—A, B, and C, signed a promissory-note in the following terms:—"We, the undersigned, in the name and on the behalf of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Stranraer, promise to pay," &c. Held that A, B, and C, were personally liable for payment of the note.

On 17th March 1882, the Rev. Thomas Easton, minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Stranraer, Peter Lusk, farmer, Inch, and David Easton, M.D., Stranraer, granted to Robert M'Meevin, farmer, Inch, a promissory-note in the following terms:—"Stranraer, 17th March 1882. —One day after date, we, the undersigned, in the name and on the behalf of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Stranraer, promise to pay to Mr Robert M'Meevin, or Miss Agnes M'Meevin, Culgrange, or order, within the British Linen Bank, Stranraer, with interest, at a rate not exceeding four per cent per annum, the sum of £300 sterling, value received. (Signed) T. EASTON. PETER LUSK. DAVID EASTON."

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kinnear.
M.

The Rev. Mr Easton died on 12th March 1887, and Dr Easton died shortly thereafter.

On 16th March 1888, M'Meevin raised an action against Lusk and against the respective executors of the Rev. Thomas Easton and Dr Easton, for payment of £290, as the balance due on the note.

The pursuer averred that he had agreed to advance the £300 at the request of the Rev. Mr Easton, and that "the promissory-note was granted on the representation that Mr Easton was the debtor, and the other two (Mr Lusk and Dr Easton) his cautioners." He further averred that the purpose for which the £300 was advanced was to enable Mr Easton to pay to a bank a debt of that amount for which he had undertaken responsibility; and that the debt to the bank had arisen from a loan to meet the cost of repairs on the Reformed Presbyterian Church at Stranraer, for the balance of which loan the Rev. Mr Easton had undertaken liability.

The defenders stated that in order to meet a debt which had been incurred to a bank by the managers of the church they had borrowed £300 from the pursuer. They further stated that in security of this loan the managers authorised Mr Easton, the defender Lusk, and Dr Easton, to grant the note to the pursuer in the name and on the behalf of the congregation, and that it was not the intention of parties that the note should import the personal obligation of the persons signing it; but on the contrary, that, like the debt to the bank which it was to replace, it should be the obligation of the congregation.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The late Reverend Mr Easton, the defender Peter Lusk, and the late Dr David Easton, having granted, and being personally liable for the sums due under, the said promissory-note, and the sums sued for with interest being due, the pursuer is entitled to decree, as concluded for, with expenses.

No. 67. The defenders pleaded ;—(2) The promissory-note sued on is not the personal obligation of the defender Peter Lusk and of the now deceased Reverend Thomas Easton and David Easton, and the defenders are therefore entitled to be assoilzied.

Jan. 25, 1889.
M'Meekin v.
Easton.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) decerned against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The terms of the note imposed no individual liability on the persons who signed it. The undertaking was made in name and on behalf of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. Where the undertaking in a contract was in a representative character the Court would not enforce it personally.<sup>1</sup> The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61), was not yet in force when the note was granted, but it was a codifying statute, and in many points merely declared what was the former law. Thus, sec. 26 provided that a person signing a bill and adding words to his signature, shewing that he did so in a representative character, was "not personally liable thereon," and sec. 89 made that applicable to promissory-notes.

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—The persons who signed this promissory-note, two of whom are now dead, were connected with the congregation of the Reformed Presbyterian Church at Stranraer. Money had been borrowed from a bank for purposes of the congregation, and when it was paid up to the bank the pursuer M'Meekin stepped in and advanced it. When he did so he received this promissory-note signed by the three gentlemen whose names it bears, Mr Easton, David Easton, and Peter Lusk.

Is this a worthless document, and did he receive it as such? The idea that this Reformed Presbyterian Congregation was the proper debtor in a personal obligation is, of course, absurd. A congregation could not be debtors on a promissory-note, and there is therefore no personal obligation on them. Well, did not these three gentlemen become the debtors? They were legally capable of being so, and they signed it. They refer on the face of it to its being signed in the name and on behalf of the congregation. That is, it was a debt which the congregation would feel it to be their duty to provide for. They can do that, though they are not capable of being the debtors or creditors on the note, out of good feeling and the conviction that they are morally bound to relieve those who became debtors for their behoof. On the face of the note, then, that is the position of the debtors. It is the only thing that could be meant, unless we suppose they meant to give and M'Meekin meant to take a worthless document. The only legal view of M'Meekin's position is that he must be taken as saying to those who signed the note that he could not take the congregation as his debtors, but would look to them, and they on their part would look to the congregation for their relief. That is the view of the Lord Ordinary, and it is unanswerably right.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I come to the same conclusion, but not without some difficulty. That difficulty arises from the allegations, not of the defenders, but of the pursuer. His action is not brought simply on the promissory-note as a document of debt. His condescendence shews that he is not in his own view in a position to lay his action upon it alone. He makes allegations that the Rev. Mr Easton was the principal debtor, and that the other obligants were truly cautioners for him, and explaining the history of the transaction in his view of it. Now, on the document all the obligants are in the same position. No. 67.

<sup>1</sup> Gadd v. Houghton, 1876, L. R., 1 Ex. Div. 357; Alexander v. Sizer, 1869, L. R., 4 Ex. 103; Brown v. Sutherland, March 17, 1875, 2 R. 615.

Jan. 25, 1889.
M'Meehin v. Easton.

But, on the whole, while I am clear that there could have been no summary diligence on this document, and have doubts whether it is sufficient to instruct the pursuer's allegations, I concur in thinking that prima facie it instructs an undertaking by the defenders personally to pay the sum contained in it.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Young, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

P. ADAIR, S.S.C.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

MES MARY JANE JACKSON OR GRANT AND OTHERS (Tutors and Curators of James William Hamilton Grant and Others), Petitioners.—Macfarlane. No. 68.
Jan. 26, 1889.
Grant.

Nobile Officium—Minor and Pupil—Tutors and Curators—Power to grant bonds and dispositions in security on pupil's estate to pay younger children's provisions.—Where the pupil proprietor of a landed estate, who had no moveable funds, was under a personal obligation to pay certain provisions to his younger brothers and sisters, and was paying 5 per cent of interest on these provisions, power was granted to his tutors-nominate to grant bonds and dispositions in security over the pupils' estate in order to pay off the provisions, on the ground that money could be borrowed on such security at 3½ per cent, and that thus a large saving of interest would be effected.

HENRY ALEXANDER GRANT, heir of entail in possession of the lands and estate of Wester Elchies and others in the counties of Elgin and Banff, granted a bond of provision, dated and recorded 26th January 1878 and 25th January 1888 respectively, in terms of the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. cap. 87), in which he bound himself to pay his younger children provisions up to three years' free rental of his estates. 2d Division.
M.

Thereafter he obtained the authority of the Court to disentail these lands, and by a disposition, dated and recorded 14th June and 31st July 1884, he disposed the lands to and in favour of himself in liferent, for his liferent use alienably, and to James William Hamilton Grant, his eldest son, and the heirs whatsoever of his body, in fee, with and under, inter alia, the declaration that he should have power to grant a bond or bonds of provisions in favour of his children in the manner prescribed by the Aberdeen Act, and that any such bond of provision already granted by him should be as valid and effectual as if it had been granted after the execution of the disposition.

By trust-disposition and settlement, dated 3d June 1879, he appointed his wife, Mrs Mary Jane Jackson or Grant, Mrs Isabella Charlotte Grant, and Alexander Cameron, solicitor, Elgin, to be his trustees and executors, and also to be tutors and curators to his children. Mr Grant died on 7th July 1886, survived by his widow and by seven children, all of whom were in pupillarity at his death. He was succeeded by his eldest son, James William Hamilton Grant, who was born on 3d April 1876.

The provision of three years' free rental of the estates of Wester Elchies, &c., to which the six younger children were under the bond of

No. 68. provision entitled, amounted to £13,790, 18s. 3d. This sum was, in terms of the bond, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, payable to them by their brother one year after their father's death, viz., on 7th July 1887. The interest on this sum at 5 per cent amounted to £689, 10s. 11d. per annum.

Jan. 26, 1889.
Grant.

In these circumstances the tutors-nominate of J. W. H. Grant, on 29th October 1888, presented this petition to the Court craving authority "to borrow the sum of £13,790, 18s. 3d. for the purpose of paying the provisions to younger children, . . . and to grant on the security of the estates of Wester Elchies and others, . . . or any part or portion thereof, a bond or bonds for the said amount in favour of the lenders thereof, at such rate of interest as may be agreed on, such bond or bonds containing a disposition or dispositions in security of the said estates, . . . with power of sale and other usual and necessary clauses." The petitioners averred that their ward was not possessed of any moveable estate from which he could pay the provisions. "As money could now be borrowed at a less rate of interest if the tutors and curators of J. W. H. Grant could grant bonds and dispositions in security over his estates for the amount of the provisions, a large saving of interest would in this manner be effected."

On 9th November, after intimation of the petition, the Court remitted to Mr George M'Intosh, W.S., to inquire and report as to the circumstances set forth in the petition.

On 19th January 1889 Mr M'Intosh reported, inter alia :—" Assuming that the petitioners, on obtaining authority to grant bonds and dispositions in security over their ward's estate, could borrow the amount of the younger children's provisions at 3½ per cent, which is the current rate of interest on first-class landed securities in Scotland, the interest on £13,790, 18s. 3d. would amount to £482, 13s. 8d. per annum, and the annual saving to the ward would therefore be £206, 17s. 3d.

"So far as the reporter is aware, the Court has not hitherto granted authority to tutors-nominate of a pupil proprietor in fee-simple to borrow upon the security of their ward's estate, except on being satisfied that there was necessity or high expediency.

"The reporter respectfully refers the Court to the case of Bellamy and Others,<sup>1</sup> where the Court authorised tutors-nominate to borrow money on the security of the heritable property to pay off debts of the testator. In that case it was stated that it was of great importance that the debts and provisions should be paid off, in order that the creditors might not proceed to do diligence to attach the estate and accumulate expenses, with accumulated interest at the highest legal rate. The reporter in that case stated that there was no reason to doubt that the raising the sum required on the security of the heritable property of the ward would be a proper and necessary act of administration on the part of the petitioners.

"The reporter further respectfully refers the Court to the case of Sinclair-Wemyss,<sup>2</sup> where an application by a tutor-nominate for power to build a mansion-house on the estate of the pupil was refused, as being neither a matter of necessity nor of high expediency. In the present petition it is not set forth, and the reporter understands that there is no ground for supposing, that the younger children require immediate payment of their provisions.

"The reporter therefore begs respectfully to report that the circumstances set forth in the petition do not indicate any such urgency as to render it a necessary act of administration on the part of the petitioners to borrow on the security of their ward's heritable estate. If this view is correct, the question for your Lordships' determination comes to be, No. 68.

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 30, 1854, 17 D. 115.

<sup>2</sup> July 8, 1882, 9 R. 1131, per Lord President, 1133.

Jan. 26, 1889.
Grant. Whether, in the circumstances above set forth, the saving, or probable saving, of £206, 17s. 3d. per annum, for about eight years, to the ward, is sufficient to make it highly expedient, in the interests of the ward, that the petitioners should be authorised to grant heritable securities over his estate?

"From section 11 of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882,<sup>1</sup> it appears that tutors-nominate of a pupil heir of entail in possession would now be authorised by the Court to borrow on the security of the pupil's entailed estate, provided the Court was satisfied that it would be for the benefit of the pupil that such authority should be granted."

Argued for petitioners;—It was highly expedient in the interests of the ward that the power should be granted. The saving of interest effected before he came of age would amount to more than £206 a-year. A positive advantage would thus be secured to the ward. Provisions to younger children were in the same position as the debts of ordinary creditors. The younger children here might at any time proceed to do diligence to recover the principal sums due to them, as these were payable one year after their father's death, and they were in no way secured. The present case was more favourable than those in which power to sell or feu was craved.<sup>2</sup> In them a part of the estate was being disposed of, and yet the authority craved was granted because the advantage to the pupil was clear. In Morison's<sup>3</sup> case tutors had been authorised to grant leases for nineteen years, in order to secure larger rents than were obtainable under shorter leases. The Court had granted similar applications to the present.<sup>4</sup> The dicta in Somerville's<sup>5</sup> case exactly applied. Further, the tutors of a pupil heir of entail in possession could now obtain power to borrow on the security of their ward's estate on satisfying the Court that it would be for the benefit of the pupil.<sup>1</sup> There could be no doubt that it was for the benefit of the pupil here that the petition should be granted, and a pupil proprietor in fee-simple ought not to be in a worse position than a pupil heir of entail.

LORD YOUNG.—I think it would be deplorable if the tutors had not the power to save expense to the estate by borrowing money at 3½ per cent, and of thus satisfying the provision to the younger children, instead of continuing to pay 5 per cent on these provisions, as at present. I think we should grant the powers craved.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S., Agents.

<sup>1</sup> Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 11.

<sup>2</sup> Mackenzie, Jan. 17, 1855, 17 D. 314; Lord Clinton, Oct. 5, 1875, 3 R. 62; Campbell, Feb. 26, 1881, 8 R. 543.

<sup>3</sup> Morison, July 19, 1861, 23 D. 1313, 33 Scot. Jur. 664.

<sup>4</sup> Crawford, July 6, 1839, 1 D. 1183, 14 F. 1203; Threipland, June 7, 1848, 16 D. 1234, 20 Scot. Jur. 450; Bellamy, Nov. 30, 1854, 17 D. 115.

<sup>5</sup> Somerville's Factor, Feb. 6, 1836, 14 S. 451.

No. 69.

REV. JOHN JAMES BROWNE AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—*M'Kechnie—J. H. Stevenson.*Jan. 29, 1889.
Browne v.
M'Farlane.JOHN M'FARLANE, Defender.—J. C. Thomson—Shaw.

Reparation—Slander—Newspaper—Circumstances in which slander uttered—Mitigation of damages.—Where an action of damages is directed against the publisher of a slander, who is not the writer, he will not be allowed to prove in mitigation of damages circumstances which might have affected the writer, but of which the defender was ignorant, and this rule applies to the publisher of a newspaper who publishes a slander and refuses to disclose the name of the writer.

In an action of damages against the publisher of a Scottish newspaper for slander contained in a paragraph published in it, the defender stated in evidence that he received the paragraph from his regular correspondent in Ireland, whose name he refused to disclose. He proposed to lead evidence with a view to mitigation of damages (there being no counter issue of veritas) in proof of an averment as to the circumstances in which the paragraph was written, of which admittedly he knew nothing. The evidence was disallowed. In a bill of exceptions, held that the evidence was not admissible.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. President,
Presiding
Judge.
M.

IN an action of damages for slander at the instance of the Rev. John James Browne, county Antrim, Ireland, and his three sons, against John M'Farlane, publisher of the Scottish Leader newspaper, the following issue was adjusted and sent to trial before a jury, for the Rev. Mr. Browne,—“It being admitted that the defender is the printer, proprietor, and publisher of the Scottish Leader newspaper, published in Edinburgh: It being also admitted that in the number of the said newspaper which was published on 16th November 1887 there was printed the paragraph set forth in the schedule annexed hereto: Whether the said paragraph, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, the Reverend John James Browne, and falsely and calumniously represents him as having been guilty of attempting to impose upon and deceive the public, to the loss, injury, and damage of the said pursuer? Damages laid at £500.”

The first issues for the other pursuers were in the same form, but there was also this second issue applicable to each of the three sons,—“Whether the said paragraph, or part of it, is of and concerning the said pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents him as having been charged with a criminal offence, and as having admitted or been found guilty of said offence?”

There was no counter issue of veritas.

The article set forth in the schedule was as follows:—“A very interesting and amusing episode has just come to light, which illustrates the growing tendency of the North toward Home Rule, and the desperate shift to which foolish people of ‘Unionist’ leanings are sometimes driven to alarm the Protestant population when they begin to manifest any signs of fraternising with the people of Ireland in prosecuting their just claim to self-government. Toome is a small place where the river Baun receives the waters of Lough Neah before entering Lough Beg. It is a railway station, and the place is famous for its fishery. It is still more famous, perhaps, because here is a building called ‘The Temple of Liberty,’ erected by a Mr Carey, a wealthy man, who found that very often in bigoted neighbourhoods well-meaning people could not get a hall to have a meeting in. Here, accordingly, the Protestant Home Rulers have held several successful meetings, and it is plain the seed there sown is bearing fruit. At one of these meetings a Protestant rector attended, named Brown, and gave some little trouble, but declared himself a species of Home Ruler. Now there is much fun over Rector Brown, whose sons have been brought up before the magistrates at Toome Petty Sessions charged with throwing stones at a police patrol. When charged, the boys, who are young in knavish tricks, very artlessly let the cat out of the bag. They had been posted there by their father to throw stones at him by way of getting up an outrage for the papers, and for the Loyal and Patriotic Union, and had in the darkness mistaken the police for their reverend parent, who had that evening invited a Roman Catholic gentleman of the village to accompany him to the site of the forthcoming outrage, by way of protection. The affair was, of course, hushed up, and the boys let off with a caution by the magistrates. As it has not yet been, and could not be, reported in our local 'Unionist' papers, I thought it better to let it see the light in the Leader. I am sure your readers will appreciate it as they did the Dolamon incident."

No. 69.

Jan. 29, 1886.
Browne v.
M'Farlane.

Before the trial certain evidence was taken on commission in Ireland.

On 24th December 1888 the cause was tried before the Lord President and a jury.

In the course of the trial the defender deponed that the paragraph was furnished by his regular correspondent in Ulster, whose name he did not, however, disclose, but that he personally knew nothing of the circumstances in which it was written.

Counsel for the defender then proposed to read evidence, taken on commission as above mentioned, to prove the following statement in his defences:—"Not far from pursuers' residence two police-constables were attacked with stones. The police pursued their assailants, whom they secured, and discovered to be the pursuers Arthur Molyneux Browne and George Capel Browne. On being challenged for their conduct, they stated that they had mistaken the police for their father."

It was stated that it was proposed to read that evidence with a view to mitigation of damages only.

The presiding Judge rejected the proposed evidence, and thereupon counsel for the defender excepted to his ruling.

The jury thereafter returned a verdict for the pursuers, assessing the damages at £100 for the Rev. Mr Browne, and at one farthing for each of the other pursuers.

The defender presented a bill of exceptions.

Argued for the defender in support of the bill;—The evidence in question was proposed to be read solely in mitigation of damages, and the statements proposed to be proved did not amount to proof of veritas, which would be incompetent in the absence of a counter issue. The facts set forth in the statements were part of the res gestæ, because if they had not taken place the report, to which currency was given in the article complained of, would never have arisen. This evidence having been excluded, the jury might have taken the view that the whole story was a fabrication of the defender or of his correspondent, whereas, had the evidence been admitted, the fact that the occurrences sought to be proved actually took place, coupled with the words of the slander, would have satisfied the jury that the matter was the subject of general talk in the country, and one which the correspondent was justified in noticing. The circumstances in which the slanderer uttered the slander had always been recognised as part of the res gestæ,<sup>1</sup> and the facts averred and offered to be proved were very important in that respect in the present case. When the publisher of a paper has assumed the responsibility for statements

<sup>1</sup> Ogilvie v. Scott, March 19, 1836, 14 S. 729; Bryson v. Inglis, Jan. 15, 1844, 6 D. 363; M'Neill v. Rorison, Nov. 12, 1847, 10 D. 15, 19 Scot. Jur. 662—see Lord Medwyn's opinion; Craig v. Jex Blake, July 7, 1871, 9 Macph. 973, 43 Scot. Jur. 363—see Lord Deas' opinion, p. 980; Paul v. Jackson, Jan. 23, 1884, 11 R. 460—see Lord President's opinion, p. 463.

No. 69. appearing in it, he places himself in exactly the same position as an anonymous correspondent, therefore the state of mind of the correspondent when he wrote the article was relevant in this case. impossible to say the facts stated in the article were invented by a correspondent, if the statement offered to be proved were true, it would very properly weigh with a jury in mitigation of damages.

Jan. 29, 1889.
Browne v.
M'Farlane.

Argued for the respondent;—The proposal to prove these facts was in reality an attempt to get in, in mitigation of damages, a statement of the verity of part of the slander. The only part of the libel statement omitted was that in the article it was stated that the pursuer had told his sons to throw stones at him. It was settled that it was incompetent to lead any such proof where there was no issue. The cases of Paul v. Jackson (11 R. 460) and Craig v. Johnston (9 Macph. 973) were the most recent and most authoritative cases on this point. Further, the proposed evidence was not proof of any particular res gestæ. It would not enable the jury to get at the circumstances which the slander was uttered by the defender, for admittedly it was nothing about the alleged facts. He and the anonymous correspondent were not in the same position.<sup>1</sup> If the action had been against the respondent the proof might have been relevant.

LORD MURE.—This case raises an important but a very short and simple question, namely, whether the presiding Judge was wrong in refusing to admit certain evidence taken on commission in Ireland to be laid before the jury in order to prove the following statement:—"Not far from pursuers' two police-constables were attacked with stones. The police pursued the assailants, whom they secured, and discovered to be the pursuers Arthurs Browne and George Capel Browne. On being challenged for their names they stated that they had mistaken the police for their father."

Now, it appears to me that if evidence of that statement had been admitted it would have amounted to the admission of proof of the truth of a particular slander in a case where the truth of the slander was not put in issue. On that ground I think the evidence was properly rejected. The article which contains the slander was published in a newspaper in this country, and contained the following sentences:—"When charged, the boys, who are young in knavish tricks, artlessly let the cat out of the bag. They had been posted there by their father to throw stones at him by way of getting up an outrage for the papers. The boys of the Loyal and Patriotic Union, and had in the darkness mistaken the pursuer for their reverend parent, who had that evening invited a Roman Catholic priest, a man of the village to accompany him to the site of the forthcoming outrage by way of protection. The affair was of course hushed up, and the boys were warned with a caution by the magistrates." That is the libel complained of, the purport of the complaint is set out in more distinct language in condensed form in the record, where the paragraph is stated falsely and calumniously to represent the pursuer, "on purpose to deceive and falsely alarm members of the public, and specially those of his own religion, against his political opponents, and guilty of planning an outrage on himself in a manner which would tend to make falsely appear that these political opponents had been guilty of a crime. In pursuance of this design he one night posted his sons, the said Arthurs Browne, George Capel Browne, and John James Browne, with instructions to throw stones at him as he passed."

<sup>1</sup> Brims v. Reid & Sons, May 28, 1885, 12 R. 1016.

These averments are denied by the defender, and he then goes on to make, by way of explanation in his answer, the statements which he wished to prove at the trial. Those statements, however, amount substantially to an averment of the veritas of part of the slander, and it has for long been well settled that a party cannot in mitigation of damages proceed to prove the truth of a part of the slander, any more than he can lead evidence to prove the truth of the whole, unless he has taken a counter issue. No. 69.
Jan. 29, 1889.
Browne v.
M'Farlane.

In the case of Paul v. Jackson I see that I referred to the opinions of the late Lord Moncreiff and of Chief Commissioner Adam, as quoted by Lord Moncreiff in his opinion in M'Neill v. Rorison, where they lay down the law most distinctly to the above effect. In the case of Craig v. Jex Blake, in which several rather difficult questions were raised, I acted on the same rule. For while I admitted all the evidence of surrounding circumstances, and as to there having been a riot at Surgeons' Hall, and even that the pursuer had been there on that day, I refused to allow evidence of the pursuer's participation in the riot as tending to prove the veritas without an issue, and that ruling was sustained. On the same general grounds I think that the evidence tendered in this case was properly rejected.

LORD SHAND.—During the argument for the defender any intention to prove veritas has been disavowed, and indeed any proof of veritas of a material part of the libel without a counter issue would be incompetent. The argument in regard to the rejected evidence is rested on this ground alone, that, if admitted, it would or might have had effect in the mitigation of damages. We may lay the cases of the three younger pursuers out of account, because in their cases damages were assessed at one farthing, and mitigation of that amount cannot be suggested. The question for determination is, Was the evidence competent in the case with the leading pursuer?

It is essential to bear in mind that though the article complained of emanated from a correspondent in Ireland, the action is not directed against him, but against the publisher of the paper in which it appeared.

During the trial the defender said nothing as to who his correspondent was, but being examined as a witness, he accepted responsibility for the article, stating that he knew nothing of the circumstances in which it was written. All that he knew was that he received it in due course from his correspondent, and had no reason to doubt the truth of the statements. Keeping that in mind, it is to be observed that there is no room for admitting any evidence of special circumstances of the kind referred to in the article complained of as affecting the state of mind either of the defender or of the author of the article. The defender knew no more of the article than its terms disclosed, and the claim is not made against the author.

In this state of matters we must consider the terms of the issue before determining whether the statement proposed to be proved is relevant to mitigate damages.

The issue is in these terms:—"Whether the said paragraph, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, the Reverend John James Browne, and falsely and calumniously represents him as having been guilty of attempting to impose upon and deceive the public, to the loss, injury, and damage of the said pursuer? Damages laid at £500." The point of the slander is that Mr Browne, in order to pose as a martyr because of his political views, had arranged with his sons that they should throw stones at him. It is not disputed that this was a false

No. 69.
 Jan. 29, 1889.
 Browne v.
 M'Farlane.

charge, and there is no doubt that it was calumnious. Now, to meet the of damages because of that statement, it was proposed to prove that—"from pursuers' residence two police-constables were attacked with stones police pursued their assailants, whom they secured, and discovered to pursuers Arthur Molyneux Browne and George Capel Browne. On challenged for their conduct, they stated that they had mistaken the person their father." Supposing that to be proved, I am unable to see why it mitigate the damages to which the father is entitled. The pursuers damages because he is represented as having attempted to impose upon deceive the public. The proof offered could have no bearing on that. The alleged acts or statements of the boys—with which he was not connected could not affect or diminish his claim of damages, and on that ground that this evidence was rightly excluded.

The only way in which such evidence could have been used in mitigation damages (as was, I think, latterly admitted in the argument for the defence) would have been to prove that the writer or the publisher, whichever was the offender in the action, was aware of the circumstances proposed to be proved at the time when the letter was written or published as the case might be. If the defender might have said, I may have gone further than my information warranted, but I can at all events prove that the whole article was not the product of imagination; it originated partly from facts communicated, and is therefore not of so malicious a nature as it might otherwise appear to be. Here, however, the publisher says he had no knowledge of the circumstances in which the paragraph was written. The state of his mind in publishing the article is not therefore to be affected by the alleged facts offered to be proved, and no proof in this view again could have no effect in mitigation of damages. If the defender had shewn that the knowledge of the facts sought to be proved had weighed with him in admitting the article, then it might have gone in mitigation, but there was no averment of that kind made, and no proof offered.

A different question would have arisen if the action had been directed against the writer of the paragraph. Even then I should have been of opinion that the defender would have had to state as matter of fact on record that the circumstances sought to be proved had weighed with him when he wrote the paragraph, and I should have had great difficulty in admitting the evidence in support of such an averment.

I adhere to my view, as stated in the case of Paul v. Jackson, that in an action for damages for slander the jury should have the whole circumstances in which the slander was uttered fully before them. Where the pursuer has laid the case open by his conduct to a charge short of that complained of, and this in some extent influenced the defender in writing or publishing the alleged slander, I think the proof should be allowed. But here there is nothing of that kind. The proposed proof did not relate to any conduct of the pursuer, and the alleged circumstances in which the slander was published could not affect the defender's mind, for he knew nothing of them. I think the bill of particulars must be refused.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion, and I rest my judgment on that. We have here only the publisher of the newspaper, we have not the writer of the slander before us. I confess that if the defender of the action had the writer of the article, and if he had put the state of his mind when he wrote it in issue, and had submitted himself to examination and cross-examination, and if in those circumstances such evidence as was here disallowed had been tendered, I should have had considerable difficulty in refusing to admit it. The evidence in question would, in such circumstances, have been relevant; but if he had kept out of the box, and had proposed to prove this isolated fact, I rather think I should not have admitted the evidence. That question is, however, not before us, and I say no more about it.

With regard to the matter as it is now before us, I have no doubt that it would be quite competent for the publisher of this newspaper to prove the state of his own mind when he admitted the article to the paper and sent it out to the public, but I do not think it is competent for him to prove the state of mind of the anonymous correspondent who sent him the article, and that by proving one fact which may or may not have affected his mind at all.

I think, therefore, the evidence was properly rejected.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this question is concluded by authority. The reason which induced me to reject the evidence has been very shortly and concisely stated by Lord Adam, and I have nothing to add.

THE COURT refused the bill.

W. B. WILSON, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMSON, JACKSON, GOURLAY, & TAYLOR, Pursuers (Appellants).—Ure. No. 70.
ROBERT LOCHHEAD, Defender (Respondent).—J. Wilson.

Jan. 29, 1889.

Contract—Employment—Implied contract—Recompense.—At a meeting of creditors called by a debtor to consider the state of his affairs and an offer of composition, an accountant, who appeared for two creditors, was instructed by the whole creditors present to prepare a state of the debtor's affairs. After considerable negotiation a composition settlement was carried through by the accountant, who prepared a scheme of ranking and the promissory-notes for the instalments of the composition. The debtor had a separate agent. In an action brought by the accountant against the debtor for his services in carrying through the composition settlement, the defender pleaded that he had never employed the pursuer. Held that the defender was not liable,—Lord Rutherford Clark dissenting, on the ground that all the expenses necessarily incurred in carrying through the composition arrangement ought to be borne by the defender.

Thomson,
Jackson,
Gourlay, &
Taylor v.
Lochhead.

In October 1887 Robert Lochhead, manufacturer in Alva, finding himself in difficulties, consulted a law-agent in Stirling, who prepared a state of affairs, and called together Lochhead's creditors. Mr Gourlay, C.A., Glasgow, attended the meeting for two creditors. The creditors present were not satisfied with the state of affairs laid before them, nor with an offer of composition made by Lochhead, and resolved that Mr Gourlay should "be appointed to make an investigation into the affairs of the bankrupt, and report to a future meeting of creditors," to be called when he should be in a position to report.

2d Division.
Sheriff of Stirlingshire.
M.

A second meeting was called, at Mr Gourlay's request, by the agent for Lochhead, in order to consider the state of affairs which Mr Gourlay had prepared. Prior to this meeting Mr Gourlay exhibited the state of affairs to Lochhead and his agent. They then prepared an offer of 13s. 4d. per pound. The meeting was held in Gourlay's chambers on 11th November 1887. He laid before it the statement of affairs which he had pre-

No. 70.

Jan. 29, 1889.
Thomson,
Jackson,
Gourlay, &
Taylor v.
Lochhead.

pared. Lochhead with his agent attended the meeting, and objected to certain of the items in the state. The offer of 13s. 4d. per pound as a composition was made, but the creditors did not accept it.

On the 14th November Mr Gourlay wrote to the agent, stating that he had had an interview with certain of the creditors, as the result of which he enclosed an offer to be signed by Lochhead, which, he believed, would be accepted.

Lochhead then offered a composition of 14s. per pound, payable by certain instalments, the last instalment to be secured to the satisfaction of Mr Gourlay.

The creditors again met on 16th November, at which meeting, as the minute bore, "Mr Gourlay, on behalf of Mr Robert Lochhead," submitted the offer of composition of 14s. per pound, and the creditors agreed to accept it, provided payment of the second instalment was made at an earlier date than the offer bore. Mr Gourlay then wrote to Lochhead's agent, stating that the creditors agreed to recommend acceptance of the composition of 14s., and saying, "If your client agrees to this, let me have name of security at once."

Lochhead's agent replied, sending the offer (duly signed by Lochhead), and also stating the arrangement he proposed as to security for the last instalment.

The offer was then accepted by the creditors, and Mr Gourlay thereupon had the promissory-notes for the composition prepared, and they were duly signed and delivered to the creditors, according to a scheme of ranking which Mr Gourlay also prepared.

In May 1888 Mr Gourlay's firm raised an action against Lochhead in the Sheriff Court at Stirling for £58, 9s. 9d., for Mr Gourlay's services. The sum was made up of a charge of £52, 10s. as a "professional fee for preparing states of affairs, submitting same to creditors, carrying through composition arrangement, preparing scheme of division, drawing promissory-notes, delivering same to creditors, convening and attending meetings of creditors and committee of creditors, correspondence," and of small sums for outlays.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 1) "The defender is due to the pursuers, for outlays and fees for professional services incurred by him, the sums contained in the account dated 31st January 1888, herewith produced, amounting to the sum of £58, 9s. 9d."

They pleaded;—(1) The defender being justly indebted and resting owing to the pursuers the sum sued for, decree should be pronounced as craved. (2) The defender having employed the pursuers, or at all events availed himself of their services, he cannot now refuse to pay for same, and decree should be granted in terms of the prayer of the petition.

The defender stated that he had never employed the pursuers, that Mr Gourlay had represented the creditors' interest and not his, and that he himself had been advised only by his own agent. He tendered £30 in full.

The Sheriff-substitute (Buntine), after a proof, from which the facts already narrated appeared, on 17th August 1888, found "that the pursuer Mr Gourlay has failed to prove either that he was employed by the defender or that the latter has made himself liable in payment of his professional account," and therefore assoilzied the defender.*

* "NOTE.—It is admitted by the pursuer the said Mr Gourlay, that he was originally employed by two creditors of the defender to attend the first meeting of creditors, and that the creditors then assembled employed him to make an investigation into the affairs of the defender, and report to a future meeting of creditors.

"It is true that defender assented to this investigation, and gave every facility

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—From the actings of parties employment of Mr Gourlay by the defender was to be inferred. He had at first acted for two creditors no doubt, but it was clear that he had come to act in the course of the subsequent negotiations for the defender. For him, and in his interest, he had made up the scheme of division of his estate. To frame a scheme and to lay it before his creditors was a duty incumbent on a debtor if he wished to avoid sequestration, and the defender had availed himself of Mr Gourlay's services to perform this duty for him, when the offer made by himself had been refused. The case was even more clear as to the outlays for bill stamps, &c, which Mr Gourlay had incurred in preparing the composition bills. The pursuers had a just claim to recompense for the value of those services of which the debtor had availed himself.

No. 70.

Jan. 29, 1889.
Thomson,
Jackson,
Gourlay, &
Taylor v.
Lockhead.

Argued for the defender ;—No direct employment was proved, or even averred. It was not easy to imply it from the circumstances, for the defender had a man of business acting for him, and it was unlikely that he would employ a second to do the same business. Admittedly Mr Gourlay's services were in the interest of the creditors at first. They never ceased to be so. It would require strong proof to shew that he changed his employer in the course of the negotiation, and no such proof had been led.

Lord Young.—This action is put either on the ground of employment or on that of recompense for services rendered to and taken advantage of by the defender without employment. Employment indeed is not averred on record, the pursuers' averment being merely that the defender is "due to the pursuers for outlays and fees for professional services incurred by him," the sum sued for. The second plea in law, however, comes nearer a case of employment, for it runs,—"The defender having employed the pursuers, or at all events availed himself of their services, he cannot now refuse to pay for same, and decree should be granted in terms of the prayer of the petition." The Sheriff-substitute states in his note that before him it was "admitted that at no time did defender employ the pursuers, but it is contended that the defender, having availed himself of the professional services of the pursuer, is entitled in payment therefor."

Now, the pursuer Gourlay was employed, and very properly employed, as he explains in his evidence, at first by two creditors. There were other creditors who did not employ him, or indeed employ anyone. The defender employed a man of business of his own. I say a man of business, and he was not less such or less qualified to act because he was no otherwise an accountant than all men of business are. On the advice of this man of business the defender called together his creditors, and laid before them a state of his affairs. I cannot enter on the question whether it was a satisfactory state or one to which there existed objections. The creditors I have mentioned employed the pursuer, sending him to the meeting to attend to their interests, and to see that they did not suffer wrong in any arrangement with the defender. That was very proper. The result was that the creditors who were at the meeting desired the pursuer Mr Gourlay to examine into their debtor's affairs, and see his books and papers to the pursuer in carrying it out. But it cannot be said that it was conducted on defender's employment, or that it was carried out in defender's interests.

"It is further admitted that at no time did defender employ the pursuers, but it is contended that the defender, having availed himself of the professional services of the pursuer, is entitled in payment therefor.

"The Sheriff-substitute is unable to concur with this proposition. . . ."

No. 70.

Jan. 29, 1889.

Thomson,
Jackson,
Gourlay, &
Taylor v.
Lochhead.

so far as necessary, and he on his part, with his man of business, under give every facility for the examination.

In the absence of anything further, I think Mr Gourlay attended employment he had received, which was to act in the interest of the c and to see that the debtor and his man of business acted justly by them prevent them from accepting an offer which was not satisfactory. Th was that a composition was ultimately effected by means of a correspo between the pursuer Gourlay and the defender's man of business, a high position being obtained than had formerly been offered. Here there is of the employment of a man of business by the debtor, and another creditors, each of these gentlemen with the interest of his own employ care, the result being an arrangement for a compromise by which the d his discharge.

Now, I think it would be a fair matter of arrangement that the should stipulate that the debtor should pay the expense incurred by looking into his affairs. But I do not think that was done here. How posal would have been received if made we do not know. In the ab any such bargain I think Mr Gourlay must look for payment to th employed him for their interest. They might have been satisfied examination of the debtor's affairs by his own man of business, and if would have had no other expense. It is no blame to them that they v and they seem to have got a better composition because they were not. concur with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking that the person they empl no action against anyone but them, and that he cannot maintain an actio the defender on the suggestion that but for his services no composition have been arrived at.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have felt a good deal of hesitation in and all the more because I know that I stand alone. I incline to think, that Mr Gourlay is entitled to our judgment on the simple ground tha expenses necessarily incurred in carrying through the composition arra should be paid by the defender. In my opinion, such expenses shoul charged against the creditors.

It appears to me that the composition contract was effected by mean Gourlay's services, and by means of them alone. Being services wh necessary to the end which the defender had in view, and which was fully attained, I think that he should pay for them. He has had th of them, and in such a case, when he obtains a discharge on a composition that it may be fairly said that he alone has had the benefit of them.

It is said that the defender employed another person. It is true th he did, but the services of this person were of no use, and gave no aid ing the composition contract. The chief if not the only thing whic was to prepare a state of affairs, but it was so defective that the credit not consider it.

LORD LEE.—I do not doubt that in the general case it is reasonable expenses properly incurred in carrying through a composition arra should fall on the debtor. But I think the question here is whe arrangement to that effect has been proved? Mr Gourlay was employ creditors and not by the defender. In that state of the facts, I think it was intended to throw the expenses incurred under that employment on the defender, the debtor, this ought to have been intimated to him, and should have been made a condition of the acceptance by the creditors of the composition. That might have been quite a reasonable arrangement, and my impression is that it is quite a common one, but in this case I find no trace of such an arrangement. I concur in the opinion of Lord Young. I think there is no proof of the ground of action.

No. 70.

Jan. 29, 1889.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Young. It is unfortunate that the pursuers did not accept the offer of £30, which appears to have been made in the defences. Mr Gourlay, it is certain, was in the first place employed not by the defender but by the creditors. I cannot find evidence to shew that he afterwards became the agent of the defender, or that it was ever suggested to the defender that he was to be held liable to pay for Mr Gourlay's services. It would have been easy to bring to the defender's knowledge that Mr Gourlay's services were to be understood as rendered to him, and I think it would be dangerous to hold that a professional man who was originally employed for one party should, without some clear change in his position, obvious to the other party, be held to have become entitled to claim remuneration from the other, whose interest is altogether different from that of the original employer.

The very fact that Mr Gourlay was employed by the creditors leads to the inference that he was to endeavour to come to an arrangement as favourable as possible to them. Now, if he was afterwards to act for both, or for the debtor, Lochhead, alone, the change ought to be made perfectly clear. Lochhead ought, if he was to be expected to pay for two professional men—both his own agent and Mr Gourlay—to have had that put before him. It is quite clear that if we gave the pursuers decree, the result would be that the defender would have to pay for the services both of Mr Gourlay and of his own agent, and there is no ground for supposing he intended to incur double costs. On these grounds I agree with Lord Young.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—" . . . Find in fact that the pursuer Mr Gourlay was employed by creditors of the defender, and not by the defender: Find in law that the defender is not liable in payment of the sum sued for: Therefore dismiss the appeal; affirm the judgment of the Sheriff; of new assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the petition . . ."

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—Agents.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF ECKFORD, First Parties.—Sym.

No. 71.

THOMAS RUTHERFORD AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—W. E. Fraser.

School — Schoolmaster — Retiring allowance — School Board — Parochial teacher's house — Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), secs. 23, 60, 61. Feb. 2, 1889. School Board of Eckford v. Rutherford.

A parochial teacher appointed prior to 1872 agreed with the school board that in consequence of age and infirmity he should resign office, on condition of receiving during life a certain annual sum, and the free use of the teacher's house and garden, which he had occupied for many years.

Certain ratepayers objected to the arrangement as ultra vires of the board, in respect (1) that the school board were not entitled to allow a larger money allowance than that to which the teacher would have been entitled on removal for inefficiency without fault under sec. 60 of the Education Act, 1872; and

No. 71. (2) that they were not entitled to divert the teacher's house from its proper use. Held that the school board had acted within their powers.

Feb. 2, 1889.
School Board
of Eckford v.
Rutherford.

2D DIVISION.
M.

HENRY RICHARDSON LAWRIE became teacher of the parish school of Eckford on 1st October 1831. At the passing of the Education Act, 1872, his emoluments consisted of a salary of £50, the whole of the school fees, amounting to £32 or £33 per annum, and the use of the dwelling-house and garden provided for the parochial teacher under the provisions of the Acts dealing with education prior to 1872.

He continued after the passing of the Education Act, 1872, to receive these emoluments, and he also received four-fifths of the Parliamentary grant. His emoluments amounted in all to about £120 per annum, exclusive of the house and garden.

In December 1886 the School Board of Eckford asked Mr Lawrie, who was in his seventy-eighth year, and from old age and partial blindness had become inefficient for the duties of his office, to resign. He agreed with them that he should resign office, receiving a retiring allowance of £60 from Christmas 1886, and the use for life of the dwelling-house and garden. This arrangement came into effect, and a new teacher was appointed, to whom the Board, in addition to his salary, made an allowance for house-rent, on the understanding that he should get possession of the dwelling-house and garden when Mr Lawrie ceased to occupy them.

Thomas Rutherford and others, ratepayers of Eckford, having objected to these arrangements, a special case was stated for the opinion and judgment of the Court. The School Board were first parties to the case, and Rutherford and others second parties.

The questions asked were,—“(1) Whether the first parties, in granting Mr Lawrie a retiring allowance, were (a) restricted to a sum not exceeding the gross amount of his salary? or whether (b) their power in fixing the amount was entirely discretionary? (2) Whether the first parties (a) were entitled to grant to Mr Lawrie, in addition to the retiring allowance in money, the free use of the schoolmaster's house and garden during his life? or whether (b) they were bound to make them over to the person actually discharging the duties of schoolmaster?”

The second parties maintained (1) that the arrangements as to the retiring allowance of Mr Lawrie were ultra vires of the Board, in respect that the retiring allowance granted by the Board was in excess of the amount to which Mr Lawrie was entitled, such amount being that to which he would have been entitled if removed from office for inefficiency, but without fault,* viz., a sum not less than two-thirds and not

* The Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), enacts by sec. 60,—“Any teacher of a public school appointed previously to the passing of this Act may be removed from his office in manner following, that is to say, . . . (2) If the school board of any parish or burgh shall consider that any such teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, they may require a special report regarding the school and the teacher from Her Majesty's inspector charged with the duty of inspecting such school; and on receiving such report the school board may, if they see cause, proceed to remove such teacher from office, . . . provided also that in the case of teachers of parish schools appointed previously to the passing of the Act who may be so removed, the school board shall have the same power of granting retiring allowances, and the teachers shall have the same rights to retiring allowances as were vested in heritors and ministers and in parish schoolmasters respectively by sections 19 and 20 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861, in the case of parish schoolmasters permitted or required to resign or dismissed from office as therein provided.”

Sec. 19 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861, which Act was exceeding the whole of his salary of £50. They maintained (2) that the house and garden, at least so long as the Board were owners of them, must be applied by the Board to the use of the person actually discharging the duties of schoolmaster.

The first parties contended that the arrangement they had made with Mr Lawrie was within their powers, and was in the circumstances a proper exercise of their discretionary power.

Argued for the first parties ;—(1) As to the retiring allowance of £60.—Mr Lawrie had resigned his office. It followed that the provision of the Act of 1872 which was applicable to the case was section 61.* That section provided that where a teacher resigned the board might pay him such retiring allowance as they might think fit. Section 60, on which the second parties relied, applied to the case of a teacher who was removed from office. (2) As to the house and garden.—The first parties were under the statute† vested in the house and garden, and had a discretion to take them into account in settling the allowance on which Mr

No. 71.

Feb. 2, 1889.
School Board
of Eckford v.
Rutherford.

repealed by the Education Act, 1872, provided,—“In case it shall be found on a report by one of Her Majesty’s inspectors of schools made on the application of the heritors of the parish, and concurred in by the presbytery of the bounds, that the schoolmaster of any parish is disqualified because of infirmity or old age for the due performance of the duties of his office, or that from negligence and inattention he has failed efficiently to discharge such duties, it shall be lawful to the heritors and minister at any meeting . . . to permit and require such schoolmaster to resign his said office, and in case of his refusal so to do, to dismiss or suspend such schoolmaster . . . and in every case of such resignation the heritors and minister may grant to such schoolmaster a retiring allowance payable during the remainder of his life ; provided that where such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance, the amount whereof shall not be less than two-third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to said office at the date of such resignation thereof, and shall not exceed the gross amount of such salary, which retiring allowance shall be payable in all respects in like manner with the salary of the schoolmaster. . . .”

Section 20 of the same Act provided,—“In all cases in which the minister and heritors are by this Act empowered to provide a retiring allowance for a schoolmaster who shall resign or shall be removed from his office, it shall be lawful for them, if they shall see fit, to provide for such schoolmaster in addition to such allowance a further yearly sum equal in amount to the annual value of any dwelling-house and garden to which he may be entitled as such schoolmaster, as the same shall be valued by the assessor for the county.”

* The Education Act, 1872, provides (sec. 61),—“A school board may permit any teacher of a public school to resign his office upon the condition of receiving a retiring allowance, and the school board may award and pay to such teacher out of the school fund such retiring allowance as they shall think fit, provided always that nothing herein contained shall affect the right under the existing law to a retiring allowance of any teacher appointed under the recited Acts, or any of them.”

† The Education Act, 1872, provides (sec. 23),—“The parish and other schools which have been established and now exist in any parish under the recited Acts, or any of them, together with teachers’ houses and land attached thereto, shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish, . . . and the said school board shall thereafter, with respect to school management and the election of teachers, and generally with respect to all powers, obligations, and duties in regard to such schools now vested in or incumbent on the heritors qualified, according to the existing law, and the minister of the parish, supersede and come in place of such heritors and minister. . . .”

No. 71.

Feb. 2, 1889.
School Board
of Eckford v.
Rutherford.

Lawrie would agree to retire. It was for the public interest that they should do so. Being fully vested in the schools and teachers' houses, with power to discontinue the use of them, and if so, to sell "any land and buildings connected" therewith (sec. 36), and to acquire new schools, houses, and gardens (sec. 37), the Board had a discretion conferred upon it by the statute with which the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere, or at least with which the Court would not interfere unless the Board were acting without due regard to the public interest. At one time, viz., from 1861 to 1872, it appeared that the heritors were bound to allow no one but the teacher actually in office to occupy the teacher's house,* but the Legislature had repealed that provision, while, by inference, re-enacting the immediately following sections (19 and 20) of the same Act. The teacher's house was now just as much in the control of the board as any part of the school fund, and the price of buildings sold by them, or the rent obtained for such, might be added to the school fund. There was no interest on the other side to raise this question, for the Board had power under section 61 of the Act of 1872 to increase the retiring allowance to Mr Lawrie by the annual value of the house and garden.

Argued for the second parties;—(1) As to the retiring allowance.—The case was one to which the provisions of section 60 were applicable. The teacher had been asked to resign, and had agreed to do so. It was a case of removal without fault, for it was clear that if he had not resigned at the request of the Board, they would have been bound to remove him. If so, they would have been entitled to give him only the allowance which he could have received under the Act of 1861, viz., a sum not exceeding the gross amount of his salary of £50. (2) As to the house and garden.—The policy of the law was that the parochial buildings were to be used for parochial purposes only. It was true that the board might discontinue a school and sell the buildings. But that was not here proposed. The first parties were keeping the buildings and using them for a purpose unconnected with the interests of education, and in order to do so were providing the new teacher with another house elsewhere. That laid a double burden on the rates, and was therefore objectionable, and indeed ultra vires. The case was one for sympathy, but the first parties were not entitled from motives of sympathy to favour one who had become unconnected with the educational interests of the parish, and had no more right to free occupation of the teacher's house than a member of the public. By section 23 of the Education Act of 1872 the school board of a parish were vested in the schools and teachers' houses, with all the "powers, obligations, and duties" formerly incumbent on the heritors. Now, the heritors would have had no title to alienate the school buildings for an indefinite time, as was here done by the first parties.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think this is a clear case. The first parties, the

* The Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861, which was repealed by the Education Act, 1872, enacted (sec. 18),—"Nothing in this Act shall be held to interfere with any arrangement which may have been concluded between the heritors and schoolmaster of any parish for the retirement of such schoolmaster, except as regards the house and garden and premises attached thereto, which shall in every case be made over at the term of Whitsunday next after the passing of this Act to the person actually discharging the duties of schoolmaster, and where the use of such premises may have formed part of a retiring allowance, the heritors shall make reasonable compensation to the ex-schoolmaster."

School Board of the parish of Eckford, have made an arrangement by which the aged schoolmaster is to retire. The Board propose, in the language of section 61 of the Education Act of 1872, "to award and pay" to him "out of the school fund such retiring allowance as they shall think fit." In the exercise of the discretion which this section confers upon them they have fixed the retiring allowance at so much money, viz., £60, and they have agreed to give him, rent free for life, the use of the teacher's house and garden, which he has so long occupied in connection with the school.

No. 71.

Feb. 2, 1889.
School Board
of Eckford v.
Rutherford.

Now, the first question raised is whether the School Board are restricted in fixing the retiring allowance to observe the limits which were laid down by sections 19 and 20 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act of 1861, which sections are kept in force by section 60 of the Act of 1872, for the purpose of being applied to cases of "removal" of teachers who are "incompetent, unfit, or inefficient." The amount of retiring allowance which these sections contemplate is a sum which "shall not be less than two-third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to such office at the date of such resignation thereof, and shall not exceed the gross amount of such salary."

The second parties, who are ratepayers in the parish, say that Mr Lawrie's salary was only £50, and that the school fees and other emoluments must not be taken into account in fixing the retiring allowance, which, therefore, they maintain, cannot in any view exceed £50. I think it unnecessary to decide the question which they thus seek to raise on section 60, because the School Board are not giving the allowance under section 60. That section refers, as I have mentioned, to removal of a teacher. But this case is under section 61, which applies to a resignation arranged and agreed on between the schoolmaster and the board. Section 60 is appropriate to removal, against the teacher's will, for bad conduct or inefficiency, while section 61 contemplates such a case as the present—a resignation. It is meant for cases in which the school board, very probably, could not remove the teacher, but in which notwithstanding they think that for the interest of the parish, and in fairness to him, such arrangements should be made as will induce him to resign. Such arrangements will certainly not be lightly interfered with by the Court. I do not think the Court would interfere with them unless they appeared to be so outrageously contrary to the interests of the parish as to amount to malversation by the board in their office as trustees for the interests entrusted to them.

On these grounds, I think that the first question which is raised ought to be answered in favour of the School Board.

The other question in the case is whether the School Board have acted beyond their powers in regard to the house and garden, in respect that they have thought fit, instead of giving the new teacher the house attached to the school, to give to the aged teacher, in consideration of his long services to the parish, the use of it for the rest of his life. The second parties say that the Board had no power to do that.

Now, I do not think that even under the law prior to the Act of 1861 it would have been illegal for the heritors to arrange in the interest of all concerned that the old teacher should remain in the house, and the new teacher be properly provided for elsewhere in the neighbourhood. But however that may have been, I think that under the new system which the Act of 1872 has introduced it is in the discretion of the school board to say whether a teacher's house is or is not to be part of the educational equipment of the parish. The question truly is

No. 71.

Feb. 2, 1889.
School Board
of Eckford v.
Rutherford.

whether the use of house and garden is to form part of the retiring allowance. So far as appears, the new teacher is quite satisfied that they should, and is quite satisfied with the arrangement that he should have provision made for his residing elsewhere. It is by certain ratepayers that the objection is taken. They maintain that the Board are not entitled to keep on the house unless it is to be occupied by the teacher who is discharging the duties of teacher in the parish. Now, I do not see what real interest these ratepayers have to raise that question. They are only interested in preventing any illegal application of property which improperly adds to the rates. But here if this question were answered in their favour no benefit would accrue to the ratepayers, for the Board would simply change the allowance as regards house and garden into a money allowance in addition to the £60 already given. I could even conceive circumstances in which the course the second parties contend for would be against the interest of the ratepayers.

I am clearly of opinion in law that the School Board may make such an arrangement as they have done with Mr Lawrie, and that no misuse of office has been substantiated which calls upon this Court for interference with their action. They have acted within their powers, and we have no power to control them in a reasonable exercise of the discretion vested in them by the Act.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think the second parties have no title and no interest to maintain the objections they have stated to the action of the School Board.

